General Board to Develop Economic Action Policies

Job Layoffs, Aid Claims Greet 1975

By James M. Shevis

The New Year got off to a bleak start for millions of American workers as job layoffs mounted throughout the recession-struck economy.

The severity of the growing unemployment was reflected in a rising flood of initial claims for jobless insurance benefits filed at employment security offices across the country. In the latest reporting period—the week ended Dec. 21—the Labor Dept. said 677,800 initial claims were filed. The week before, 637,700 new claims were taken.

Altogether, during the week ended Dec. 14, there were 3,372,300 persons actually receiving unemployment insurance benefits, the Labor Dept. said. The figure represented an increase of 246,000 over the previous week as all but five states posted higher volumes.

The jobless rate for those covered by unemployment insurance jumped from 4.8 to 5.2 percent. A year earlier, the rate was 2.9 percent when the volume was 1,821,400.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. said its composite index of leading indicators—of which new claims are one—fell by 1.5 percent in November, the fourth consecutive monthly decline in the measurement. The index is a barometer of the state of the economy.

The four-month decline in the index was the largest in 15 years, and was due chiefly to industrial production cutbacks and shorter workweeks, the Commerce Dept. said.

Of the eight leading indicators in the index, six pointed downward in November while only two showed gains. James L. Pate, Assistant Commerce Secretary for Economic Affairs, said the drop "clearly reflects the decline in economic activity and, in particular, weakness in the employment situation."

New layoffs were reported in nearly every major industry, including aluminum, textiles, steel and appliances. The auto industry again was rocked as the Ford Motor Co. announced that nearly 60,000 more of its workers will be added to the ranks of the unemployed this month.

The new layoffs, prompted by slumping sales and growing inventories, will bring the total number of workers laid off by Ford, General Motors and Chrysler to about 292,000.

Meeting on Recession Set Jan. 23

Top officers of all AFL-CIO affiliates have been summoned to a meeting of the federation's General Board to adopt a program "to stabilize the economy and put America back to work."

The enlarged meeting of the General Board will be held Jan. 23 in Washington, D.C. The General Board consists of the 35 members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the president or other principal officer of each of the 110 affiliated unions and seven trade and industrial departments.

The call sent out by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland also invited each affiliate to send an additional officer to the meeting and each state federation to be represented by its principal officer.

"The General Board meeting will deal with the state of the economy," Meany and Kirkland said. "It will hear detailed reports on the problems of workers in all sectors of the economy, consider proposals by the Executive Council for legislation to deal with the economic disaster threatening America, and adopt an AFL-CIO program of action. . . ."

A worsened economy and the convening of a new Congress formed the backdrop to the call for a special meeting of the AFL-CIO's leadership.

"It is clear that massive, immediate government action is imperative," the call declared, at a time when:

- "Recession is rapidly turning into depression.
- "Unemployment is mounting daily.
- "The construction industry is

Steepest Drop on Record:

Real Earnings Down 6.2 Percent in Year

Real spendable earnings of the average American worker took their steepest year-to-year drop on record last November, as retail prices surged 12.1 percent above a year earlier, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The November decline of 1.7 percent in real wages—take-home pay adjusted for inflation— was the sharpest one-month drop since BLS began compiling the monthly figures in 1964. The latest decline reduced the average worker's buying power 6.2 percent below the year-earlier level.

The year-to-year drop in real spendable earnings was the sharpest on record, surpassing the previous record 5.4 percent decline in the 12-month period ended last April.

A married worker with three dependents was left with real spendable weekly earnings of $88.55, expressed in 1967 dollars, in November, BLS noted.

This was $1.49 less than the month before, $5.84 less than a year earlier and $2.77 below the level for the year 1965. November was the 21st month in a row in which real spendable earnings were below their year-earlier level.

Meanwhile, inflation continued unabated in November. Retail prices rose another nine-tenths of 1 percent over the month, pushing the government's consumer price index to 154.3 percent of its 1967 average.

The year-to-year increase of 12.1 percent in the index was the largest since September 1947 when the CPI showed a 12.6 percent rise from the year before.

Soaring food prices, along with hefty increases for a wide variety of other consumer goods and services, led to the November CPI rise. On a seasonally adjusted basis, the nine-tenths of 1 percent increase was the same as the October rise.

Ford Vetoes Union-Backed Oil Cargo Bill

By David L. Perlman

President Ford vetoed a job-creating oil cargo bill that labor supported and signed into law a foreign trade bill that the AFL-CIO warned will lead to further destruction of American jobs.

He also used his pocket-veto prerogative to kill a strip-mining bill opposed by the coal industry but supported both by the coal miners and groups concerned with the environment. Adjournment of Congress gave the President the option of vetoeing bills passed in the final days of the session without the possibility of Congress overriding the veto.

High Court Rejects Attack on Union Shop

The Supreme Court refused to consider a claim by two conservative news commentators that a union shop agreement requiring them to become members of the Television & Radio Artists violated constitutional guarantees of free speech.

Denial of Supreme Court review made final a decision handed down last spring by a three-judge appellate court that found that the union shop serves a "substantial public interest" and in the case before it did not violate the constitutional rights of William F. Buckley, the columnist and magazine editor, and M. Stanton Evans, editor of the Indianapolis News.

By the same 7-2 vote, the Supreme Court also refused to hear a similar appeal by radio commentator Fulton Lewis III from an adverse decision by a New York state appellate court.

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice William O. Douglas were in the minority in wanting the Supreme Court to review the two cases. Douglas, in his dissent, said the court should consider more fully the question of whether a requirement that broadcasters pay dues might infringe on First Amendment rights.

A federal district judge had initially upheld Buckley and Evans in their challenge of AFTRA's

Goldfinger Ties Mess To Formula Economists

San Francisco—America's most prestigious economists must share the blame for the nation's economic mess, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger declared.

He contrasted the pragmatic and flexible approach that has made collective bargaining so effective in solving problems with an over-reliance by most economists on textbook theories and computer printouts.

Goldfinger handed out flunking marks to the economics establishment in the course of his presidential address to the Industrial Relations Research Association. He served as head of the organization of labor, management and university professionals during the past year.

Reliance on formulas and theories has kept the American economy on a recession-inflation course that was clearly obvious, Goldfinger said.

He aimed his attack most sharply at "the campus- and foundation-dominated economics establishment

'74 Election Gets Barkan 'Year' Award

Boston—COPE Director Alexander Barkan received the 1974 Man of the Year award from Service Employees Local 285 at a dinner in his honor here.

The award, presented annually by the local, cited Barkan for his role in directing COPE's successful effort in the 1974 congressional and state elections. He was introduced by SEIU Legislative Director Richard Murphy, who represented the international and read a telegram from AFL-CIO President George Meany joining in the "well-deserved tribute."

"In my book," Meany's wire said, "Al Barkan has done a magnificent job in constantly building and strengthening labor's political arm.

"In election after election, COPE has proved its ability and sharpened its nuts-and-bolts activity. It is no exaggeration to say that COPE is far and away the best political operation in America. And a big share of the credit for that record is due to Al Barkan and his ability to mobilize labor people to do a job that benefits all their fellow workers."

The award was presented on behalf of the SEIU city employes' local by President Thomas Kennedy and Sec.-Treas. Matthew McGrath. Among scores of public officials at the dinner were Boston Mayor Kevin White, a past recipient of the award, and Lt.-Gov.-elect Thomas P. O'Neill, III.

MAN OF THE YEAR for Service Employees Local 285 in Boston was COPE Director Alexander Barkan, right, who was cited for his role in labor's effective political effort in last November's elections. Barkan was introduced at the award dinner by SEIU Legislative Director Richard Murphy.

Mrs. Dubinsky Dies In New York at 80

New York — Emma Dubinsky, the wife of David Dubinsky, died at her home at the age of 80. She and her husband, the president-emeritus of the Ladies' Garment Workers and former AFL-CIO vice president, had been married for more than 60 years.

Mrs. Dubinsky is survived also by her daughter, Jean Appleton, a sister and a granddaughter.

Tax Loopholes Hit as Subsidy For Business

Tax loopholes have enabled some of the biggest U.S. corporations to pay little or no tax on huge profits, according to a congressional study.

Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) said that in the 1973 tax year, 10 corporations with total profits of $976 million paid no federal corporate income tax.

He said another 20 corporations, with profits totalling more than $5.28 billion, paid an effective federal corporate tax rate of between 1 percent and 10 percent.

These companies have done nothing illegal, Vanik noted. They have simply taken advantage — quite effectively — of the multitude of tax subsidies which have been enacted over the years.

Vanik said the study by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation "again dramatically proves that the federal tax subsidies provided to giant corporations significantly reduce or even eliminate" their tax obligations.

He warned that "across-the-board industry tax breaks will only add to the list of profitable corporate tax freeloaders."

The taxes not paid by big companies, Vanik said, are being paid by individual taxpayers and small businessmen. He termed tax reform the "priority" issue for the new Congress.

J. P. Stevens 'Bugging' Costs Firm $50,000

Charlotte, N.C.—J. P. Stevens & Co. has paid $50,000 in damages to the Textile Workers Union of America and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. to settle a 1973 wiretapping suit brought against the firm by the two labor organizations.

The settlement was announced by TWUA President Sol Stetin and IUD Organizing Director Nicholas Zonarich who described it as "another victory in our efforts to achieve industrial democracy for the men and women who work for J. P. Stevens."

The suit followed an FBI agent's discovery two years ago that a Wallace, S.C., motel room rented by two union organizers during an organizing campaign among Stevens workers in that area had been "bugged."

Two Stevens officials were found guilty on charges of illegal wiretapping in December 1973. An appeals court subsequently set aside the verdict.

Stetin and Zonarich said the labor organizations would not keep the money Stevens paid to settle the case. Instead, the $50,000 would be divided among 22 Stevens workers in the Wallace area who were discharged by the company for union activity, they said. Litigation costs would first be deducted.

Harold McIver of Charlotte, coordinator of IUD activities in the Carolinas, noted that more than $1.3 million now has been collected by TWUA and the IUD in behalf of some 300 workers illegally discriminated against during 11 years of union activity at Stevens.

The 22 workers who will share the settlement were fired by Stevens for questioning company statements at a "captive audience" meeting prior to a National Labor Relations Board election scheduled in September 1973, McIver said. Their case is pending before the NLRB in Washington.

McIver also noted that TWUA has filed a petition for an election at two other Stevens plants in North Carolina and expects balloting to take place by late February.

The union already is certified as the bargaining agent at eight Stevens plants, seven in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., and another in Statesboro, Ga.

Aluminum Plants Apply COL Boost

Pittsburgh—A cost-of-living adjustment of 16 cents an hour was added to the wages of 30,000 members of the Steelworkers employed by three major aluminum companies effective last Dec. 1.

The USWA members received wage adjustments earlier last year totalling 27 cents an hour under terms of the union's 1974 settlement with the Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metals Co. and Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp.

The USWA escalator clause provides for a 1-cent an hour increase for each three-tenths of 1 percent rise in the government's consumer price index.

3.4 Million Workers Affected:

Top Court Blocks FLSA Coverage

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger has temporarily blocked enforcement of a federal wage-hour law amendment extending coverage to additional groups of public employes, including fire fighters and police officers.

The full Supreme Court will decide later this month whether to extend Burger's order pending further court consideration of a suit by city and state governments challenging the constitutionality of the added coverage.

A three-judge federal court initially dismissed the constitutional challenge brought by the League of Cities and the National Governors Conference. The judges said they were bound by a 7-2 decision of the Supreme Court in 1968 that affirmed the right of Congress to extend wage-hour coverage to groups of public employes. But the district court panel, while refusing to block the Labor Dept. from enforcing the extension of coverage enacted last year, suggested that the Supreme Court might want to consider narrowing the scope of its 1968 ruling.

The Fire Fighters, whose members had been scheduled to receive limited overtime pay coverage for the first time on Jan. 1, 1975, announced earlier that the union will take part in any court battle necessary to uphold the law.

If the Supreme Court hears the case, IAFF President William H. McClennan said, the union will file a friend of the court brief supporting the law's constitutionality.

Congress provided a special overtime provision for fire fighters and law enforcement officers, which allows considerable flexibility in scheduling hours of work. Initially, the only obligation is to pay time and one-half after 60 hours in a seven-day period or after 240 hours in a 28-day work period. The ceiling on straight-time hours would gradually drop in future years.

The court challenge affects directly 3.4 million public employes who were brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act, effective last May, at a $1.90 an hour wage floor which had been scheduled to rise to $2 on Jan. 1. The 634,000 fire fighters and police officers in this group had been covered for wages in May, but not for hours. In 1966 nearly 3 million public workers were covered, mostly in hospitals and in non-teaching jobs in school systems.

Labor Dept. lawyers said that if the law is upheld any workers underpaid during the period in which enforcement was barred would be entitled to retroactive pay. Before the court intervention, the department had initiated action to compel the city of Cape Girardeau, Mo., to pay the minimum wage—then $1.90 an hour—to its fire fighters.

Court Bars Bid to Block Labor Mural

Chicago — Judge Richard B. Austin has ruled that city officials of Blue Island, Ill., must permit the completion of the Mexican-American outdoor labor mural they had blocked.

Judge Austin held city officials in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution for attempting to restrict the expression of ideas. Mayor Richard Withers and the Blue Island City Council had blocked completion of the work on the grounds that it violated a city zoning ordinance limiting advertising signs.

The mural was commissioned by the Illinois Labor History Society to tell the story of the transition of Mexican-American workers into employment in local industries and professions.

The team of artists is headed by Ray Patlan, Chicago's leading Mexican-American muralist.

President Leslie Orear of the Labor History Society said completion of the mural will be delayed until spring because of the weather.

New Health Security Bill Mapped As Major Goal in 94th Congress

A new national health security bill embodying one of organized labor's major legislative objectives will be introduced in the 94th Congress with the strong endorsement of the Committee for National Health Insurance.

Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock, chairman of the committee, announced plans for the legislation to be introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.). AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland is vice chairman of the CNHI.

The new health security bill would cover every resident of the United States for all hospital and physicians' services, as well as other specified health care needs such as eyeglasses, hearing aids and dental services for children and eventually for everyone. There would be no means tests, no work earnings tests, no deductibles, no co-insurance, no cut-offs and no fine print.

Woodcock listed the following improvements in the lew legislation:

- Grants would be given to local non-profit agencies to develop and provide social care services to benefit the aged and chronically ill. The Health Security Board which would administer the program is directed to make grants as rapidly as it is satsified that applicants can provide the services and assure some measure of non-federal financing.
- The ceiling on payroll and individual taxes would be raised from $15,000 to $20,000.
- Catastrophic illness protection would specifically be recognized in the preamble.
- Optometrists and podiatrists would be recognized as "physicians" when functioning within board regulations, and they could write prescriptions if permitted by state law.
- Free-standing alcohol, drug abuse, family planning, and rehabilitation centers would be recognized as coming under the program.
- An amendment on employment rights in health care institutions would be incorporated.

Otherwise, the Health Security bill which has been before the Congress since mid-1970 would remain essentially unchanged.

If health security is enacted, no American would ever again have to pay a doctor's bill or hospital bill. Payment in full would be made through a health security trust fund, with federal general revenues providing half of the necessary financing and the other half acquired as follows:

- One percent tax on individual earned or unearned income up to $20,000 per year, or a maximum on the individual of $200 per year.
- Three and one-half percent tax on employers' payrolls, which would be largely offest by the elimination of premium payments for private health insurance.
- Two and one-half percent tax on the self-employed, up to $20,000 income.

Whether working, laid-off, not working or retired, all residents of the U.S. would be entitled to the benefits as a matter of right.

Covers 15,000:

Greyhound Workers Okay National Pact

Phoenix, Ariz.—The Amalgamated Transit Union has overwhelmingly ratified a new three-year contract with Greyhound Bus Lines covering 15,000 ATU members across the country.

Most of those covered by the agreement, about 11,000, are over-the-road drivers. Others include baggage handlers, hostesses, ticket agents, mechanics and office workers.

The pact, which will provide more than $30 million in wage increases and fringe benefit improvements over the life of the agreement, was approved by a ratio of nearly 3 to 1. In mail balloting tabulated Dec. 20, members voted 9,241 to 3,167 to accept the new contract.

The settlement is the first national contract the union has negotiated with the carrier, the nation's largest intercity bus company. In the past, separate contracts for ATU's Greyhound members in the eastern and western halves of the country were negotiated.

The agreement followed a six-day strike against Greyhound that shut down the carrier's operations from coast to coast last November.

Under the terms of the pact, over-the-road drivers will receive an increase of 5.5 mills for each mile driven, retroactive to Nov. 1, 1974. Additional increases of 4 and 3 mills per mile will become effective on Nov. 1, 1975, and Nov. 1, 1976, respectively, for a total increase of 1.25 cents per mile over the term of the contract.

Under the old agreement, drivers west of the Rocky Mountains received 21.8 cents a mile. Those in the East got 21.6 cents a mile.

Hourly-rated operators, as opposed to over-the-road drivers who generally are paid according to the number of miles they log, will receive an increase of 31 cents an hour over three years.

Mechanics' pay will rise by 91 cents an hour over the life of the agreement, while wage increases totaling 71 cents an hour will be spread over a three-year period for station, maintenance, hostess and steward, and office employes.

In addition, the company agreed to continue the cost-of-living escalator cluase contained in the old agreement. It also agreed to contribute $5 more per month to the union's national health and welfare plan, effective Nov. 1, 1975, and another $5 a month, effective Nov. 1, 1976.

HRDI Elects Alan Kistler As President

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, has been elected president of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute. He succeeds Julius F. Rothman, who died Dec. 13.

Announcement of Kistler's election Dec. 20 was made by AFL-CIO President George Meany, chairman of HRDI's 12-member board of trustees. Kistler will also continue as director of the Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

HRDI was established by the AFL-CIO in 1968 to expand organized labor's participation in manpower programs for unskilled, disadvantaged and minority-group workers. As president, Kistler will be in overall charge of AFL-CIO participation in a number of government-sponsored programs under the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration, including veterans assistance, Job Corps, on-the-job training and Apprenticeship Outreach.

Kistler, 54, has been active in the labor movement since 1939. He has been a member of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees and the Pittsburgh Newspaper Guild and business agent of a Chicago local union now affiiliated with the State, County & Municipal Employees. After receiving an M.A. degree from the University of Chicago, he joined Steelworkers Local 1147 and is still a member.

Kistler joined the CIO organizing staff in 1952. He became assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization in 1962 and was appointed director of the new Dept. of Organization & Field Services in February 1974.

Minimum Wage Step-Up Becomes Effective Jan. 1

The minimum wage for all workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act was increased on Jan. 1, 1975— the effective date of the second step of the wage-hour amendments enacted last spring.

Those whose jobs had been covered by a $2 minimum wage had their pay floor raised to $2.10. Most workers are in this category—persons in jobs that had been covered by the wage-hour law before 1966. A year from now, on Jan. 1, 1976, their minimum will rise to $2.30 an hour.

Other non-farm workers, whose minimum had been $1.90, went to a $2 minimum. In this group are those covered for the first time in 1966 and persons in jobs brought under the law for the first time last May, including household domestic employes. The $2 rate will apply to many of the traditionally low-paying jobs, including workers in hospitals, restaurants, hotels, retail trade and laundries. Their rate will go to $2.20 next year and to $2.30 in 1977.

Workers on farms covered by the FLSA moved up from a $1.60 minimum to a $1.80 wage floor. It will take them three more annual steps to reach the $2.30 level.

Only workers who are earning less than the minimum rates for their jobs were entitled to a raise as a result of the minimum wage step-up. An estimated 4 million persons had their pay raised when the wage floor was last increased.

"We are no longer in a recession in the auto industry," Auto Workers Vice President Ken Bannon said. "It's depression for the workers, and it's not going to get much better."

Detroit's problems further increased when Mayor Coleman Young announced at least 1,500 city workers face layoffs early in 1975 because of a shortage of operating revenues.

Among the major job cuts are those scheduled by the Celanese Corp., Zenith Radio Corp. and Black & Decker Mfg. Co.

Celanese plans to lay off more than 1,400 workers for six weeks beginning Jan. 4 at two of its fiber plants in Georgia and South Carolina. Black & Decker will lay off 7,500 of its 10,000 U.S. employes, including executives, for a week beginning Jan. 13. And Zenith said it will close a color television plant in Pennsylvania indefinitely, putting 600 workers out of jobs.

Increasingly, the "ripple" effect of the factory layoffs is being felt among executive workers. Labor Dept. figures showed 180,000 middle managers out of work in September. Their jobless rate was 2 percent—the highest monthly rate for this group in 14 years.

Executive layoffs were reported in the electronics, construction, retail, banking, advertising, auto, broadcast and appliance industries.

The Conference Board, a leading economic research organization that measures employment trends among its other activities, predicted the national unemployment rate—at 6.5 percent in November—would increase to 7 percent by January.

The board's monthly survey of 52 major newspapers across the country showed a 9 percent drop in the volume of classified help-wanted advertisements in November, the fourth monthly decline in a row.

The December jobless rate was scheduled to be released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on Jan. 3 as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Oil Industry Talks Lag As Pact Deadline Nears

Denver—Negotiations between the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the nation's major oil firms headed toward a contract expiration deadline with little movement by the industry, and indications of a possible walkout.

"No company has made a complete offer and some companies have made no offers at all," OCAW President A. F. Grospiron said. "We have a long way to go in bargaining to reach a settlement without a strike."

The union's 430 contracts with the industry expire on Jan. 7. Negotiations are conducted on a plant-by-plant basis and involve about 60,000 oil workers across the nation.

Grospiron noted counter-offers to the union's proposals have not been of sufficient value to warrant calling a meeting of the OCAW national oil policy bargaining committee. The 12-member committee has the authority to accept or reject any contract offer by an oil company.

Grospiron, as chairman of the committee, is empowered to call a strike to any extent he deems necessary to achieve the union's bargaining goals.

The OCAW is seeking a three-year agreement with hourly pay increases of $1.50 each year. The union also seeks to negotiate its first cost-of-living escalator clause with the industry.

Other goals include a 50-cent-per-hour "catch-up" pay raise to compensate for past living-cost increases, plus improvements in pensions, hospitalization insurance and vacation schedules.

A strike in the oil industry probably would cut refinery production by 30 to 40 percent and result in spot shortages in some parts of the country as current supplies are depleted, Grospiron said.

"We are cognizant of the present energy situation and the public concern," he said. "We will do everything we can to minimize our activities in the public interest consistent with satisfactorily completing our bargaining program."

Noting the refinery labor cost of a gallon of gasoline is only seven-tenths of a cent, Grospiron said the union's bargaining goals could be met without raising prices to the consumer.

Machinists Hit Lockout By McDonnell Douglas

Santa Monica, Calif.—The Machinists charged that the McDonnell Douglas Corp. illegally avoided payment of five days' Christmas holiday leave to some 18,000 workers by shutting down four of its West Coast plants.

The union filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board, in addition to filing grievances under its contracts with the aerospace firm. The denied leave was specified in the union contracts. McDonnell Douglas is the only major company in the aerospace industry with which the union has not reached an agreement in the current round of bargaining.

IAM contracts at the company's plants in southern California expired last Sept. 15, but workers agreed to stay on the job while negotiations on a new contract continued.

The Machinists estimate the holiday lockout cost each of the union's members involved about $228 apiece. The company ordered the lockout the week before Christmas. Plant shutdowns in November cost the same workers two days' Thanksgiving leave pay.

Ivan Lynch, president of IAM District 720 here, said the Christmas lockout was "a true example of this corporation's attitude toward its workers and toward labor relations in general."

Meanwhile, the Machinists reported some progress in negotiations covering about 17,500 McDonnell Douglas employes in St. Louis. The union's contract there expires on Feb. 2.

Architects of Recession

I think we're in a recession now and I think that, unless there's some turn-around, we will certainly be in a depression. I'm not going to predict how far it will go. A depression will bring prices down, that you can be sure of. But, the trouble is that even when prices come down, the people won't have enough money to buy then. We're going to have 8 percent unemployment in my book, maybe even higher.

There doesn't seem to be any move on the part of the government, on the part of the Administration, to turn this around. We have the same people, the same architects of the problem, of the trouble, who are still running the show.

In 1969 in February, we had 3 percent unemployment, we had a 4.3 percent inflation rate and Mr. Nixon and Mr. Arthur Burns decided that that was not good enough, so they were going to take care of things.

So we've had almost six years of this Nixon-Burns policy and Mr. Burns is still running the show. He is the principal adviser to President Ford and everyone around there. It's the same team.

It's their failure because they came out with this tight money, restrictive credit and the things that were going to slow down the economy because it was overheated and things were going to go too fast. And they said they were going to do it without causing more unemployment, but they were going to bring prices down.

Well, they managed to cause a great deal more unemployment and prices keep going up. Now those people are still running the show. And this is one reason that I'm so pessimistic.

The classic inflation is when you have too much money in the hands of the people trying to buy too few products. In other words, you have too small a supply of things to buy and too much money. But this has not been true in this case. This is not the classic inflation. There is not a shortage of goods. People are not breaking their necks trying to buy something that somebody else is going to buy.

We have plenty of things to buy and still the price is going up. I think it's mismanagement of the economy on the part of the Administration.

I'M NOT AN ECONOMIST, and don't pretend to be. I don't think it's fair, for instance, to say to the housewife, "You're complaining about the prices of food in the supermarket. Well, you stop complaining unless you tell us the answer."

The record shows that the Nixon Administration and Dr. Burns are responsible for the dilemma that we are in now, with high prices and mounting unemployment.

WE BELIEVE in freedom of expression, and we believe in workers' freedom. We believe the workers have a right to run their own unions, to make their own contracts and, yes, to make their own mistakes.

We feel that if workers lose their freedom—as they did in Cuba, and in Argentina and Brazil back some years ago—that any place that workers lose their freedom, that's a threat to the maintenance of freedom here in this country.

And we like trade unions and we think we can prove that trade unions have done things for workers. But you can't run a trade union unless you run it in an atmosphere of freedom. And this is why we are so dedicated and spend so much time trying to keep workers in the rest of the world free.

HEW Learns Civil Rights Act Outlaws Reverse Bias, Too

By John P. Roche

ALTHOUGH THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT of 1964 expressly forbade reverse discrimination—that is, giving a bonus to people who are black, female or members of some minority group—for years the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has been enforcing precisely this procedure upon colleges and universities under the euphonious rubric of affirmative action.

College and university administrators are not by nature tigers, and the threat to withhold federal funds has in many cases, I suspect, led them to be more Catholic than the Pope. So there has been a great rush to appoint affirmative action coordinators and a desperate search for scholars from minority backgrounds and women (who constitute, ironically, the majority of the population) to fill available slots.

Indeed, to one like myself who spent his time 25 years ago getting newspapers to eliminate racial designations from their "Help Wanted" sections ("Wanted: white woman for position as clerk"), there has been something slightly sickening about the way institutions of higher education have blatantly announced in connection with jobs, "Preference given to women and minority candidates." As the signs in Boston used to read, "No Irish Need Apply"; and the Jews, who have been hard hit by this because of their strong cultural emphasis on education, have about reached the conclusion that in the eyes of HEW the merit system is a Jewish conspiracy.

To take an example from my own knowledge, a university invited a woman graduate student for an interview. When she attended a departmental lunch she noticed a great sigh of relief. Later in conversation with the chairman she asked what the job specifications were, what she was expected to teach. He smiled and said, "As far as we are concerned, you can teach the politics of astrology—what we want is a woman." He was a poor judge of character: She got up, told him in earthy terms precisely what to do with the job, and hitchhiked back to Boston.

Ever since this nonsense got loose in the land, a number of us—led by indomitable Prof. Sidney Hook—have been on the warpath. We have gathered a catalog of horror stories that make the one described above seem like child's play. The basic fact of life here is that you cannot discriminate in favor of, say, women without discriminating against men. Moreover, while women constitute a national majority, there is an inadequate pool of qualified females or minority members to draw from in most fields. To give the ball another push, the best and brightest women, blacks, Chicanos are snapped up by the top universities. Thus the pool available to other schools with HEW breathing down their backs has already been skimmed of its top talent.

Discrimination must be a key aspect of academic life: I have spent a quarter of a century discriminating between bright and dumb students and, more time than I like to recall, sitting on committees discriminating between talented and untalented faculty—both for hiring and tenure purposes. The only principles that should apply are those of the academy: One tries to choose the best person available. Not because he or she is black, yellow, red or polka dot, but because he or she is the most competent in the judgment of his or her peers. The former considerations are as irrelevant as the candidate's politics, religion or personal charm. (I have voted tenure to individuals I cordially disliked and voted against friends.)

FOR QUITE A WHILE the opponents of reverse discrimination felt like voices crying in the wilderness. The Dept. of HEW seemed above the law, and its affirmative action enforcers, power-drunk, went wandering around the nation threatening administrations that did not present the proper demographic profile.

Then suddenly a distinguished congressman, James O'Hara (D-Mich.), took a hand in the game and held hearings of his Special Education Subcommittee of the House Committee on Education & Labor. Sidney Hook and his colleagues there presented a devastating indictment of HEW, one which left the bureaucracy semi-comatose.

Now somehow the word seems to have gotten around. HEW has just issued a new directive stating that universities and colleges may not discriminate against white males, lower standards to attract women and minorities, advertise specially for women or minorities, or establish minority "slots." Congratulations to Rep. O'Hara for getting HEW to read the Civil Rights Act.

'75 Offers Consumers Hope For 'Readjustment' on Prices

By Sidney Margolius

BATTERED BY A RECORD peacetime inflation of more than 12 percent in the last 12 months, with wages lagging behind, workers in general suffered a loss in real spendable earnings amounting to about 5 percent in 1974 for a family of four. That's a $5 a week cut in real pay.

But 1975 may be a year of readjustment and "catch-up." The cost of living appears to be headed higher, but is unlikely to rise as abruptly as last year. While housing costs are still moving up, some food prices recently have turned down.

This does not mean food will be truly reasonable in 1975. The reductions on some products start from a high level.

On the basis of present price trends, I estimate that average living costs will go up another 6 to 8 percent in 1975 on top of the increase of more than 52 percent since 1967.

It's useful to identify the most persistent cost problems so you know what you have to cope with in 1975, and how some people may be dealing with these expenses.

The four big problems are: (1) continuing high cost of food; (2) a further climb in the already staggering cost of housing and rentals; (3) the wild leap of more than 18 percent in car ownership costs in the last 12 months; (4) the persistent long-term increase in medical costs—up another 12 percent in the past 12 months.

FOOD: Cheaper beef, at least until next summer, will keep your food bills at present levels or even a little below. Meat, poultry and fish usually take 35 percent of your food dollar.

That doesn't mean you can ease up on comparing values or even increase meat use. Selected beef cuts have come down 3 percent this year. But they went up 72 percent since '67.

As well as beef, frozen fish is cheaper. But you can expect to pay more for pork and poultry this year.

The underlying reason for the drop is that producers have been shipping more grass-fed young beef because of high costs of grain feeding. Grass-fed beef is leaner and cheaper and, because more is being shipped at a younger age, is more tender than it usually is. Where it's available in stores, often under such names as "economy" or "thrifty" beef, consumers have been buying it eagerly.

Other big cost cutters recently have been five and six-pound packs of hamburger, offered by some stores as much as 60 percent below usual tags. Soyburger-hamburger with 20-25 percent soy protein is being featured again. Stores usually sell it for 15-20 cents a pound less than regular hamburger, and as little as half the price of so-called ground chuck.

Some staple vegetables, especially potatoes and onions, are cheaper. But the spectacular decline in farm prices of onions, currently reported to be as low as 3 cents a pound, has not been passed on to consumers. Our check in three major cities finds prices 17 to 20 cents a pound, down only 3-4 cents from a year ago.

Several other staples now cost less. Rice and beans have dropped due to big crops. Coffee is cheaper. Sugar is dropping, although tags are still exorbitant. Many sugar-using products are still rising. Some cookies have gone from 33 to 99 cents a pound in less than two years.

Sales of soft drinks already are falling due to the price jump. You now pay at the rate of 65 cents a quart for many soft drinks. In contrast, milk is 40 cents a quart or less in some areas, reconstituted orange juice only 45 cents. You also can reduce sugar use by avoiding presweetened cereals and buying canned fruits in light syrup instead of heavy. The difference usually is about an ounce of sugar, for which you pay a high extra price in any case.

Consumers are shopping more widely to hold down food costs. In 1954, only 59 percent of shoppers visited more than one supermarket in a month, Burgoyne, Inc., a research company, found. By 1963, 75 percent shopped more than one super.

HOUSING: Prices of new houses have gone wild. The median national tag now is $36,900 compared to $28,000 two years ago. Authorities say there's an eight-month supply of unsold dwellings. Tags on older homes have risen substantially, if less dramatically. The median now is tagged $31,870—up 10 percent from a year ago. Moderate-income families have been priced out of even this market. Last year, 54 percent of the used homes sold for under $30,000. Recently, only 46 percent went at those prices.

One helpful event is the recent decline in mortgage interest, although rates still usually are 8-9 percent.

CARS: Consumers are noticeably delaying purchases of new cars. But sales of used cars have boomed. So have their prices—up 24 percent on average in just a year.

The geniuses of Detroit outsmarted themselves by hiking prices an average of about $1,000 in a little over a year, with biggest percentage increases on smaller cars. These typically were raised 15-25 percent while the bigger ones went up 10-15. The result is a big backlog of small models with room for wheeling and dealing in price.

Major Step Toward Goals:

Public Worker Unity Enhanced By New AFL-CIO Department

THE NEWLY-FORMED AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. will help the labor movement bring into sharper focus the unique problems and needs of labor-management relations in government service.

That view was expressed in a network radio interview by the top elected officers of the new department, President William H. McClennan, who is also president of the Fire Fighters, and Sec.-Treas. Clyde Webber, who heads the American Federation of Government Employees.

Twenty-five national and international unions representing more than 2.25 million federal, state and local government workers are now affiliated with the department.

McClennan said their united and coordinated action will be a major step toward both the legislative and collective bargaining goals of the public employe unions and the workers they represent. Predicting more militancy among government workers, he said "the day of second-class citizenship for public employes is over. . . . They now have some strength and power in the labor movement and they are going to use it."

Webber said the AFGE has made it clear that it intends to press hard for removal of the no-strike restriction in the federal service. He said the growing practice of "contracting out" federal work to the private sector points up the "very curious situation" wherein a worker doing a particular job for a private employer under contract to the federal government has the right to strike, but a federal employe doing the same job is denied that right.

Declaring that the department will zero-in on the conditions of state and local government employes as well as federal workers, Webber pointed out that "some states have good laws and good rights, but others are still living in the jungle, like we were back in the 1950s."

Both McClennan and Webber stressed that collective bargaining in the federal service still hinges on the Executive Order issued by President Kennedy in 1962. They expressed hope that the new Congress will adopt legislation to establish a more effective system.

McClennan and Webber appeared on Labor News Conference and were questioned by Joseph Young of the Washington Star-News and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FROM THE VERY BEGINNING organized labor has had its fingers crossed on revenue sharing which formed so prominent a part of ex-President Nixon's "New Federalism."

Many questions were raised when the legislation came before Congress in 1971 and 1972:

- How much oversight would the federal government exercise over the use of the billions of dollars to be handed over to the states and local communities?
- How much danger would there be that the federal funds simply would be used to reduce local and state taxes at the expense of regular, vital services?
- To what extent would federal fair labor standards be observed by the states and local communities in their expenditures?
- How closely would civil rights be observed in such expenditures?
- Would the funds be used for public expenditures to benefit the poor and unemployed or diverted to less urgent public projects?
- And, above all, was there danger that revenue sharing would be used to cripple and even destroy long existing programs of federal aid to the states and communities for specific and urgent national purposes—known as "categorical" programs?

Since those days, the revenue sharing program has been in effect almost three years, operating with a $30 billion trust fund being expended at the rate of $6 billion a year.

How far, for instance, have the states and localities been willing to accept federal labor standards? They have just given their answer and it is highly discouraging. The National League of Cities and the National Governors Conference plus a number of cities and local jurisdictions have just filed suit in federal court protesting the constitutionality of recent amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that place their employes under federal labor standards. They are particularly protesting the overtime provisions of the act which, they claim, will cost them huge sums.

Yet, the figures themselves show to what extent firemen, policemen and other public service workers, such as snow removal workers, have been exploited through unpaid overtime.

A RECENT REPORT on the program, published by the National Clearinghouse on Revenue Sharing, discusses a number of the questions as to how well revenue sharing is working thus far.

The report, sponsored by the League of Women Voters Education Fund, the National Urban Coalition, the Center for Community Change and the Center for National Policy Review, is worth studying.

Among other things, it finds:

- That absent federal monitoring, oversight of the use of revenue sharing funds by the local citizenry "is not—and cannot" be effective under the program as presently set up.
- That "discrimination" in the use of the funds at the local level "is evident."
- That the use of federal funds to reduce local tax burdens rather than to improve services is growing.
- That use of the funds for social services "is minor" and that federal "categorical" program cuts are beginning to "hurt."

It is this latter development, feared by organized labor when the program was first proposed, that is most disturbing.

At its 1973 convention the AFL-CIO adopted a resolution that accepted general revenue sharing as "a valuable supplement to the revenue sources of state and local jurisdictions," but strongly opposed using it as a "substitute" for federal categorical programs.

"General revenue sharing cannot be used as an excuse to abdicate federal responsibility in dealing with problems of national concern," the resolution said.

Economic Crisis Dominant Issue in '74

By John R. Oravec

Inflation continued unabated throughout 1974 even as the economy sank deeper into recession. Workers saw their paychecks shrink as price increases far outdistanced their wage gains. For many, economic problems were magnified by the loss of their jobs as the unemployment rate exploded from 4.9 percent to 6.5 percent over the year. Nearly 6 million Americans were out of work at year-end.

With bank prime interest and home mortgage rates reaching record highs, the housing industry was thrown into a depression. The jobless rate among building trades craftsmen in some areas topped 30 percent. Mass layoffs were felt particularly in the auto industry, and their rippling effects caused setbacks in other industrial sectors. Although many corporations continued to roll up record profits throughout most of 1974, by year-end most of the nation's economic indicators pointed down.

The nation also experienced the first resignation of a President as Richard M. Nixon was driven from office by the Watergate scandal. Nixon denied any involvement in the coverup almost to the very end. Even after admitting to it, he was pardoned by his successor, Gerald R. Ford.

January

The year began on a grim note as far as the economy was concerned. Government statistics pointed to a widening recession and a worsening inflation. The gasoline shortage began to take its toll in jobs as the unemployment rate began a steady climb. Wholesale prices were up 2.2 percent in one month, a preview of sharp increases in consumer prices to follow in later months. President Nixon dug in deeper in his legal battle with the Senate Watergate Committee and refused to release subpoenaed tapes and documents. The Senate also opened an investigation into excessive oil company profits which continued to increase as the fuel shortage grew more critical.

People: Andrew Lewis, president of the Maryland-District of Columbia AFL-CIO, died. George J. Oneto was named president of the Distillery Workers to succeed the late Mort Brandenburg. Alexander J. Rohan resigned as president of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

February

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called for the impeachment of President Nixon, declaring that this was the only way the American people could get the truth about Watergate and related scandals. Organized labor also urged Congress to reclaim its constitutional power that had been surrendered to the White House and to take the initiative in developing programs to meet the nation's needs. Nixon declared in his State of the Union message that "there will be no recession," although government reports showed the job toll from the energy crisis continuing to mount and industrial output falling further. The Steelworkers and Aluminum Workers reached an historic settlement with the aluminum industry that included a cost-of-living escalator on pension benefits. A similar three-year contract was won by the USWA in the can industry. Organized labor began to mobilize its COPE operations in the drive to elect a progressive and responsive Congress in November.

People: Charles D. Aquadro retired as president of the Roofers and was succeeded by Sec.-Treas. Roy Johnson. Madeline Matchko was named New England COPE director.

March

The Clothing Workers won a long struggle for union recognition at Farah Manufacturing Co., ending a 21-month strike and boycott that had the full support of the labor movement. Government statistics showed corporate profits for 1973 averaged 27 percent higher than the year before, led by the paper, steel, aerospace and oil industries. AFL-CIO President George Meany urged Congress to allow the Economic Stabilization Act to expire Apr. 30, stressing that the Nixon Administration should not be trusted with further power over the economy because of its record of failures with freezes and phases. Congress approved minimum wage legislation that would raise the wage floor from $1.60 an hour to $2.30 and expand coverage to 7 million additional workers. The Cigar Makers merged with the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, concluding a memorable chapter in American labor history.

People: Alan Kistler was named director and Donald Slaiman deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. William E. Pollard was appointed the federation's civil rights director. Harry A. Tulley became president of the Glass Bottle Blowers, succeeding the late Newton W. Black, and Carl Scarbrough was elected president of the Furniture Workers to succeed the late Fred Fulford.

April

Consumer prices surged 1.1 percent in one month and the real spendable earnings of an average worker dropped 4.7 percent below the previous year. While prices were soaring at an annual rate of 14.5 percent during the first quarter, the nation's real gross national product dropped sharply. The decline at an annual rate of 5.8 percent in the three-month period was the steepest since the 1958 recession. The Steelworkers, employing an experimental negotiating agreement in contract talks with the basic steel industry, reached a settlement three months before the expiration of their old contracts. A nationwide consumer boycott of table grapes and head lettuce won the full endorsement of the AFL-CIO in the Farm Workers' struggle against balky growers and raiding Teamsters. "Errors" in President Nixon's federal income tax returns showed that he owed the government nearly a half-million dollars. Although making $200,000 a year, Nixon made tax payments for two years equivalent to what a worker earning less than $10,000 a year would pay.

People: John F. Griner, an AFL-CIO vice president and former president of the Government Employees, died. Walter F. Diehl succeeded Richard F. Walsh as president of the Theatrical Stage Employes, and Sol Fishko was installed as president of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

May

Economic controls expired May 1 as Congress refused to extend additional authority to the President. Under three years of phases and freezes, only wages were kept in check while prices and profits soared, organized labor pointed out. Corporate earnings reports showed after-tax profits in the first quarter averaged 24 percent above the 1973 quarter, with profits for the oil industry up 72 percent. Leading the profits parade were such companies as Standard Oil of California, up 92 percent; Shell, up 52 percent; Gulf, up 76 percent; Occidental, up 746 percent, and Commonwealth, up 450 percent. The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on Congress to plug tax loopholes for the wealthy and to impose an excess profits tax on corporations. The council also accused Nixon of bringing "unprecedented shame and disgrace on the presidency" for his role in the Watergate coverup. The Labor Dept. abandoned a proposal to scrap the city worker consumer price index in favor of an expanded index to cover other occupational groups.

People: Robert A. Georgine was named to succeed Frank Bonadio as president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey received labor's top honor, the AFL-CIO Murrary-Green Award. Joe Morris was elected president of the Canadian Labor Congress, succeeding Donald MacDonald, who retired. William F. Smith of the Machinists was elected president of the Colorado AFL-CIO. Joseph W. Powell succeeded the late Miles C. Stanley as president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO.

June

With consumer prices soaring at an annual clip of more than 12 percent, Meany said that unions must seek larger wage increases and cost-of-living protection for workers. Government statistics showed the average urban family needed an income of about 10 percent more in autumn of 1973 than the year before to maintain a moderate standard of living. A 10-day strike by the Clothing Workers won a new three-year contract in the men's and boy's garment industry providing wage increases of $1 an hour. The Bakery & Confectionery Workers ratified a pattern two-year agreement that included wage hikes of 70 cents an hour. The House and Senate upheld the right of strikers to obtain food stamps for their families. Fighting to avoid impeachment, Nixon continued to combine defiance with delaying tactics by refusing to turn over tapes and documents to the House Judiciary Committee investigating the Watergate scandal.

People: Jay Lovestone, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, retired. Ernest S. Lee was appointed department director. Henry B. Schechter was named to succeed John E. Evans as director of the federation's Dept. of Urban Affairs. Anton J. Trizna succeeded Draper Doyal as president of the Molders.

July

Congress voted final approval to legislation giving 1.7 million workers in nonprofit hospitals and nursing homes coverage under the federal labor law. Meany charged that Nixon's policy of detente with the Soviet Union was little more than a giveaway of American resources and technology. The Senate Watergate Committee uncovered evidence revealing a scheme to raise campaign contributions for the re-election of Nixon by delaying job safety standards. High interest rates on mortgages were blamed for pricing most Americans out of the housing market. The House Judiciary Committee voted three articles of impeachment, charging Nixon with obstruction of justice, abuse of power and defiance of subpoenas.

People: Glenn E. Watts was elected president of the Communications Workers after Joseph A. Beirne stepped down because of illness. Sandy A. Bevis was installed as president of the Typographical Union to succeed John J. Pilch, who retired. George E. Pierson was elected president of the Stove Workers to replace retiring James M. Roberts. Louis Isaacson, president of the Doll & Toy Workers, died.

August

Richard Milhous Nixon resigned as the President of the United States Aug. 9, three days after admitting "a serious omission" in his previous accounts of the Watergate coverup. Nixon became the first President in U.S. history to resign. Vice President Gerald R. Ford was sworn in as the nation's 38th President and was quickly assured the cooperation of the AFL-CIO by President Meany. Wholesale prices exploded with a 3.7 percent increase in one month while corporate profits in the second quarter were running better than 25 percent above the year-ago period. Workers' purchasing power slipped 5.3 percent over the year with the continuing rise in consumer prices. The federation's Executive Council declared that the Nixon Administration's economic bungling had created the worst of conditions for American workers and that they would need larger wage increase in the battle against inflation. Congress enacted a pension reform bill that was hailed by organized labor as a legislative landmark. The Textile Workers Union of America won its first representation election at J.P. Stevens & Co. after a 10-year struggle.

People: A. Philip Randolph retired from the Executive Council. President C. L. Dellums of the Sleeping Car Porters and President Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers were elected to the council.

Deaths: William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to the president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., and William J. Cour, chairman of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board.

September

President Ford granted Nixon a full pardon for all federal crimes the former President "committed or may have committed" during his White House term. Ford also gave Nixon title to all presidential papers and tapes, but this action was later rescinded by congressional legislation. Consumers found retail prices climbing 1.3 percent in a single month, the largest one-month rise in a year. The unemployment rate in the nation's poverty areas averaged 6.5 percent—a preview of what the country would be facing overall. Congress handed Ford his first major legislative defeat in refusing to delay a 5.5 percent wage increase for federal workers. In meetings at the White House, leaders of organized labor called on Ford to abandon economic policies of the previous Administration and pledged to cooperate in any future equitable programs.

People: Joseph A. Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice president and former president of the Communications Workers, died. Irving K. Fagan, a veteran labor editor, also died.

October

Organized labor outlined a five-point program at the economic summit conference designed to curb inflation and growing unemployment, stressing that White House policies of the past five and one-half years had failed to correct the nation's economic problems. A package of 31 proposals issued later by President Ford would do nothing to prevent more unemployment or a depression, Meany declared. He called for the election of a Congress that would pull the nation out of its economic tailspin. Consumer prices continued to surge upward, climbing 1.2 percent in one month and further eroding workers' purchasing power. The unemployment rate hit a two and one-half year high of 5.8 percent. Congress overrode Ford's veto of a railroad retirement bill by one-sided margins and passed campaign reform legislation curtailing the influence of big contributors. The Labor Dept. issued a new federal health standard sharply limiting worker exposure to vinyl chloride, a cancer-causing chemical.

People: John Rowland was named secretary-treasurer of the Amalgamated Transit Union to succeed retiring James J. Hill effective Jan. 1.

Deaths: Paul R. Hutchings, research director of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and Henry Zon, a writer and publicist formerly with COPE.

November

Democrats made major gains in elections across the nation as voters turned their backs on policies of the Republican Administration. With a pickup of more than 40 seats the Democrats gained a majority in the House of better than 2 to 1. They also were assured of at least 61 seats in the Senate, even with the New Hampshire election still in question at year-end. In the governors' elections, Democrats added four more seats for a total of 36, in addition to winning control of state legislatures in a number of Republican strongholds. But the economic news continued to be dismal as the nation's unemployment rate climbed to 6 percent and the wholesale price index jumped 2.3 percent in one month. The AFL-CIO warned that the economy was dangerously close to disaster. A Public Employee Dept. within the AFL-CIO was formed by 24 unions representing more than 2 million workers.

People: President Glenn E. Watts of the Communications Workers was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council. William H. McClennan was elected president of the Public Employee Dept. and Clyde M. Weber was elected secretary-treasurer.

December

The year ended as it had started—with climbing unemployment and double-digit inflation. The nation's jobless rate jumped to 6.5 percent, the highest level since October 1961. Consumer prices were running 12 percent higher than the year before, wiping out wage gains to the point that real spendable earnings were down 6.2 percent over the year. Congress responded to the bleak unemployment situation by approving a package of labor-backed emergency legislation to provide public service jobs, additional unemployment insurance and nearly $5 billion in appropriations to finance the programs. But Congress also ignored the warnings of labor in passing the Administration's foreign trade bill that is expected to increase imports at the cost of American jobs. Nelson Rockefeller was sworn in as the 41st Vice President following lengthy confirmation hearings in the Senate and House.

People: Julius F. Rothman, president of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, died. Former Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir paid a visit to President Meany. Norman Hill was named executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute to succeed Bayard Rustin, who became president of the organization.

Inflation Impact Argued:

Ford's Pocket Vetoes Kill Oil Cargo, Strip-Mine Bills

legislative goal of maritime unions, would have broken a virtual foreign-flag monopoly on oil shipped to the United States.

It would have required that at least 20 percent of oil imported by major U.S. refineries be carried in vessels built and registered in this country and staffed by American crews. The ratio would have risen to 30 percent in 1977.

It would have generated an estimated 10,000 jobs in U.S. shipyards and at sea, but the President contended that the legislation would have "an adverse impact on the United States economy and on our foreign relations."

Although a number of other nations have even stronger requirements governing the use of ships flying their own flags, Ford's memorandum of disapproval expressed concern that "the bill would serve as a precedent for other countries to increase protection of their industries" and would be "directly contrary to the objectives of the trade bill which the Congress has just passed."

Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., termed the veto a victory for "Exxon and its satellite foreign-flag operators." He said the campaign for the legislation will be resumed in the new Congress that convenes Jan. 14.

"The arguments that persuaded Congress that the bill was in the country's best interest are still valid," Hall said. The bill that was vetoed was "good for American workers and American consumers."

A statement by Marine Engineers President Jesse M. Calhoon expressed shock and disappointment at Ford's veto of a bill that "would truly have served the national interest and the national security."

The veto served the interests of the oil cartel, he said. And as for Ford's claim that the bill would have been inflationary, Calhoon contended that if it had become law, "the oil companies would have lost profitable tax loopholes derived from foreign tax credits, and the American consumer would have received benefits through potentially lower prices for his gasoline."

The President also used the inflation argument in vetoing the bill requiring mine operators to restore land to its original contours after completing surface mining. The President said the effect would be to reduce the supply of coal and push up prices.

Other bills passed in the final days of the 93rd Congress proved less controversial and were signed into law. These included:

- An emergency public service employment program, along with funds to get it started.
- An improved program of extended unemployment benefits for those who have exhausted their state entitlement during periods of high unemployment such as the nation is now undergoing, plus federally-funded unemployment insurance for millions of persons in jobs not covered by state laws.
- Continuation of anti-poverty programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity for three additional years, even though the OEO itself may go out of existence after Mar. 15. At that time, the President is authorized to submit a reorganization plan shifting an assortment of OEO programs to a separate Community Services Administration within the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- A consumer product warranty bill that would set up federal standards for two types of warranties offered by manufacturers—a "full" warranty that would assure that consumers received either a replacement or a refund if a manufacturer could not remedy a deficit, or a clearly labeled "limited" warranty that clearly indicates the restrictions. The Federal Trade Commission was empowered to set regulations governing warranties.
- A foreign aid bill that authorized up to $2.7 billion in economic and military aid, somewhat less than the Administration had asked for this fiscal year.
- Stiffer penalties for price-fixing and other violations of the antitrust laws. The maximum fine is raised from $50,000 to $1 million for a corporation and to $100,000 for individuals, and the maximum prison term is increased from one year to three years.

The way to adjournment of the 93rd Congress was cleared when the House voted 287-128 to confirm the nomination of Nelson A. Rockefeller as the 41st Vice President of the United States. The Senate earlier had approved the nomination by a 90-7 vote.

Rockefeller was the second person to take office under the provisions of the 25th Amendment to the Constitution, which deal with a vacancy in the vice presidency. The nomination is made by the President, subject to confirmation by majority vote of both the House and Senate.

Ford was the first person chosen under that procedure, after Spiro Agnew resigned. Ford's succession to the presidency again left the office open.

Labor Studies Center Lists January Schedule

A six-day institute on collective bargaining techniques will highlight a busy January at the new 47-acre campus of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, Silver Spring, Md.

The institute is conducted for union staff representatives who will study management tactics at the bargaining table, the role of mediation in dispute settlements and engage in mock bargaining sessions. Through the use of videotape, the participants will be able to see themselves in action.

In addition, the center will be host to two groups of building trades representatives, the Steelworkers Education Committee, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing & Field Services and the Association of Flight Attendants for conferences and special courses presented with the assistance of the center's staff.

Here is the January schedule:

Collective Bargaining Techniques—An institute to help full-time union staff representatives sharpen their negotiating skills, understand management strategy and prepare for bargaining sessions. New bargaining developments will be reviewed and contract clauses analyzed. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 5, through Friday, Jan. 10.

Safety Training—A program to help building and construction trades union officers understand the impact of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, state safety programs and the Construction Hazard Control process. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 5, through Friday, Jan. 17. The program will be repeated beginning at 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 19, through Friday, Jan. 31.

Organizing Conference—Regional Directors of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing & Field Services will meet to review progress since the reorganization from Saturday, Jan. 11, through Tuesday, Jan. 14.

Flight Attendants—An institute for local officers of the Association of Flight Attendants, affiliated with the Air Line Pilots, to review the union's policies and procedures and the duties of local officers with special emphasis on grievance processing. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Jan. 19, through Friday, Jan. 24.

Flight Attendants—A training session for five negotiating teams to prepare them for forthcoming negotiations with five major airlines. They will discuss contract goals, the economics of the industry and the so-called Mutual Aid Pact maintained by the airlines as strike insurance for management. From 9 a.m., Wednesday, Jan. 15, through Friday, Jan. 17.

Steelworkers—Education Committee of the Steelworkers will meet at the Center from 6 p.m. Wednesday, Jan. 29, through Thursday, Jan. 30.

One off-campus institute is scheduled for January. A five-day session for building trades business agents will start at 9 a.m. Monday, Jan. 20, and continue through Friday, Jan. 24, at the University of California, Berkeley.

Discussion topics include labor law, occupational safety and health, the new pension reform law, open shop and "double-breasted" contractors, leadership and communication skills and contract economics.

Further information about these and other Labor Studies programs can be obtained by writing Executive Director Fred Hoehler, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

FIRST RECIPIENT of the John Augustus Award, sponsored by the National Council on Crime & Delinquency, is AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis. Elliot L. Richardson, right, former attorney general, makes the presentation at a reception in New York. Augustus, a member of the Bootmakers & Cordwainers union, initiated the prisoner probation movement in the United States in the 1840s.

Labor Dept. Proposes Multi-Employer Rules

The Labor Dept. has proposed several regulations covering multi-employer pension plans under the new pension reform law.

The proposed rules would regulate reports on the description of pension plans, define multi-employers, postpone reporting and disclosure rules for some plans and exempt some welfare plans from reporting requirements.

Drafted by the Labor Dept.'s Office of Employee Benefits Security, the proposed rules would:

- Require that a "substantial business purpose" be shown to secure permission to establish a multi-employer pension or welfare plan.
- Require pension and welfare plans operated on a non-calendar year basis to submit annual reports 210 days after the end of the plan year, beginning Jan. 1.
- Exempt unfunded welfare plans—in addition to plans funded exclusively through insurance contracts—with fewer than 100 participants from reporting and disclosure requirements. However, each participant and beneficiary must be provided a summary description of the plan.
- Allow pension plans subject to reporting and disclosure requirements to use plan descriptions filed with the Labor Dept. as summary plan descriptions. But the descriptions must meet the standards of clarity, completeness and ease of understanding as prescribed in the law.
- Require plans in existence on Jan. 1, 1975, to file descriptions on Labor Dept. forms by Apr. 30. Plans established after Jan. 1 would have to file a description within 120 days.

The pension reform legislation—the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974—covers about 35 million persons under existing private benefit plans. The law will also cover plans established in the future.

An estimated 1.8 million pension and welfare plans are now in operation in the United States.

The law provides for fiduciary standards, reporting and disclosure requirements, vesting rules, and plan termination insurance from a government corporation.

Senate Slates Hearing On Close N.H. Race

Republican Louis C. Wyman was sworn in as a senator from New Hampshire—but only for three days. It will be up to the Senate itself to determine whether he or Democrat John Durkin will be seated when the 94th Congress convenes Jan. 14.

Wyman was appointed by New Hampshire's Republican governor to the three days remaining in the term of Norris Cotton, who resigned effective New Year's Eve to take advantage of higher pension benefits.

Meanwhile, the Senate's Subcommittee on Elections is preparing to consider the rival claims of Wyman and Durkin in the closest election in the Senate's history.

Wyman had initially been announced as the winner, but an official recount resulted in a 10-vote victory for Durkin. New Hampshire's Secretary of State, a Republican, formally certified him as the winner and so notified the Senate.

But the state's Republican-controlled Ballot Law Commission, after reviewing several hundred contested ballots, declared Wyman the winner by a two-vote margin. Gov. Meldrim Thomson then certified his name to the Senate.

In appointing Wyman to the Cotton vacancy, Thomson initially designated him to serve until he was seated as "senator-elect from the state of New Hampshire." But the Secretary of the Senate refused to accept such wording and the appointment was reworded in accordance with custom.

IATSE Names Chadwick Secretary-Treasurer

Rockford, Ill.—Harold F. Chadwick was elected secretary-treasurer of the Theatrical Stage Employes by the union's executive board at its meeting here.

Chadwick, a member of Local H-63 in New York, has been a vice president of the IATSE since 1966 and a union member since 1941. His term as secretary-treasurer runs until the union's 1976 convention.

Goldfinger to IRRA:

Economists Flunk On Public Issues

—with its overwhelming emphasis on aggregate numbers derived from theoretical formula-bound computer responses, rather than observation, analysis and judgment—that has failed to provide the policymakers and the public with anything that approaches adequate analysis, critique and workable remedies."

He noted that leading economists were predicting a huge wave of strikes and a massive wage explosion with the end of controls, neither of which came to pass. And most of "the liberal group of the economics establishment" were calling loudly for an incomes policy, which Goldfinger defined as "a euphemism for one-sided wage controls." But, he said, they had no proposals to effectively control food or energy prices, or such non-wage costs as interest rates and profits.

Goldfinger said academic economists can regain lost prestige by using mathematical skills as tools, not dogma, by discarding sweeping judgments and by putting greater emphasis on the needs of people, on observation and on issues of equity and income distribution.

It was not wages or excessive demand that set off the sharp inflationary spiral, Goldfinger observed, and the government's restrictive policies thus added to inflation instead of dampening it. "Soaring interest rates were directly adding to costs and prices," he said.

The vast sale of wheat to Soviet Russia, a government policy of encouraging increased exports of raw materials in short supply, profiteering by speculators and the energy crisis as a topper all brought about the recession-inflation combination that the labor movement clearly identified months before economists and the government admitted its existence.

Goldfinger said that by contrast the supposedly unscientific nature of collective bargaining has continued to prove its value.

"With its lack of neatness, disregard for perfection and contempt for preconceived textbook formulas," he said, "collective bargaining has continued to reveal its inherent vitality as a dynamic system of problem-solving between the differing interests of labor and management."

Its day-to-day work on the shop floor, he noted, "is performed by tens of thousands of business agents, stewards, committeemen, international union representatives, foremen, superintendents and plant managers—the unsung foot-soldiers who each day and each week work out pragmatic, rather than ideological or even neat solutions, to difficult problems."

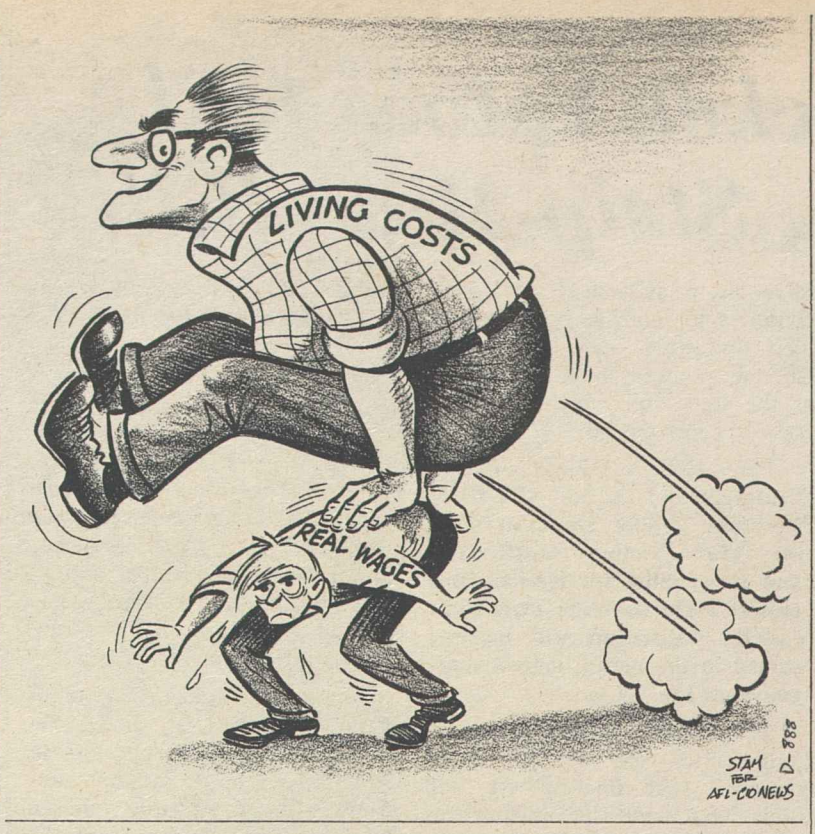
Goldfinger warned, however, that the bargaining process is being strained to the limit by the malfunctioning of the economy. When workers and management are both squeezed, the issues on the bargaining table are harder to resolve, he noted.

Great Lakes Dock Accord Covers 12,000

Buffalo, N.Y.—A tentative agreement has been reached on a new three-year contract covering about 12,000 members of the Longshoremen employed at a dozen Great Lakes ports.

The pact—the first master agreement ever negotiated for Great Lakes longshoremen—is now in the process of ratification by members of the 15 local unions involved in the bargaining. Balloting is scheduled to be completed by Jan. 15.

Patrick J. Sullivan, ILA Great Lakes District secretary-treasurer, said the agreement would raise wages by $1.90 an hour and fringe benefits by 82 cents an hour over the life of the contract. The effective date would be Jan. 1.



Moves by Soviet Bloc Cited as Threat to ILO

San Francisco—America's worker delegate to the International Labor Organization, Bert Seidman, warned that the ILO's continued existence is endangered by a takeover bid of Communist nations and their allies.

Seidman, who is also the AFL-CIO social security director, praised the ILO's contribution to the development of international labor standards that have bettered the conditions of workers throughout the world and have encouraged protective legislation in advanced western nations as well as in the underdeveloped countries.

But he is "not optimistic" about the ILO's future because, Seidman said, too few worker, employer and government representatives from free nations are willing to stand up to "the onslaught of the Communist, Arab and other non-democratic groups."

Seidman addressed the annual meeting of the Industrial Relations Research Association in a program devoted to an assessment of the ILO. The U.S. employer delegate, Charles H. Smith, Jr., board chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, also took part in the program. The session was arranged by the IRRA's outgoing president and program chairman, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

Seidman said the death of the ILO would be "a great tragedy" because of its past accomplishments and potential for continued usefulness. "But I do not see how the U.S. could continue in the ILO if it should be completely turned against its fundamental principles of human dignity and social justice."

He charged the ILO with "a lamentable double standard in its efforts to safeguard human rights," closing its eyes to violations in the Communist world.

Increasingly, Seidman noted, ILO sessions have become "forums for virulent political attacks on the United States, Israel and whatever other countries were fashionable 'enemies of progressive forces.'"

While most of the time of the ILO staff is still devoted to "useful and worthwhile" technical activities, Seidman expressed concern that those programs, too, will be "twisted" to political ends.

He told the gathering that he "cannot imagine that the AFL-CIO would continue to support or even participate in the ILO under such circumstances. And I doubt that the U.S. Congress would continue to finance 25 percent of the ILO's budget."

Real Earnings Drop Sharply As CPI Soars

Instead of declining as they usually do in November, prices of food purchased in grocery stores increased by 1.1 percent over the month. Prices were higher for nearly everything but beef, fresh fruits and eggs. Sugar prices led the parade.

"Prices for sugar and products for which sugar is an important ingredient continued to rise rapidly and accounted for a substantial part of the November increase in food prices," BLS said.

Pork and poultry prices increased more than they usually do in November while beef prices declined seasonally. Steep price rises also were recorded for fresh vegetables, cereals and bakery products, dairy products and most other types of food.

Higher prices for apparel accounted for about one-fourth of the nonfood commodities index. Rapid price increases were posted for housekeeping supplies, tobacco, floor coverings, appliances, houses and fuel oil.

Prices also rose for furniture, toilet goods, alcoholic beverages, reading materials and used cars, BLS noted. Gasoline prices, while declining for the fourth month in a row, were still 26 percent above year-earlier levels.

Over 60 percent of the increase in the services index was due to higher charges for all types of household services, including rent, BLS said.

General Board Meeting Slated On Economy

a disaster area; other segments of the economy are collapsing.

- "Inflation continues to undermine the living standards of all."

Meany and Kirkland stressed that "we in the AFL-CIO have a duty to our members and to the nation to develop, work for and fight for programs that will end these hard times and restore the prosperity destroyed by governmental policies begun in 1969 and continuing today."

The meeting, which will be open to the press, will be held at the Statler-Hilton Hotel. While the size of the group has been enlarged to allow greater participation, only the members of the General Board will have a vote.

Supreme Court Rejects Challenge To Constitutionality of Union Shop

union shop clause. But the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned that ruling, declaring that the press and broadcasting industry aren't exempt from valid laws serving public interests.

The appellate court said that to require unions to tolerate free riders "would result not only in flagrant inequity, but might eventually seriously undermine the union's ability to perform its bargaining function."

In dealing with other specifics of the Buckley-Evans case, the court said the issues involved unfair labor practice charges that should be dealt with through the National Labor Relations Board, not the courts.

A special attorney for AFTRA when the case was before the Court of Appeals was the late Alexander M. Bickel, the noted Yale University law professor and constitutional scholar.

In another area, the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and said an employer does not normally have to bargain with a union that has obtained authorization cards from a majority of workers but has not petitioned for a representation election.

The 5-4 decision said that an employer's obligation to bargain without an election applied only when the employer had committed unfair labor practices that threatened to destroy the union's majority.

Justice Douglas spoke for the majority in this case, which stemmed from a Teamsters dispute with a lumber company. He rejected the contention that it is up to the employer to petition for an election if he is unwilling to accept signed authorization cards as evidence of the union's majority.

The dissent, written by Justice Potter Stewart, chastised the National Labor Relations Board for ignoring the clear intent of Congress that a union can establish its majority and require an employer to bargain "by means other than petitioning for and winning a board-supervised election."

Joining Stewart in his dissent were Justices Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall and Lewis F. Powell, Jr.

Metal Trades Rebuff Raid at Norfolk Base

Norfolk, Va. — Workers at the Naval Public Works Center here voted by a 2-1 margin to retain the AFL-CIO Federal Employees Metal Trades Council as bargaining representative. The unaffiliated National Association of Government Employees had sought to take over the unit of 1,500 blue-collar workers.

'Runaway' TV Series Hit As Affront to Bicentennial

The United States did, after all, win its independence from Britain. And U.S. entertainment unions don't think that a television series keyed to the nation's bicentennial should be made abroad.

Thus, the California State AFL-CIO Executive Board and the New York local of the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists passed resolutions protesting a plan by the ABC television network to have a series based on Gore Vidal's novel, "Burr," filmed in England and Ireland.

"We condemn the hypocrisy of going abroad to produce programs commemorating the 200th anniversary of American independence," the AFTRA meeting declared.

In Boston, a coalition of film unions symbolically dumped cans of film in the harbor. And Chester L. Migden, executive secretary of the Screen Actors Guild, said labor's protests have had an impact. Migden returned from a meeting in London arranged through the International Federation of Actors with assurances that there will definitely be a "reconsideration" of the initial decision to produce the films abroad.

New Jobless Claims Set Record High

Total For One Week Is 813,600

The full dimensions of the nation's deepening recession emerged more clearly than ever in fresh government statistics showing a record number of Americans applying for unemployment insurance benefits.

For the week ended Dec. 28, a total of 813,600 initial claims for benefits were handled by employment security offices throughout the country, the Labor Dept. reported. That was the highest number of new claims filed in one week since the unemployment insurance program got under way in 1937.

The previous record was 693,000 during the week ended last Dec. 7.

The surge in new claims mirrored further layoffs in the auto, metals, clothing and electric equipment industries. Thirty states reported higher volumes, with New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island leading the list.

A year earlier 461,400 initial claims were filed during the same week.

The number of persons actually drawing unemployment insurance benefits during the week ended Dec. 21 was 3,253,300, the Labor Dept. said. A year earlier, the figure was 1,871,600.

Meanwhile, Alan Greenspan, chairman of President Ford's Council of Economic Advisers, predicted the nation's jobless rate this year would come close to 8 percent. The rate hit 7.1 percent in December, the highest since May 1961.

Appearing before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Greenspan said the current recession could last longer and run deeper than anticipated. He gave this pessimistic testimony:

"The economic outlook for 1975 is neither pleasant nor reassuring to those who hope for a sudden correction of our problems."

Many labor market areas already are experiencing joblessness reminiscent of the 1930s when the U.S. was in the throes of the Great Depression.

Sharp cutbacks in auto production lifted the jobless rate for the metropolitan Detroit area to 12.4 percent in December. Other areas, particularly where construction is a big prop of the economy, have posted rates of 15 percent or more.

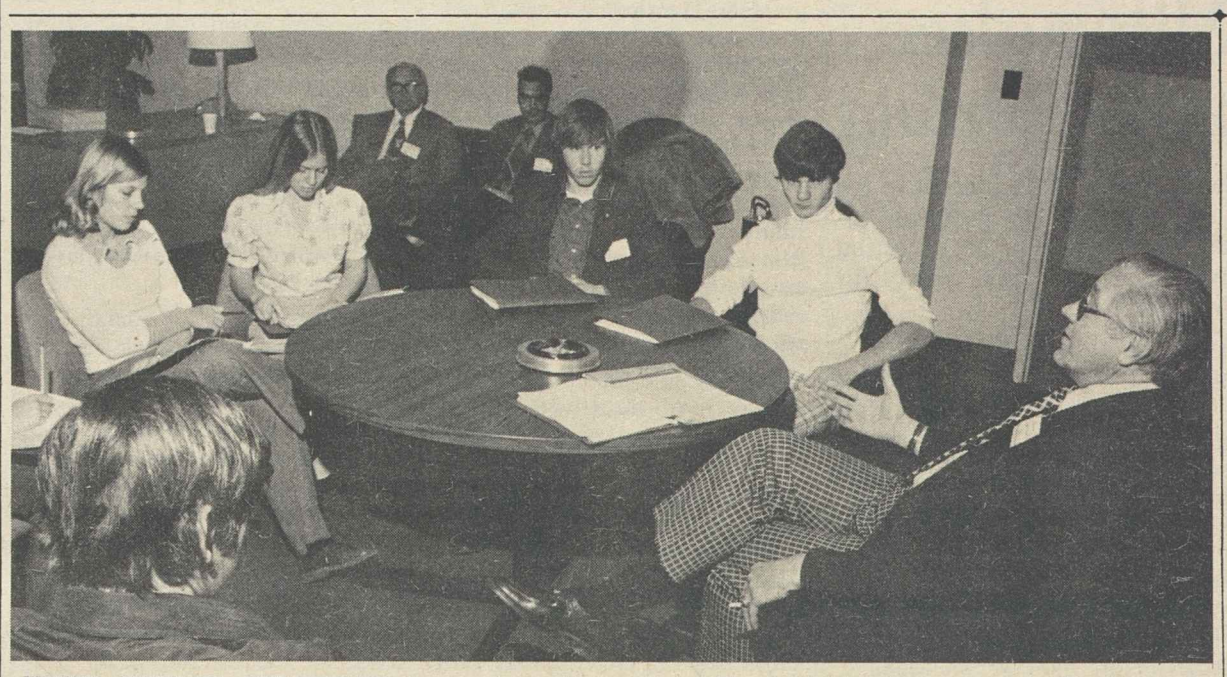
Meany Urges Action Now To Put America to Work



HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS learn about the real world of labor relations at the Institute of Industrial Relations sponsored annually by the Milwaukee County Labor Council and the School for Workers of the University of Wisconsin. Says Nation Is Facing Emergency

By James M. Shevis

Action must be taken at once to put America back to work or the current recession will turn into a depression, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the nation's jobless rate jumped to 7.1 percent in December with more than 6.5 million persons looking for work and unable to find it.

"These figures prove conclusively that economic public enemy no. 1 is recession," Meany declared. "This is an economic emergency for America."

Meany called upon President Ford to implement immediately three long-standing recommendations of the AFL-CIO to stop the sliding economy. Ford is expected to unveil his economic proposals later this month in an annual State of the Union address to Congress, but Meany urged him to take steps before then.

"Six and a half million jobless Americans should not have to wait that long for action," he said.

Last month's unemployment rate was the highest since it was matched in May 1961. The last time the rate exceeded 7.1 percent was in August 1958, when it reached 7.4 percent.

The number of persons who wanted jobs but could not find them in December—6,535,000—was the highest since 1940 when the nation was emerging from the

For New Congress:

Jobs, Health, Taxes Top Labor Agenda

Labor looks to the new 94th Congress for "real job-creating legislation" as well as action on health security bills and "substantial" tax reform.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in a radio interview that a gain of about 40 liberal seats in the House makes all of these goals attainable. And the House changes are reflected also in an enlarged Ways & Means Committee that will no longer be the "burying ground" for much of labor's legislative program.

The liberal tilt of Congress will be partly offset by a White House that has difficulty providing leadership and initiatives, Biemiller cautioned.

Past experience shows, he suggested, that Congress tends to legislate by accepting, rejecting or modifying proposals made by the President. Thus the record of the 94th Congress is not likely to match the accomplishments of the equally liberal 89th Congress that was elected in 1964 with Lyndon Johnson.

While the Ford Administration has now accepted, "fully and completely," the concept of public service employment when joblessness is high, Biemiller stressed the need to create permanent jobs and take steps to pull the economy out of recession.

As an immediate step, he urged, funds already approved by Congress should be released for housing and other public construction.

The $9 billion appropriated but not spent for building sewage disposal plants, Biemiller said, would both create jobs and provide needed facilities. He said that is "the kind of thing" Congress must give attention to as a spur to the economy.

No Agreement Reached on Oil Contracts

Denver—Hopes for a settlement between the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the nation's major oil producers dimmed as the industry failed to come up with an acceptable counter-offer to the union's demands.

"So far, the few offers we've received have all been the same old stuff and the national oil bargaining policy committee has rejected all of them," OCAW President A. F. Grospiron said.

The union's 430 local contracts with the oil companies expired at midnight Jan. 7, but Grospiron extended negotiations by the hour

Kirkland Asks Policy Of Oil Self-Sufficiency

The United States should begin to cut back sharply on its oil imports, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said during a nationally televised interview.

The result would be to free the U.S. from the continual threat of blackmail that exists as a consequence of the cartel actions of the Arab oil producers, Kirkland said. In addition, the reverse embargo would overcome the U.S. balance of payments deficit, Kirkland observed in an interview carried by the Public Broadcasting Service.

"It's absolutely vital to begin, as soon as possible, to make sharp cutbacks on our imports of foreign oil," Kirkland declared. "We need to . . . relieve ourselves of that threat of embargo."

He suggested that a cutback of 1.7 million barrels a day, or 700,000 barrels a day more than President Ford called for, "would be tolerable and could be absorbed." He recommended strict allocation of petroleum to the various sectors of the economy to meet shortages resulting from such a reduction in imports.

"It's a form of rationing," Kirkland acknowledged. "But if necessary, if it requires actual rationing to the ultimate consumer, I

Ford Urged to Reverse Planned Food Stamp Cut

The unemployed and the elderly are the chief victims of the Administration's double-edged cutback in the food stamp program, AFL-CIO President George Meany charged.

Meany called on President Ford to rescind a $325 million budget cut announced by the White House for the food stamp program. And he urged the President to cancel a new Dept. of Agriculture regulation that would require families and individuals receiving food stamps to pay for their allotment with 30 percent of their net income.

This income requirement would cost the needy an additional $215 million a year for their food, Meany wrote Ford.

Its likely effect, he said, will be to "cause millions of people to drop out of the program. This fake economy will hit those who need help most, the unemployed, the very old and the very young."

Students in Milwaukee Grapple with Bargaining

Milwaukee—More than 80 students from 40 high schools in the greater Milwaukee area grappled recently with the problems involved in collective bargaining at the annual Institute on Industrial Relations cosponsored by the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and the Milwaukee County Labor Council.

By all accounts, including evaluations by the students themselves, the day-long program was highly successful in providing first-hand instruction in the dynamics of collective bargaining.

Instead of hearing speakers or watching films, the students divided into "union" and "management" bargaining teams, and negotiated the terms of a new agreement between the mythical Local 911 of the International Association of Garden Equipment Workers and the equally mythical Looksahed Manufacturing Co. of West Turn, Wis.

The students were organized into five workshops. Each bargaining team was assigned a "consultant" and each workshop was directed by an instructor whose job was to set the stage for the bargaining and keep the negotiations on an even keel.

The negotiating teams dealt with five issues which remained unresolved as the contract neared a midafternoon expiration date. The issues were wages, pensions, work hours, union security and dental insurance.

The object of the mock bargaining exercise was to try to settle the issues before the contract deadline. But each side was instructed to consider its own interests carefully before agreeing to a set of terms imposed by "the other side."

Each workshop was characterized by tough, hard-nosed bargaining and, although only one of them was able to report a full agreement by the 3 p.m. deadline, substantial progress toward an agreement had been reached by the other four workshops.

The workshop instructors and consultants included John Adam of Brewery Workers Local 9; John Stevens of the Wisconsin Federation of Teachers; Ken Clark of the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO; Catherine Conroy of the Communications Workers; Erv Horak of the State, County & Municipal Employees; Hugh Henderson of Steelworkers District 32; Tom Parker of Machinists Lodge 66; Lenore Hahlbeck of Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 205; Russell Retzack of Operating Engineers Local 139; Paul Blackman of Directly Affiliated Local Union 19806 and Harry Donoian and George Daitsman of the Allied Industrial Workers.

Also serving as instructors and consultants were William Smith, Irving Brotslaw and Norris Tibbetts of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers.

BLS Makes Correction in Price Index

Recomputation of the consumer price index for the April-October 1974 period to correct a government error in the used-car component has resulted in a reduction of between one-tenth and three-tenths of an index point for each month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics announced.

Whether the correction will result in retroactive pay reductions under those labor contracts with cost-of-living escalator clauses tied to the CPI was uncertain but doubtful.

Many such agreements stipulate there will be no reduction in the event of a downward revision of the CPI. Some companies, too, have expressed the view that the administrative cost of restoring the difference might outweigh the overpayment.

BLS issued the following revised and previously published indexes to show the amount of reduction:

	Revised	Previous
April	143.9	144.0
May	145.5	145.6
June	146.9	147.1
July	148.0	148.3
August	149.9	150.2
September	151.7	151.9
October	153.0	153.2

The previously published index showed a total rise of 9.2 points over the seven-month span. Under the revised index, the total rise was 9.1 points.

Jobless Aid Action Pressed in States

AFL-CIO President George Meany has asked the federation's state central bodies to prod their legislatures to take advantage of the new federal extended unemployment benefits program.

In nearly all states, legislaive action is necessary before workers who have exhausted their state unemployment compensation can obtain extended benefits.

Meany said in his telegram that the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security is prepared to deal with any questions regarding the extended benefit program.

But Agrees System Is Sound:

Social Security Panel Split On Treasury Contribution

At least five of the 13 members of the Social Security Advisory Council will recommend a modest infusion of government funds to keep the program from running a deficit at about the turn of the century.

Rudolph T. Danstedt, an official of the National Council of Senior Citizens, is one of the panel members who prefers this alternative to raising the payroll tax rate. But Danstedt thinks that some recent newspaper accounts of the advisory council's deliberations have given an unduly alarming picture of the funding controversy.

He told the AFL-CIO News that members of the advisory panel, including business and insurance executives who are opposed to a government financial contribution, are in general agreement on the basic soundness of the social security system.

There is no immediate funding problem, Danstedt stressed. Even if no changes were made other than the gradual rise in the taxable wage base provided under present law, the amount paid into the social security fund and the benefits paid out would be approximately in balance. The future deficit, projected for the 21st Century, could be met by an additional 1.75 percent payroll tax on workers and employers by the year 2025, he said.

Danstedt said the council's discussions have dealt with various alternatives to a payroll tax rise of that magnitude.

Some past assumptions of income and obligations have been modified by recent developments—a drop in the nation's birth rate and an inflationary surge in which the formula for automatic benefit increases tied to the consumer price index has created funding problems.

On paper, at any rate, there will be a population imbalance during the first years of the 21st Century as the "baby boom" that followed World War II is reflected in a sharp rise in the number of persons reaching the "normal" retirement age of 65. At the same time, the virtually zero population growth of recent years could mean that relatively fewer persons in the active workforce will be contributing to the social security fund.

But AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman is one authority who doesn't think the imbalance will be as great as some of the projections.

In a recent letter to the Wall Street Journal, Seidman commented:

"Experience has shown that the supply of workers expands to meet the demand.

"Isn't it likely that smaller families will bring more women into the labor force since there will be fewer years when they are caring for small children?

"Aren't many older people, now forced into retirement, likely to continue working? Can't we drive down our excessive unemployment rates to those of most other industrialized nations so that more people will be working and paying into the trust fund?"

All these factors, Seidman suggested, could reduce or largely eliminate projected funding problems.

The advisory council, which will not firm up its recommendations until later this month appears to be leaning towards two proposals to Congress for early action.

One proposal is likely to be for a rise in the taxable wage base, now $14,100. But the extent and timing of the increase to be proposed is still at issue. The liberal minority of the council has suggested a system under which employers would be taxed on their total payroll, with the ceiling on taxable wages applying only to the worker share.

Another expected recommendation is to key future automatic increases in benefits to the rise in wage levels. The current formula is seen as in effect combining wage and price rises.

Also possible is a small rise in the tax rate for 1985 to avoid a higher increase later.

Danstedt considers misleading a headlined report that the advisory council will recommend postponement of the normal retirement age to 68. He said the possibility of pushing back the retirement age during a period when the active workforce will be relatively smaller was merely discussed as one of the options available as a funding alternative in the 21st Century.

The advisory panel dealt only with the basic tax, covering old age, survivors' and disability insurance, not the portion of the payroll tax applied to Medicare.

The AFL-CIO has urged the introduction of general treasury financing into the social security system. The federation's 1973 convention declared that "the best way to relieve the payroll tax burden would be to use general revenues, raised as much as possible by progressive taxation, to partially finance the social security system."

Rail Unions Turn Down Management Proposal

The nation's railroad unions, with their old agreements expired, turned down an offer from the major carriers as inadequate and pressed their proposals for wage and benefit improvements that "fully reflect the needs of the membership."

Meanwhile, the Sheet Metal Workers, which still has not settled on a 1973 agreement with the railroads, announced it would serve notices on a selected list of companies fixing Jan. 24 as a strike date.

About 500,000 workers are affected by the current negotiations, under way since last fall. The unions seek a 20 percent initial wage increase, as of last Jan. 1, and another 15 percent boost on Jan. 1, 1976. They also want a cost-of-living escalator provision, improved benefits in their hospital - surgical - medical program, longer paid vacations and other adjustments.

President C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks charged the carriers' offer, made through the National Railway Labor Conference, was without "a shred of reality."

The unions are bargaining for an agreement to replace an 18-month wage-benefit package that expired last Dec. 31. The Sheet Metal Workers, however, were not a party to that agreement and bargained separately.

J. W. O'Brien, the union's vice president for railroads, said the 4 percent wage increase under the 1973 pact was not enough to provide comparability in pay between sheet metal workers employed by the carriers and those in other industries.

Also, he said, there remains the problem of the "incidental work rule" previously negotiated with the carriers. He charged that the railroads are "widely violating" the rule, assigning more than incidental work in the union's jurisdiction to employes in other crafts.

The union has already exhausted all the procedures required under the Railway Labor Act and became legally free to strike last August. It agreed then to continue bargaining with the proviso that it could call a strike after Jan. 1 on 14 days' notice.

Mrs. Murphy Nominated to Head NLRB

President Ford has announced his intention to appoint Betty Southard Murphy to head the National Labor Relations Board.

Mrs. Murphy, who worked as an NLRB attorney in 1958 and 1959 before going into private law practice, has been Administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division since last July.

Ford will nominate her for a five-year term, replacing Edward B. Miller, the previous chairman, who returned to his Chicago law firm after expiration of his term in December. Senior Board Member John H. Fanning has been serving as acting chairman since Miller's departure.

A White House announcement said that Ford will designate Mrs. Murphy as chairman of the labor board if she is confirmed by the Senate as a member of the NLRB.

Mrs. Murphy, a Republican, would be the first woman to serve on the NLRB. From 1959 to 1974, she was a partner in a Washington law firm, and an NLRB biography described her as "one of the few lawyers in the United States who represented both international unions and employers."

She and her husband, Dr. Cornelius F. Murphy, have two children, aged 5 and 6.

Response to Energy Crisis:

Oil Self-Sufficiency Sought by Kirkland

would not shrink from that." Fuel allocations are far preferable to living under a threat of blackmail implicit in the possibility of another embargo by the oil-producing nations, he said.

Kirkland said he was expressing his "personal view" but that the AFL-CIO would address itself to the energy crisis during the Jan. 23 meeting of the federation's General Board in Washington. Specific proposals to alleviate the situation would be made at that time, he said.

Other matters to come before the General Board meeting will deal with the country's deepening recession, high unemployment and the continuing inflationary pressures in the economy.

"We're going to have an all-day discussion of the facts with a view toward developing and obtaining the strongest possible support for a program of emergency action that we can call to the attention of Congress," Kirkland said on the PBS interview, Washington Straight Talk.

The nation's economy currently is in a state of "free fall," he said, with unemployment rising sharply. Noting that the national jobless rate in December was 7.1 percent, he said it is probably closer to 7.5 percent today.

"I would expect that we will be hitting 8 percent sooner than most people think at the present rate," Kirkland added. "No one has a crystal ball, but it's quite conceivable that it could go as high as 9 by summer."

Among the recommendations the AFL-CIO likely will urge upon Congress to halt the recession, Kirkland said, are the following:

- Emergency aid to the housing industry, which has been in "desperate straits for the past year or two and was in a state of extreme recession long before it hit the automobile industry."
- An emergency tax cut "of substantial proportions to give a quick infusion of purchasing power into the economy to offset some of the sharp decline in real income and purchasing power that our members and the public generally have suffered."
- Allocation of credit to areas of the economy that are critical, such as housing and public works.

While priority attention must be given to the problem of recession, "the problem of double-digit inflation still exists and has to be dealt with," Kirkland observed.

The primary sources of high inflation over the past year or so have been the monopoly price of oil imposed by the Arab oil-producing nations and the extremely high interest rates caused by policies of the Federal Reserve under its chairman, Arthur Burns, Kirkland said.

He pointed out that organized labor has exercised considerable restraint in seeking wage increases, declaring that "the process of restraint is the process of collective bargaining." He noted, too, that many unions are in the midst of long-term collective bargaining contracts that extend well into the future.

"That's the most stable element in the economy," he said.

State-County Wins 2 Major Illinois Units

Springfield, Ill. — The State, County & Municipal Employees won a second victory in Illinois as non-professional state mental health workers voted by a 74 percent margin to be represented by the AFL-CIO union.

AFSCME received 5,920 votes in the new 8,000-person statewide bargaining unit, topping the Illinois State Employees Association, which received 1,165 votes. There were 138 votes for no union, 776 challenged ballots, and 50 voided ballots.

The victory followed a 1,438-to-40 vote victory for AFSCME in an election for bargaining rights for some 2,500 security workers in the Illinois Dept. of Corrections.

Illinois AFSCME petitioned for bargaining elections for 26,700 workers after Gov. Daniel Walker issued an executive order giving state employes the right to collective bargaining.

Union Set to Strike As Oil Talks Falter through the evening of Jan. 9. As the AFL-CIO News went to press, a strike deadline was near.

Grospiron told newsmen initial strike action could be industrywide, against one company or against several companies. But he said, "I think we would have a nationwide strike within short order."

Unauthorized walkouts at Texaco and Gulf refineries in Texas and at a Chevron facility in California occurred hours after the contracts expired. Struck plants at Port Arthur and Port Neches, both in Texas, and at El Segundo, Calif. Some 7,500 OCAW workers were involved.

Earlier, the union's 12-member policy committee reduced its demands for a $1.50 hourly raise in each year of a three-year contract to $1.20. The oil workers also seek an additional "catch-up" pay increase in the first year, a first cost-of-living escalator agreement with the industry, plus improvements in a number of fringe-benefit areas.

Negotiations are conducted with the industry on a plant-by-plant basis and affect about 60,000 workers. Any agreement must be approved by the union's policy committee here before going to the membership for ratification.

Among the companies bargaining with the union are Mobil, Cities Service, Texaco, Phillips, Continental, Atlantic-Richfield, Shell, British Petroleum, American Petrofina, Standard Oil of California, Ashland, and Standard Oil of Indiana.

Service Pact Gives 20,000 $50 Increase

New York — A new three-year contract signed by the Service Employees provides wage increases totaling $50 a week, inflation protection and improved fringe benefits for 20,000 members of SEIU Local 32-B employed at more than 2,000 commercial buildings here.

Agreement came 36 hours before a strike deadline set by the local. Effective Jan. 1, the first-year basic wage increase is $20 a week, or 50 cents an hour. Two additional weekly wage increases of $15 each will go into effect in 1976 and 1977.

An additional $2 a week differential will be paid starters, handymen and porter foremen effective Jan. 1, 1976.

SEIU Local 32-B President Arthur B. Harckman, who termed the contract the "best ever" negotiated with the New York Realty Advisory Board, said the first-year increases of 12 percent bring weekly wages of porters to $198.12.

The cost-of-living clause will provide for inflation adjustments of 3 cents an hour for every 1 percent increase in the government's consumer price index over 12 percent between November 1974 and November 1975. In January 1977, an additional hourly adjustment of 3 cents will kick in if the CPI increases more than 10 percent between the preceding Novembers.

The contract also provides for improvements in paid holidays, sick leave, vacations and medical benefits, the SEIU reported. Employers will also contribute 75 cents per member each quarter to the local's welfare fund for job retraining and upgrading programs.

Firemen & Oilers Head W.E. Fredenberger Dies

William E. Fredenberger, president of the Firemen & Oilers since 1965, died at his home in North Beach, Md., Jan. 6. He was 60.

Fredenberger, a native of Kentucky, helped establish Local 320 of the Firemen & Oilers in the mid-1930s in Louisville. He later served as business manager and secretary-treasurer of the local, which was built into one of the largest in the union.

In the late 1930s, Fredenberger became an international representative and served as the union's auditor before being appointed a vice president in 1947.

Fredenberger was elected secretary-treasurer in 1961 and was named president of the union by the executive board to succeed Anthony E. Matz in 1965. He was re-elected at subsequent union conventions.

AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message to his wife, Joanne, that Fredenberger earned wide respect and affection throughout the labor movement during his 40 years of services to the union.

"He was an inspiring leader, a true gentleman and a valued friend," Meany and Kirkland said.

Fredenberger also had been president of the Firemen & Oilers Kentucky state branch, a vice president of the Kentucky Federation of Labor and served on the Louisville Labor-Management Commission.

Survivors include his wife and two sons. Services and interment will be in Louisville.

Ex-Staff Member Vincent Quinn Dies

New York — Vincent K. Quinn, a retired AFL-CIO regional representative, died Dec. 31. He was 71.

Quinn had been vice president of Insurance Workers Local 1706 in New York before joining the CIO organizing staff in 1952. He served the mid-Atlantic States area, working primarily with white-collar workers, and continued on the regional staff of the AFL-CIO following merger.

He retired as a member of the federation's field staff in 1968.

Kirkland Sees Presidential Panel Conducting Full, Fair Probe of CIA

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland will approach a presidential assignment to investigate the Central Intelligence Agency with a strong "bias" in favor of the constitutional right of Amercians to be free from "unlawful search and seizure."

He has no "preconceived notions" as to whether the CIA did engage in illegal domestic activities. That's what the eight-member commission appointed by President Ford has to find out, Kirkland indicated.

Kirkland stressed in a television interview that he will not be a party to any "whitewash" of the CIA. And from personal knowledge of several of the other members of the presidential commission, he has confidence in their "integrity and independence," he said.

Kirkland's appointment to the commission had been announced shortly before he was to have been interviewed on a Public Broadcasting Service program dealing with the economic crisis. The opening segment of the questioning dealt with the makeup of the commission, which is headed by Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, and whether it is "stacked" with defenders of the CIA.

Also on the commission are John T. Connor, Secretary of Commerce in the Johnson Administration and chairman of the Allied Chemical Corp.; C. Douglas Dillon, investment banker who served as Secretary of the Treasury under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson; Erwin N. Griswold, former solicitor general; retired Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer; former California Gov. Ronald Reagan. and Edgar F. Shannon, Jr., former president of the University of Virginia and a critic of U.S. military intervention in Southeast Asia.

Kirkland refused to comment on allegations against the CIA before determining what the facts actually were, but declared: "I want no part of any domestic secret police operations in this country."

He said the AFL-CIO's international activities have not received funds from the CIA. The only government funds have come through open contracts with the Agency for International Development to administer various aid programs.

Furthermore, Kirkland said, he "certainly would" oppose any CIA funding for labor activities.

He said that in his service on other government commissions, "I've never hesitated to dissent and to express my own point of view," even when he was the lone dissenter.

Kirkland told interviewer Paul Duke that if it were necessary, "I would certainly have no hesitation about doing it again."

Jobless Rate Tops 6% in 55 Areas

The addition of Phoenix, Ariz., and Waterbury, Conn., to the Labor Dept.'s list of major labor areas with "substantial unemployment" raised the total to a 32-month high of 55 in December, the government announced.

Substantial unemployment means the area has a jobless rate of 6 percent or more, which is expected to continue for at least two more months. A year ago the number of areas so classified was 33.

The Phoenix area jobless rate last month reached 7.6 percent. In Waterbury, the rate rose to 7.4 percent. The rise in joblessness in both labor markets was due largely to layoffs in the metals and electrical equipment industries, the Labor Dept. said.

Of Time and Jobs

WHEN REPORTERS asked Presidential Press Sec. Ron Nessen about actions the Administration could take to get Americans back to work, he told them that a Thomas Jefferson quotation is becoming popular among presidential aides. That quotation, Nessen said, is from a 1792 Jefferson letter to President George Washington.

"Delay," wrote Jefferson, "is preferable to error."

If given the opportunity to reply, the more than six and one-half million Americans the Labor Dept. counted as unemployed in December might prefer another Jefferson quotation, this one from a 1787 letter in which he wrote:

"Never put off till tomorrow what you can do today."

Indeed, there is much the President could do today to stimulate the economy. In fact, the President could have acted on Oct. 8, when instead he declared that inflation, not recession, was Public Enemy No. 1.

President Ford could have acted on Nov. 1, when unemployment climbed to 6 percent. But he didn't.

He could have acted on Dec. 6, when unemployment hit 6.5 percent. But he didn't.

He could have acted on Jan. 3, when unemployment jumped to 7.1 percent. Again, President Ford didn't.

THERE IS NO MYSTERY about the actions President Ford could have taken. AFL-CIO President George Meany has enumerated them time and again. Specifically, the President could:

● Immediately release a substantial portion of the $13 billion impounded by presidential order that could construct needed public works. Sewer projects, highways, public construction of all types are ready to get under way; the only thing they lack is the federal funds Congress authorized and appropriated but the President held up.

● Immediately reactivate housing programs, already authorized and funded by Congress, to build low- and moderate-income housing. The housing industry is in a depression; 15 percent of all construction workers are without jobs; hundreds of thousands of low- and middle-income American families cannot find housing they can afford. The programs are law, the funds appropriated. All that is lacking is presidential direction.

● Immediately use his powers under the Credit Control Act of 1969 by directing the Federal Reserve Board to lower interest rates and allocate credit to socially useful programs. Again, the law is on the books. The President's authority is clear, and the problem is clear. He can act now.

These three actions, by themselves, will not turn the economy around after six years of mismanagement by Arthur Burns and Richard Nixon. But they are a start, and each could be done today, not put off until tomorrow.

In commenting on the latest unemployment figures, Meany said:

"The President has told the Americans he will reveal his course of action on Jan. 20 in his State of the Union message to the Congress.

"Six and a half million jobless Americans should not have to wait that long for action."

25th Amendment Follows View Of Nation's Founding Fathers

By John P. Roche

WHILE VICE PRESIDENT Rockefeller was undegoing the rites of passage, a number of pundits and politicians were registering their disappointment with the 25th Amendment, the provision of the Constitution that set up the technique for replacing a missing Vice President. What triggered this flow of criticism was, of course, the extremely odd fact that, since President Ford entered the vice presidency via the 25th Amendment and then inherited the presidency, we now have two top executives who were not elected by the population.

Perhaps because I suspect the odds against this happening again are virtually astronomical, I have been unable to work up much indignation. However, suggestions for change have ranged all the way from abolition of the vice presidency to the establishment of parliamentary government (which is the substance of Sen. Edward Kennedy's proposal that the President resign on a two-thirds vote of censure).

At the time the 25th Amendment was proposed I supported it in substance, though I saw no reason to make an amendment out of it. In my judgment, Congress had the authority to stipulate Presidential succession without cluttering the Constitution up with another amendment. I still think it is about as good a technique as any.

Or maybe I should say it is the best of the many proposed alternatives. Those who want to call a special election, for example, have to face the logistical problems involved: nomination presumably with primaries, campaign, and final decision. If this could be managed in less than a year, I should be teaching astrophysics. Meanwhile, who keeps the store? The same objective runs against the proposal to abolish the vice presidency outright. There has to be somebody playing safety, someone whom the President will trust and certainly from the same political party.

The Kennedy proposal is in effect a conversion of present impeachment proceedings into an openly political prosecution. In essence this is what the congressional Republicans tried to institute in 1868 when President Andrew Johnson (a "War Democrat") was impeached on a straight partisan indictment. He escaped conviction by a whisker, with the man who would have succeeded him, Sen. Ben Wade, president pro tem of the Senate, cheerfully voting for himself. In retrospect, this use of the impeachment power has been frowned upon. Hence the effort to prove that President Nixon had committed specific "high crimes and misdemeanors" at the time of his impeachment proceedings.

In short, I can't get worked up about the 25th Amendment, but I do find myself immensely amused by the great divination sessions that some scholars have sponsored. Apparently you can't simply say, "The 25th is a lousy idea." You have to say, "The Framers of the Constitution would have considered the 25th a lousy idea." I don't feel bound by what the framers thought; indeed, I suspect that remarkable generation would look with some contempt upon descendants who tried to impose the conventional wisdom of 1787 upon the United States of 1974. On the other hand, I didn't start the game—at the risk of boring you with a little history—it is perfectly clear that the 25th is thoroughly in the tradition of 1787. This, I repeat, does not make it either "good" or "bad."

THE FOUNDERS of this Republic had one abiding conviction: that executive power was the greatest menace to free government. Thus, in the state governments established after independence, the uniform pattern was not the separation of powers, but legislative supremacy. Only in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York was the governor popularly elected; elsewhere he was chosen by the legislature. Only in Massachusetts did he have the veto power as we know it. The government under the Articles of Confederation did not even provide for a Chief Executive.

When the delegates to the Constitutional Convention set down to their labors, the first proposal (drafted by James Madison) provided for a legislative supremacist government: lower house elected by the people, upper house chosen by the lower house, and President elected by joint session of the legislature.

Only at the very end was the legislative election of the President replaced by the Electoral College with the House choosing the President if no electroral majority appeared. Delegate George Mason asserted that 19 times in 20 the House would have the job. In short, the 25th is authentic, if archaic, doctrine: Divination is no substitute for research.

Sharp Increase in Fuel Prices Leaves Families Cold, Broke

By Sidney Margolius

MANY MODERATE-INCOME families are having trouble this winter keeping up with fuel-bill payments because of the latest increases in fuel prices. A survey by this writer reveals that families who heat by oil in the colder parts of the country must now pay as much as 38-40 cents a gallon including sales taxes. Deliveries for even small homes now often run as much as $90 with some requiring deliveries as often as every three or four weeks.

In many cases fuel for a year's heating including hot water now comes to $400 or $500 and even more.

The result, oil companies report, is more families lagging behind in payments this year. Some dealers are dropping even moderately-slow payers immediately, refusing to make the next delivery until the previous bill is paid.

One dealer told me he finds some families now call up before a delivery is due to find out how much it may come to, so they can scrape up the money ahead of time. Another dealer says more families are trying to arrange payments on a monthly budget plan. An increasing number are going on 12-month payment plans rather than the more usual 10-month plan which omits payments in July and August.

Hardest hit are families in older homes with poor insulation and old converted furnaces "which burn oil like mad" one dealer said. Often these are rented homes which don't even have storm windows. Some deliverers are avoiding renters altogether or refusing to let them owe for even two deliveries.

Families living in multiple-dwelling buildings are being affected as landlords raise rents to cover high heating costs. Authorities in some large cities say apartment-house fuel oil has gone from 11 cents a gallon to as much as 40 cents.

In all, the price of No. 2 fuel oil for home use has approximately doubled in the past two years. But even families in milder climates who may heat by electricity or gas are paying bigger bills.

Nationwide, electricity and gas have gone up 25 percent although much more in the East.

Failing any effective government program to halt the fuel oil gouge, the only ways families can protect themselves even a little are:

1. Maintain strict economy, keeping temperatures at 68 degrees or even less, and even at this late date taking any possible steps to insulate and weatherproof. Also keep in mind that heating water is your second biggest heating expense.

2. If you can't keep up payments, get on the oil company's budget plan if no additional finance charges are required, rather than pay interest on a loan to pay the fuel bills.

3. In case of dire need, don't hesitate to ask the local welfare office for emergency help for fuel payments. Even last year some families ordinarily self-supporting had to get such help to keep homes heated.

EVEN IN MIDWINTER you can still make a house more weatherproof. A common heat leak is loose-fitting windows and door frames. These can be caulked and weather-stripped. Storm windows can save 50 percent of heat lost through windows. But even if you rent and the landlord won't supply storm windows, you can contrive fixed storm windows you don't need to open by stapling or tacking clear vinyl film onto narrow wood or fiber strips, or by covering the window with the vinyl and then framing with the strips.

Since heat rises, it's also important to insulate attics. If your attic is not floored you can insulate with blanket or loose fill. Also check heat losses in basements which may affect rooms above.

Standard rating methods can help you compare various insulations, advises Cecil Wheary, extension specialist at Virginia Polytechnic Institute. Effectiveness usually is specified as the resistance to the flow of heat, generally designated by the letter "R". The higher the "R" the better the insulating quality.

Most manufacturers have adopted the "R" rating and stamp it on their products. For example, a three-inch batt of one insulation might have an R10 rating, while a three-inch batt of another type might have an R12 rating. On the other hand a two-inch rigid foam material might have an R10 rating.

30,000 Jobs at Stake:

Survival of Pan Am Airways Hinges on Fair U.S. Treatment

THE JOBS of more than 30,000 airline industry workers hinge on new fairness and equity in the U.S. government's treatment of the nation's largest international air carrier, Pan American World Airways.

That warning was sounded by President William Gill of the Flight Engineers and Richard Phenneger, president of the union's Pan Am chapter, on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

The two union officials said that route assignments and other regulations have been used as tools in political negotiations with other countries, regardless of the economic impact on the airline.

Stressing that Pan Am is the only U.S.-based airline with total overseas operations, Gill said that other carriers flying international routes also have domestic service, where the industry is in "pretty good financial shape." He said that while the domestic industry rolled up record profits this last year the international carriers' losses exceeded all expectations. He said the fuel crisis was a major factor, with spiraling prices sending Pan Am's fuel costs up $200 million.

Phenneger said that neither merger of Pan Am with Trans World Airlines as suggested by "one segment of the bureaucracy," nor the proposed financial assistance from Iran in return for technical assistance from Pan Am would effectively meet the problem. He said that merger or consolidation of service would produce the situation where "the world's most travelled nation, the United States, ends up with one carrier competing alone against all the internationals."

Gill said the Pan Am problem has been building since 1969, and has already resulted in the loss of 10,000 jobs over the last year and one-half. He said that among the most "glaring inequities" in the government's treatment of Pan Am has been the "route structures" awarded by the Civil Aeronautics Board, which has resulted in the company losing the share of the market it had prior to 1969.

Gill and Phenneger said that the Air Line Pilots Association, the Transport Workers and the Teamsters, who also represent Pan Am employes, have joined with the Flight Engineers in the effort to save the company from going under.

Questioning them on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview were Michael Posner of the Reuters News Agency and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNTIL RECENTLY the attention of the nation was largely cemented on the brutal increase in the cost of living that was bringing tragedy into so many lives.

But now there is growing recognition that unemployment has become an even more important problem, with joblessness reaching the staggering rate of 7.1 percent in December.

Even so, there is still a tendency to give inflation top billing, with television and radio spots proclaiming: "Inflation Is Our Number One Enemy."

For millions of American workers this is no longer true. As much as inflation remains a burden, jobs have become the overwhelming concern. This is nothing new for the American labor movement, which has been persistently calling attention to the worsening job situation for many months.

The rest of the nation is now waking up to the jobs crisis, and insistent demands are being made to get the economy back on its feet.

The cause of this sudden shift of emphasis from inflation to unemployment is obvious. We have had double-digit inflation for nearly a year. The President made a great show of his determination to fight inflation at the time of his summit conferences, which failed to live up to their advance billing. And he still places his greatest emphasis on inflation, which is far from solved.

All the time, recession and its accompanying unemployment were getting worse, but were almost ignored except by organized labor.

PRESIDENT FORD hasn't gone as far as President Hoover, who was constantly seeing prosperity "around the corner." But he has gone pretty far. His latest contribution is his expectation of an economic upturn for the latter part of 1975. He gives little indication, however, of tackling the loss of jobs with the same zeal he has publicly applied to inflation.

A recent report of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress showed a far keener awareness of the job crisis than the Administration. It warned that today's jobless trend may well bring an 8 percent rate before a downturn can be expected in late 1975. The committee is holding out for a target of less than 3 percent with a 4 percent level "an appropriate interim policy goal."

"It is of the utmost importance that the government make clear its determination to restore full employment and state clearly the time period over which this is likely to be achieved," the report says, adding: "Because of the high levels of unemployment and poverty apt to persist during the remainder of this decade, special urgency attaches to the enactment of an adequate program of income maintenance."

The report recommends a tax cut of between $10 billion and $12 billion, mostly for low- and middle-income workers, to get the economy rolling again. The President is under increasing pressure for a similar move from other quarters, too.

Yet, the picture is still blurred, and there are few indications that the President is really aware of the need to shift emphasis from prices to jobs, something that the rest of the country has pretty well realized.

On Jan. 14, the new 94th Congress will come into being. Shortly thereafter the President will make his State of the Union address and give his recommendations for meeting today's economic crisis.

With a possible 8 percent rate of unemployment looming ahead, the nation cannot afford any more half-hearted measures to meet the crisis.

Unions Show Majority In Public Sector

More than half of all state and local government employes are members of unions or of associations that function as unions, a Census Bureau report indicated.

The information on union membership, as of October 1972, was sought in questionnaires sent to governmental units as part of the Census of Governments that is held every five years. This was the first time that the state and local governments were asked about relations with unions.

On the basis of replies, with some independent verification, the Census Bureau came up with a figure of 4.3 million members of employe organizations—about 50.4 percent of the total workforce.

Data was asked only on organizations "which had as a primary purpose the improvement of wages, hours and conditions of employment for its membership." That would cover some groups that began as professional associations and evolved into bargaining agents.

A Census Bureau spokesman conceded that some of the responses may have confused the concept of workers represented by union membership figures the questionnaire sought.

The report found local fire departments most fully organized, with 77 percent membership, followed by teachers with nearly 70 percent organized.

The greatest degree of union membership among public employes was in the Northeast, with 66 percent. The figure for the West was 60 percent, followed by 46 percent in the North Central states and 38 percent in the South.

During the 12 months prior to October 1972, there were 381 work stoppages, of which 152 involved schools.

While pay was the key issue in most of the work stoppages, the longest strikes were over the issue of union recognition.

Appeals Court Delays Vinyl Chloride Curbs

New York—A new government standard that would have reduced worker exposure to vinyl chloride effective Jan. 1 is being held up by an order of a federal appeals court.

A special three-judge panel of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals granted the stay to allow more time for a study of an appeal by the plastics industry in its attempt to block implementation of the standard.

The standard, which would limit exposure to the cancer-causing gas to 1 part vinyl chloride to 1 million parts air (1 ppm), is being challenged by the Society for the Plastics Industry, Inc. and eight vinyl chloride producers.

The Labor Dept. in October ordered the reduced exposure level from the current limit of 50 ppm, but delayed the effective date of the reduction to give employers time to gear up for the change.

When the plastics industry sought to block the implementation of the standard, the AFL-CIO and the federation's Industrial Union Dept. joined the Labor Dept. as intervenors in the case, even though organized labor had called for even stricter vinyl chloride controls.

The Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration promulgated the standard because of a number of rare fatal liver cancer cases among workers who had been exposed to the vinyl chloride on the job.

An estimated 6,500 workers are employed at plants that produce vinyl chloride or polyvinyl chloride plastic in the United States. Nearly 700,000 workers are employed in fabricating plants where there are more excessive concentrations of the gas.

Besides the Society for the Plastics Industry, the firms involved in the suit are Air Products & Chemicals, Inc., Dow Chemical, Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., B. F. Goodrich Co., Hooker Chemical Co., a subsidiary of Occidental Petroleum Corp., Tenneco, Inc., Union Carbide Corp. and Uniroyal, Inc.

NLRB Keeps Jurisdiction Over Schools

The National Labor Relations Board will continue to assert jurisdiction over private schools that meet appropriate dollar volume of business standards.

Three months ago, the NLRB asked for comment on a proposed rule under which it would have declined to accept cases involving the operations of private secondary, elementary and preschool institutions. The board announced that after carefully considering the 39 responses it received, it has decided not to adopt the proposed rule.

The AFL-CIO, one of the respondents, argued that there was "absolutely no justification" for excluding private schools, whether operated by religious or secular groups, from coverage of the National Labor Relations Act.

Employes of private educational institutions "want and need protection of the right to organize," the federation declared.

The NLRB's jurisdiction applies to both profit and non-profit schools that have at least $1 million annual gross revenue.

New Stamp Honors Role Of Bargaining

A new commemorative stamp honoring the role of collective bargaining as a social force in stabilizing labor-management relations will go on sale Mar. 13 at all U.S. post offices, the Postal Service announced.

The 10-cent, four-color stamp will bear the legend: "Collective Bargaining—Out of Conflict . . . Accord."

In announcing the stamp's publication, USPS pointed out that collective bargaining is "almost as old as the United States."

The first recorded instance of collective bargaining, USPS noted, was in 1799 when the Philadelphia Cordwainers — an old-fashioned name for shoemakers—refused a wage cut and were locked out. Subsequently, representatives of both sides met to resolve their differences.

In 1973 Survey:

Job Injuries Rise But Deaths Decline

Work-related injuries and illness edged up in 1973 over the preceding year while on-the-job fatalities declined slightly, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said in a report on the second full-year survey of workers covered by the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Eleven of every 100 workers were affected by occupational injuries or illness during the year, compared with 10.9 per 100 in 1972.

Although the number of recordable cases increased 5 percent over the year—from 5.65 to 5.92 million—fatalities dropped 7 percent to an estimated 5,200.

The BLS survey excluded workers in railroads, mining and the government sector, which are not covered by the federal safety act.

Contract construction continued to lead all industry sectors as the most hazard-prone occupations. Yet although the injury and illness rate increased 4.2 percent over the year in construction jobs, the number of deaths dropped from 1,500 in 1972 to 1,000 in 1973.

Still, nearly every one in five construction workers was hit by injury or illness during the year. The incidence rate for lost workday cases also increased in manufacturing by 7.1 percent over the year, and was also up slightly in transportation and public utilities.

Lost workday cases declined 3.6 percent in wholesale and retail trade, but remained about the same over the year in the service industry and in finance, insurance and real estate.

Even though lost workday cases accounted for only 30 percent of all recordable cases, BLS noted that 28.4 million workdays were lost during 1973 to injuries and job-related illness. This is equivalent to about 114,000 employe-years of work.

Manufacturing, which includes about one-third of the private workforce covered by the safety act, lost 13.2 million workdays to injury and illness.

About 15 of every 100 workers in manufacturing experienced occupational injury or illness. This compares with 19.8 in construction, 10.5 in transportation and public utilities, 8.6 in wholesale and retail trade, 6.3 in services, and 2.4 in finance, insurance and real estate.

Construction workers accounted for 625,000 recordable cases. This is about 10 percent of the total cases recorded for the entire private sector, although the industry represents only 6 percent of the workforce.

Among agricultural workers, BLS recorded 66,000 injuries and illnesses, of which 40 percent resulted in lost worktime.

Preliminary data from the Mine Enforcement & Safety Administration of the Interior Dept. showed that the incidence rate in 1973 was 12.5 cases per every 100 workers. However, the rate in coal mining was 19.1, compared to 12.8 for oil and gas extraction and 7.8 for metal and nonmetal mining. There were 300 fatalities recorded in coal and other mining activities during the year.

The Federal Railroad Administration of the Transportation Dept. reported 200 fatalities in the railroad industry during 1973 resulting from 52,000 injury and illness cases. The incidence rate was 8.7 per 100 workers.

For workers covered by the federal safety act, the average number of days lost because of injury or illness increased from 14 to 15 in 1973.

BLS said the five target industries selected for special emphasis of OSHA programs all showed a decline in injuries over the year.

IUE Election Victory Again Upheld As Indianapolis Strike Continues

Indianapolis, Ind.—Workers at the Regency Electronics Corp. here, who have waged a 10-year battle for union recognition and a three-month strike against the firing of union supporters, won a new round before the National Labor Relations Board.

In a case that has bounced back and forth between the NLRB and the courts, a three-member panel of the labor board unanimously affirmed that the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) had won a representation election in 1972.

The company has refused to recognize and bargain with the union, and this is the second time the NLRB has rejected management's objections to the election.

Initially, after the board turned down the company's protest, the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the labor board in a review of the case. But about that time, the Supreme Court handed down a decision—known as the Savair case—invalidating an election in which a union's promise to waive initiation fees was seen as an improper inducement to get workers to sign authorization cards. The appellate court then sent the Regency case back to the NLRB for reconsideration.

Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz listened to new arguments on the basis of the Supreme Court decision, but found that the IUE had not used a promise to waive initiation fees in any improper manner.

The NLRB panel of members, John H. Fanning, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and John A. Penello, agreed and again ordered the company to recognize and bargain with the union.

IUE District 8 President Bill Wright called on management to comply and begin bargaining, but the company instead said it will appeal the NLRB's latest decision to the courts.

Meanwhile, the more than 300 employes, most of whom are women, continue to maintain a strong picket line. Their unfair labor practices strike was precipitated by the firing of Local President Alice McVay and Chief Steward Ruby Cowles, both 20-year employes, a few days after they testified at the NLRB hearing. The union has filed new unfair labor practice charges on these and 13 firings since the strike began.

Regency has used strikebreakers and has advertised for others, the IUE said, in an effort to maintain production of its radio scanners, CB (citizens band) equipment, walkie-talkies and police radios.

Other unions are backing the strikers. The Marion County, Ind., AFL-CIO Council adopted a resolution of support; the Auto Workers and Teamsters are assisting.

IUE began the organizing campaign in 1965 at the invitation of a group of Regency employes. It took five years of litigation before the first election was held, which IUE lost. A second election was thrown out by the NLRB because of Regency misconduct. IUE won the third election, 133 votes to 112.

Over the ten years, the IUE said, Regency has employed discharges, intimidation, company unionism and other illegal tactics in an attempt to keep out the union.

Early in the campaign, the company fired 29 union supporters, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia directed Regency to offer them reinstatement and pay them $65,000 in lost wages.

IUE President Paul Jennings praised the "tremendous courage and determination" of the strikers. "Regency," he said, "is a cynical and vicious company using endless legal proceedings to beat its employes over the head. These tactics can delay, but cannot prevent, the inevitable."

Up to 40 Percent:

Union Card's Value In Higher Pay Cited

Union membership is worth up to 40 percent in higher wages, according to a study in the current issue of Monthly Labor Review published by the Labor Dept.

Organized craftsmen, based on a review made in May 1973, showed the highest differential between union and non-union workers. The difference was "about 20 to 25 percent more per hour than the earnings of workers who had similar characteristics, but were not members of unions," the study found.

"For white and black men in the transportation equipment operative occupations, the union-non-union differentials were around 40 percent," said the study as reported by Paul M. Ryscavage, an economist with the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

"Furthermore," the report continued, "the effect of unionism for women in clerical, operative and service jobs ranged from 20 to 25 percent" in favor of union workers.

The findings varied considerably for age, education, region and occupation. However, with these characteristics held constant, the "union effect was estimated to be about 12 percent for all workers."

For white men of similar characteristics, it was estimated to be about 8 percent. Among black men it was estimated to be about 27 percent. Among women, the effect was estimated to be 19 percent in higher wages for black women and 22 percent for white women.

For white union men in the white-collar area, the differential ran as high as 26 percent while differentials were even higher in the non-farm laborer and transportation occupations. They went as high as 34 percent for non-farm laborers and 38 percent for transportation operators. In the service occupations, the differential was about 16 percent higher for a union worker as compared with a non-union worker.

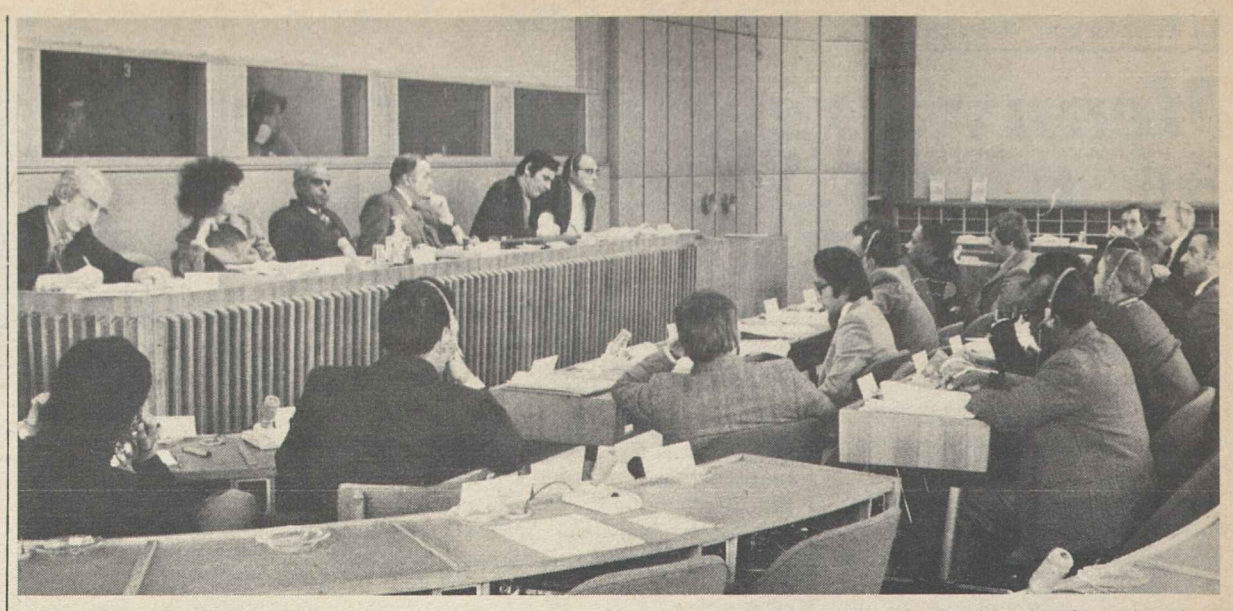
"Union differentials were about the same for white and black women in most of the occupations in which they are concentrated," the study showed. "The differential in the clerical occupations was around 20 percent for both. In operative and service occupations, however, the white union member earned 37 percent more an hour than her non-union counterpart, while among black professional women no differential existed.

"Among all workers the largest geographic differentials were found in the South Central states (from 18 to 20 percent), East North Central states (22 percent) and Mountain states (18 percent)."

"Regardless of region," the study declared, "black men experienced larger union-non-union earnings differentials than white men. Differentials were particularly high for blacks in the South Central, South Atlantic and Pacific Coast states undoubtedly reflecting the low hourly earnings received by non-union workers."

Atlanta Unionist Heads Area Transit Authority

Atlanta—The president of the Atlanta AFL-CIO Labor Council, John E. Wright, has been elected chairman of the Metropolitan Atlanta Rapid Transit Authority.



SYMPOSIUM on economic education for union members, held at Geneva, Switzerland, under the sponsorship of the International Labor Organization, had participants from 17 nations. The U.S. representative was AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis.

ILO Forum Asks Studies In Economics

Geneva—Worker education programs should give union members and leaders a basic understanding of economics, representatives of 17 nations agreed at an International Labor Organization symposium here.

The participants, including AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, saw economics education as a necessity in both industrialized and developing nations.

There was general agreement, Davis said, that the role of labor is treated inadequately in school programs throughout the world and that the extent of economics education below the college level does not provide the tools that union representatives need at the bargaining table.

Issues discussed at the symposium included the need for worker understanding of monetary policies, inflation, the role of multinational corporations and employment data.

Davis said the emphasis was on economics education as a tool, rather than an end in itself. And considerable attention was given to teaching techniques, including the training of union educators and the development of study guides.

Symposium participants generally agreed on three target groups for economic education programs:

- Shop stewards and other elected or appointed local union representatives.
- Union officers at all levels.
- Young staff members of unions.

Participants agreed that the studies should be problem-oriented, to help union representatives deal with practical problems rather than to train professional economists.

And while conditions vary in different countries, participants stressed that the primary responsibility for trade union training in economics should be with the labor movement itself.

The ILO could play a role by strenghtening its economic research and making the results available to trade union educators, the participants suggested.

Inventory System Helps Firms Shelter Profits

Hundreds of American corporations, embarrassed by huge profit gains over the past few years, are switching to an inventory accounting practice that serves to hold down profits—on paper—while actually providing a tax break.

Until about the last half of 1974, most companies accounted for their inventories on a "first-in, first-out" basis. Under this system the earliest cost of materials bought by a company for resale or for further processing and sale are the first to be deducted from its gross income for tax purposes. The FIFO accounting method thus more closely reflects actual costs and profits.

Now, companies increasingly are turning to a "last-in, first-out" accounting method, a practice they find more to their advantage. Under LIFO, the charge against gross income is based on the assumption that the last goods in move out first, and as a result the latest prices for such materials are deducted first.

By switching to LIFO when prices are rising, a company inflates its reported costs, thus lowering reported profits, Arnold Cantor, an AFL-CIO economist, points out. Lower profits mean lower taxes, with the result the firm's cash flow is increased.

LIFO actually permits corporations to mask their real profits, Cantor observes. In addition, the FIFO-LIFO bookkeeping gimmickry reduces federal tax receipts. The revenue loss to the U.S. Treasury in 1974 is estimated at some $4 billion and, depending on how many more companies switch to LIFO, it could run higher, Cantor notes.

DuPont offers an illustration of how business is using LIFO to its advantage. The firm announced last August its intention to adopt the accounting method for 1974.

Using LIFO, DuPont will show a reported increase in costs of $77 million for the first two quarters of 1974, with the result that reported before-tax profits will be $77 million lower. Since the corporate income tax rate is 48 percent, the company's tax liability will be reduced by $37 million—48 percent of $77 million.

"Thus, as a result of this bookkeeping change, the company will show lower profits," Cantor notes. "Yet, in actuality, its income will have increased by $37 million, the amount of its reduction in taxes."

Clothing Quotas Asked On Colombian Imports

Immediate controls on imports of men's and boys' clothing from Colombia are needed to halt further deterioration of the nation's clothing industry, the Clothing Workers and the Clothing Manufacturers Association warned. The rise in imports from Colombia was blamed for increased closings and worker layoffs.

The ACWA and the manufacturers issued the warning at a meeting with Commerce Dept. officials and members of the Committee for the Implementation of Textile Agreements.

Union and employer representatives called on the federal government to invoke Article 3 of the International Textile Agreement to limit the amount of tailored clothing imports from Colombia.

If such controls are not imposed, the ACWA and the CMA told William Eberle, the Commerce Dept.'s special trade representative, the U.S. clothing industry will continue to be seriously disrupted.

In October 1974, Colombia was the largest foreign supplier of suit coats and jackets in the U.S. market, the ACWA pointed out, noting that a larger volume of suits were imported from Colombia in that month than from Japan or Hong Kong.

The meetings of ACWA and CMA representatives with government officials commenced after the union's nationwide demonstration Nov. 11 protesting the rising flood of imports that have resulted in numerous plant shutdowns and widespread layoffs.

In the first 11 months of 1974, 52 clothing manufacturers that employed more than 3,500 workers were forced to shut down production.

The ACWA also pointed out in its demonstrations that suits from Korea, where workers are paid as little as 11 cents an hour, were selling for $165 in the United States. Suits produced in Colombia, where the wage scale is 25 cents an hour, sold for $155 here, the union said.

W. E. Lewis Dies, Retired Organizer

Kansas City—William E. Lewis, a union organizer since the early 1940s, died at North Kansas City Hospital Jan. 1. Lewis, 65, had retired from the AFL-CIO organizing staff last May.

Lewis was a founder of a local of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union in Kansas City in 1937 and joined the RWDSU staff three years later. He became an organizer with the CIO in 1943. He continued on the AFL-CIO organizing staff following merger, operating in the South and the Midwest.

Survivors include his wife, Mildred, and two daughters. Services were held in Kansas City Jan. 4.

New Jobless Claims Highest Ever Recorded

As domestic auto makers scheduled massive layoffs for this month, the industry reported 1974 sales totaled 7,448,921, a 23 percent drop from the record 9.7 million of a year earlier. The Chrysler Corp., in an attempt to stimulate sales, announced a rebate system that will save buyers of certain new models from $200 to $400.

Other reports adding to the gloomy outlook for the economy:

- Business investment in new plants and equipment this year is expected to decline in real terms, according to an annual forecast by the Commerce Dept.

The 1975 estimate of $117.1 billion represents a 4.5 percent increase in value over last year, but inflation — expected to average between 8 and 10 percent — will more than offset the increased dollar value.

The department also reported last year's business investment totaled $111.92 billion, or 12 percent more than in 1973. However, inflation also accounted for most if not all of this increase.

"The 1974 capital expenditures figure, therefore, represents little if any real growth in investment, and the 1975 projection strongly suggests a decline in real growth," the department said.

- The amount of consumer installment indebtedness declined by a record $402 million in November, the Federal Reserve Board reported. The drop was the first since November 1970 and the largest decrease on record. The downturn reflected consumer reluctance to contract debt during a period of uncertainty over the economy.
- Bankruptcy petitions are running 29 percent above a year earlier. The Administrative Office of the United States Courts reported the number of petitions averaged 19,305 a month during the first five months of fiscal year 1975, compared to a monthly average of 14,912 in the same period in fiscal 1974.

As Recession Deepens:

Great Depression. The jobless that year totaled an estimated 8,120,000, and the unemployment rate was 14.6 percent of the labor force, BLS said. The figures are seasonally adjusted.

The number of unemployed workers rose by 560,000 in December, pushing the jobless rate up six-tenths of 1 percent rise over the previous month. The month-to-month climb in the rate was the largest increase since October 1960 when it also was six-tenths of 1 percent.

The rate is almost certain to go higher. BLS conducted its survey of joblessness during the first week of December and since then substantial layoffs have been announced in nearly every major industry.

White House Press Sec. Ron Nessen told reporters President Ford expects joblessness to continue to rise over "the next couple of months. The President has heard estimates of 8 percent." The highest level since World War II was 7.9 percent in 1949.

The AFL-CIO has summoned top officers of its affiliated unions to a Jan. 23 meeting of the General Board to deal with the state of the economy and adopt an action program to put the nation's unemployed back to work.

Meanwhile, Meany said in his statement on the December jobless figures, President Ford could and should:

- Release a substantial portion of $13 billion of presidentially impounded funds for government construction of needed public works.
- Reactivate long-frozen subsidized housing programs for low- and moderate-income workers.
- Direct the Federal Reserve Board to lower interest rates and allocate credit to socially useful programs, a power granted the President under the 1960 Credit Control Act.

Much of last month's increase in unemployment resulted from job layoffs rather than voluntary quit or persons re-entering the labor force or seeking their first job. The number of unemployed who lost their last job during the survey period rose by 360,000 to 3.2 million, BLS noted.

Since December 1973, total joblessness has increased by more than 2 million. After dropping to a three and one-half year low of 4.6 percent in October 1973, the unemployment rate has increased by 2.5 percentage points.

"A small part of this increase took place during the 'energy crisis' period last winter," BLS observed, "but the bulk has occurred during the last four months." From August through December, the jobless rate rose 1.7 percentage points.

Virtually every worker group was affected by the increase in the nation's unemployment rate last month. Heads of households and full-time workers — the family breadwinners — saw their rates climb by six-tenths of 1 percent each to all-time highs of 4.5 and 6.8 percent, respectively.

The unemployment rate for adult men rose from 4.6 percent in November to 5.1 percent in December, while joblessness among adult women climbed from 6.6 to 7.2 percent. The rate for married men rose from 3.3 to 3.7 percent over the month.

Teenage unemployment rose a full percentage point to 18.3 percent from November to December. The jobless rate for workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs increased from 4.3 to 4.7 percent.

The rate for black workers rose 1.1 percent from November to December, and stood at 12.8 percent—exactly double the rate for whites.

"The job market for blue-collar workers continued to deteriorate—their rate moving from 8.2 to 9.4 percent—as did the situation for manufacturing and construction workers among the major industry categories," BLS noted.

The manufacturing jobless rate, at 8.6 percent last month, was double the year-earlier figure. The rise in factory unemployment was paced by heavy layoffs in the auto industry. The construction industry's 15 percent unemployment rate was the highest level since 1961.

While blue-collar workers were hit hardest by joblessness in December, white-collar workers experienced a rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in their rate.

At 4.1 percent, the rate was the highest recorded for this group since occupational statistics were first recorded on a monthly basis in 1958, BLS noted. The bulk of the white-collar increase occurred among sales workers and managers.

In addition to the increase in total joblessness, there was a surge in the number of persons working part time because they were unable to find full-time employment, BLS noted. Their number increased 141,000 to 3,354,000 from November to December.

The number of persons holding jobs in December declined for the third straight month. Total employment fell by 550,000 to 85.2 million.

15% Rate Shocks Building Trades

The 15 percent unemployment rate in the construction industry last month is "a shocking figure," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. declared.

The highest rate for the industry since 1961, it is really only an average, "since it runs 50 percent or more in many crafts in numerous communities," Georgine noted.

"It is our fervent hope it will shock the federal government—especially the administration of President Ford—into doing something meaningful right now," he said.

EPA Contests Labor Dept.'s Noise Standard

Organized labor's protest of the Labor Dept.'s proposed noise standard in workplaces is being reinforced by a challenge from the Environmental Protection Agency.

The AFL-CIO had called for an on-the-job noise limit of 85 decibels — the level recommended by EPA — to protect workers from hearing loss and other hazards leading to accidents.

But the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration in October proposed a noise standard of 90 decibels, which is about 75 percent louder than the lower level.

In issuing the challenge under the federal Noise Control Act, EPA said OSHA's noise rule would not protect "the public health and welfare to the extent required and feasible." EPA recommends the allowable noise level be reduced to 85 decibels over three years.

When OSHA announced the proposed 90-decibel standard, it said there was not sufficient data to support a reduction to the lower noise level sought by unions.

In disputing the proposal, union safety experts charged that OSHA was more concerned with employer costs than protecting the health of workers.

Job, Health, Tax Bills Head Labor's Agenda

Biemiller said the liberal gains in the congressional elections indicate that health insurance legislation enacted in the 94th Congress will be an improvement over the "slipshod" bill that might have been approved last year and that tax reform will be more comprehensive than the "little pip-squeak reform bill" that died in the 93rd Congress.

He noted that last year a voter registration bill that passed the Senate after a filibuster died in the House when a rule allowing the bill to come to the floor was beaten by six votes.

"I can't imagine that kind of legislation losing in the House in this new Congress," Biemiller said.

In the Senate, he suggested, a consumer agency bill killed by a filibuster last year, now "stands a very good chance of passage."

While the 94th Congress is not "veto-proof" since voting does not follow party lines, the makeup of the new Congress is more likely to produce the two-thirds majority needed to override vetoes. Because of that, Biemiller suggested, there are likely to be fewer vetoes.

Biemiller said he expects the Democratic leadership, particularly in the House, to be more active and try to take up the slack resulting from lack of presidential leadership.

He noted talk of an omnibus bill to deal with the economic crisis. But Biemiller, a former congressman, pointed out that the committee system of the House isn't set up to handle such an omnibus approach. Thus interest rates, which labor considers a key economic problem, fall into the jurisdiction of the House Banking Committee while taxes are dealt with by the Ways & Means Committee.

In terms of personal relationships, Biemiller agreed that the Ford White House is "more open" and that labor can "reach the President, and we intend to continue doing that."

But in terms of presidential action thus far to deal with the economic crisis, "we're not at all happy."

While awaiting the President's State of the Union message, the AFL-CIO is "skeptical" about the likelihood of a changed approach. The Administration's proposals will be dealt with at the AFL-CIO's enlarged General Board meeting a few days after the President's address to Congress, Biemiller said.

JOB-CREATING PROGRAMS top labor's agenda for the new Congress, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in a radio interview over the Mutual network. He was questioned by Neil MacNeil, left, of Time magazine and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

GOP Takes House Seat In Louisiana

Baton Rouge, La.—Republican W. Henson Moore III was elected to the House from Louisiana's 6th Congressional District in a rerun of last November's disputed election.

Moore polled 74,804 votes to 63,351 for Democrat Jeff LaCaze. Labor had backed LaCaze who defeated the ultra-conservative incumbent, John Rarick, in the Democratic primary.

Moore's 44-vote lead in the Nov. 5 election was thrown out because a malfunctioning voting machine failed to register votes cast for LaCaze. After several rounds of court battles, the entire election was rerun on Jan. 7.

The outcome left the makeup of the House in the new 94th Congress at 291 Democrats and 144 Republicans.

In New Hampshire, the state Supreme Court said it had no power to order a rerun of the senatorial election that ended in a virtual dead heat between Republican Louis Wyman and Democrat John Durkin. A recount gave Durkin a 10-vote victory; a state ballot commission countered by declaring Wyman the winner by two votes. The final decision is up to the Senate.

Ford Program Won't Solve Recession, Cure Inflation

Meany Says It's Unsupportable, Cites Inequitable Tax Proposals

By David L. Perlman

President Ford's economic program won't end the recession and get America back to work, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned. He said Congress should reject Ford's proposals because they would add to inflation without effectively stimulating the economy or generating jobs.

Ford "largely ignored the unanimous recommendations of his Labor-Management Advisory Committee" for a tax cut to build the purchasing power of low- and middle-income groups, Meany said.

Instead, the President's "clearly inequitable" income tax proposals would provide a "one-shot tax rebate" that would give the biggest benefits to the most affluent. And Meany charged that most families would pay more in price increases tied to the proposed oil tax than they would receive from the permanent tax cut sought by Ford.

He noted that the labor-management committee, on which he served along with leading business executives, decided against a cut in the corporate tax rate and instead adopted a compromise proposal for an increase in the investment tax credit. Ford's response was to propose both forms of tax aid to business.

The concept of a tax cut to provide purchasing power needed to stimulate economic recovery had widespread support—within Congress as well as among union and management leaders. But major differences emerged over the nature of the tax cut—and whether it alone would be sufficient to pull the nation out of a worsening recession.

A House Democratic task force made a stab at arriving at a common program, but refrained from filling in key details in deference to committee jurisdictions and a desire for unanimity.

Meany noted that labor's program will be fleshed out Jan. 23 when the AFL-CIO General Board meets "to recommend emergency measures that can, should and must be taken immediately to restore stability to the economy and get Americans back to work."

Democrats

The House Democratic leadership outlined an "action program" to revive the economy, but left to congressional committees the job of filling in many of the details.

Speaker Carl Albert said he expected the Ways & Means Committee to bring an emergency tax cut bill to the House floor within 60 days. He set a 90-day deadline for other major economic legislation.

The leadership program was developed by a 10-member task force that generally stated the problem forcefully and more mildly suggested some possible courses of action to the committees holding legislative jurisdiction.

Thus, it affirmed that "the quickest way to generate the added purchasing power needed to counter the current recession and to ease the burden of those most damaged by inflation is through tax relief for low- and middle-income families."

The report did not recommend the size of such a tax cut and it listed a wide variety of methods of accomplishing a tax reduction.

It added that the revenue loss "should be recouped to the extent possible by closing the loopholes that now enable large corporations and wealthy individuals to pay little or no taxes."

Its interest rate statement was somewhat more specific, urging both action by the Federal Reserve Board to bring down interest rates and a program of credit allocation to housing and other job-creating, needed programs.

Committee

A unanimous labor-management advisory committee told President Ford that the biggest share of tax relief should go to families with low- and middle-level incomes.

It proposed a two-part package of tax reductions "to turn the direction of the economy around" by increasing buying power and stimulating business recovery.

The prestige of the committee members and the fact that normally they are on opposite sides of the table added to the impact of an agreement reflecting "a special need for a sense of community and working together in the national interest at this time."

From the labor side were AFL-CIO President George

Ford

President Ford asked Congress for a complex mixture of tax cuts and tax increases in order "to bolster business and industry and to create new jobs."

Ford acknowledged that the State of the Union is "not good" with millions unemployed and prices "too high."

His solution is to raise prices further through a stiff fuel tax, lower both individual and corporation income taxes, and put a tight lid on government spending. Ford asked Congress to limit cost-of-living increases required by law for government workers and retirees, and for millions receiving social security or railroad retirement benefits.

1.1 Million Jobs Erased Over Two-Month Span

By Rex Hardesty

New government figures for the end of 1974 reveal that the nation lost a devastating total of 1.1 million jobs in just two months.

As a result, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, total U.S. employment in December 1974 was actually below what it was in December 1973—wiping out an entire year of the economic growth necessary to sustain an expanding population.

The BLS had previously reported that the nation's unemployment rate had hit 7.1 percent in December, a 13-year high. But the drop in overall employment gives a new dimension of the depth of the recession, since total U.S. employment can continue to go up even when the jobless percentage is rising.

But the total employment was 77.7 million in December, a drop of 675,000 from November. That followed on the heels of a 465,000 drop in the previous month for the two-month total of 1.1 million. In December 1973, total employment was 77.9 million, or 200,000 higher.

Declines in employment were most severe in manufacturing industries, which lost a two-month total of 804,000 jobs from October

Breakthrough Pacts Won at 4 Oil Firms

Denver — Four major oil producers have agreed to settlements with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers on new contracts that provide basic wage increases of nearly 27 percent over two years.

The breakthrough agreements in this year's nationwide bargaining cover more than 21,500 OCAW members employed by Gulf Oil Co., Atlantic Richfield Co., American Oil Co. and Texaco.

Meanwhile, the union has struck the Beaumont, Tex., refinery of Mobil Oil Co. and has served strike notices on other selected Mobil installations across the country.

House Democrats Vote New Era on Chairmen

House Democrats voted to replace two veteran committee chairmen in a major break with a once-rigid seniority tradition. A secret ballot vote of the Democratic caucus rejected the renomination of F. Edward Hebert of Louisiana as chairman of the Armed Services Committee and W. R. Poage as chairman of the Agriculture Committee. Both actions were taken by close votes.

Committee chairmen are formally elected by the House, but the unvarying custom has been routine approval of the choices made by the majority party.

Under recently rewritten caucus rules, committee chairmen are initially nominated by the House Democratic steering committee and then presented to the full Democratic caucus for an up or down vote. If a Steering Committee choice is rejected, the panel then submits a new name for consideration. But if this happens, additional nominations can be made from the floor.

Thus, the Steering Committee will propose alternatives to the full

Oilers Name McNamara as New President

Louisville, Ky. — John J. McNamara was elected president of the Firemen & Oilers at a special meeting of the union's executive board here. He fills the unexpired term of the late William E. Fredenberger, who died Jan. 6.

Board members also elected George J. Francisco, a vice president, to succeed McNamara as secretary-treasurer.

McNamara has been a member of the Firemen & Oilers since 1934 and served as a local business representative in the Boston area for 26 years.

He was appointed a vice president in 1950 and continued in that post until his election as secretary-treasurer in 1965. He was re-elected at union conventions in 1966 and 1971.

McNamara's father was a former president of the international and his brother had been a business representative for 32 years.

Francisco, a member of the union for 34 years, held a number of key posts with Local 520 in Harmon, N.Y., and also served as president of the union's New York state branch.

He was appointed to the executive board in 1967 and re-elected a vice president at the union's 1971 convention.

NLRB Reports Busiest Year On Record

The National Labor Relations Board handled a record 42,373 cases in the fiscal year ended last June. Most of the cases stemmed from charges of unfair labor practices.

The caseload included 1,296 more cases than in fiscal 1973, the agency's previous record year.

Of the total, 27,726 cases involved charges that employers or unions, or both, had committed unfair practices in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. This was 4.7 percent more than the 26,487 such cases processed a year earlier.

Petitions for employe secret-ballot representation elections totaled 14,082, up slightly from 14,032 the year before. The remainder of the caseload included union-shop de-authorization petitions, amendments to certification petitions and unit clarification petitions.

Through its 31 regional offices, the NLRB distributed $8,445,840 in back pay to 7,041 employes found to have been discriminated against in violation of the federal labor law, the agency noted in its 39th annual report. Of 4,778 workers who were illegally discharged and offered reinstatement, 2,828 accepted.

The board closed 41,100 cases during the year, with a record number of 27,106 stemming from unfair practice charges.

Most of the closings occurred at the regional office level through voluntary settlements or adjustments by the parties involved, voluntary withdrawals or administrative dismissals.

A total of 8,976 conclusive elections of all types were conducted by the NLRB during the fiscal year. In those elections where workers decided whether to have a labor organization as a bargaining representative, unions won in 4,273 proceedings, or 51 percent, the board reported.

Meany Cites Slaughter Of Vietnamese Unionists

AFL-CIO President George Meany said that a refusal by the United States to extend further aid to South Vietnam "would undoubtedly stop the fighting but most certainly not stop killing."

Meany's statement came in a letter to President Ford, congressional leaders of both parties and key members of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees of Congress. Meany included in his letter a cable he had received from Tran Quoc Buu, president of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT).

Buu cabled Meany that two CVT province leaders "and thousands of members of our rubber plantation workers' union, all civilians, (were) slaughtered by Communists, who were backed by Russian tanks, artillery and limitless ammunition" during the fall of Phuoc Binh.

Buu said that if the "Communists are allowed to dominate (the) country . . . there is no place for anti-Communists to go in South Vietnam but to (a) firing squad."

The text of Meany's letter:

The following telegram was received this morning from the President of the South Vietnam's free trade union movement, Mr. Tran Quoc Buu:

"Dear President Meany:

"South Vietnam's free trade union movement has taken another hard blow. Phuoc Binh's fall and resulting Communist capture of Phuoc Long province is disappointing military setback and another flagrant violation of Paris agreement.

"More important than a military loss for we lost two more CVT province leaders and thousands of members of our rubber plantation workers' union, all civilians, slaughtered by Communists who were backed by Russian tanks, artillery and limitless ammunition. I ask you to kindly tell your countrymen that without sufficient ammunition and supplies our brave soldiers cannot hope to hold back the bloodthirsty Communist horde. CVT will be first casualty if Communists are allowed to dominate country. This will be our destiny based on experience of 1954 when all union brothers in the north were jailed or disappeared after Communist takeover. We cannot escape to the south as in 1954. There is no place for anti-Communists to go in South Vietnam but to firing squad. Please tell your people that our only hope is for American government to provide us the necessary support for without it the world Communist conspiracy will add one more satellite to its orbit. Tran Quoc Buu."

I am sending this for your information as, within the last few days, a responsible leader in the Congress was quoted as saying that the refusal to extend further American aid to South Vietnam would certainly bring an end to the fighting and the killing.

It is obvious from the wire from the leader of the South Vietnam free labor movement that such refusal would undoubtedly stop the fighting but most certainly not stop the killing.

IBEW Official Paul Menger Dies

Paul H. Menger, director of manufacturing operations for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, died Jan. 11 at Northern Virginia Doctors Hospital. He was 55.

Menger had been a member of the IBEW since 1940 and held a number of key offices in Local 1127 in Richmond, Ind., following service in World War II. He was named an international representative in 1948 and appointed to head the manufacturing operations department in 1955.

He also served as a member of the U.S. worker delegation to the International Labor Organization. Survivors include one son and one daughter.

Growth Wiped Out:

Total Employment Drops Over Year

to December. Continuing a year-long decline, construction jobs were off another 50,000 in December, a total loss of 305,000 jobs from the same month the year before.

Retail trade lost 135,000 jobs, but overall employment in the service-producing sector was up 1.3 million for the year—a figure which was more than offset by the 1.5 million job loss in manufacturing.

In another survey, covering the final quarter of 1974, the Labor Dept. also found a "sharp increase" in the number of discouraged workers, defined by the bureau as workers who want a job but have given up hunting because they don't think they can find one.

That figure rose to 850,000, up from 592,000 in the third quarter.

The total job loss between quarters was put at only one-half million on a quarterly basis, reflecting the sharply declining economy in December, the final month of the quarter being reported. Thus the tailspin in employment at the end of the quarter indicates a worsening picture to carry into the first quarter of 1974.

The employment situation in December 1974 also showed a drop in the average workweek, including a dip below 40 hours in manufacturing for the second straight month, while average weekly earnings for production or nonsupervisory workers in nonfarm employment increased 1.2 percent for the month, up 6.9 percent over December 1973.

The make-up of the year-end decline in manufacturing jobs showed about an equal amount of loss between the durable and nondurable industries.

The 335,000 jobs lost in durable goods manufacturing between November and December was led by drops of 70,000 jobs in electrical equipment, 65,000 in transportation equipment, 55,000 in primary metals and 50,000 in fabricated metals.

In nondurable goods, the loss was led by 55,000 in apparel, with rubber and plastics, textiles and chemicals also suffering losses termed "sizable" by the Labor Dept.

The quarter-to-quarter comparison of labor force developments showed a 4 percent unemployment rate among heads of household, up from 2.8 percent the previous year and 3.2 percent in the previous quarter.

For female heads of household—traditionally among the lowest-paid workers in the nation—the unemployment rate was 6.8 percent, up from 5 percent the previous quarter.

Other figures showed jobless rates of:

- 11.8 percent for all blacks, compared to 8.6 percent the year before and a current 5.9 percent rate for whites.
- 8.2 percent for those of Spanish origin.
- 36.6 percent for Negro teenagers and 15.2 percent for white teenagers.
- 13.1 percent for the youngest category (20-24) of veterans, compared to 9.5 percent for young non-veterans.

Safety Council's R. M. Wilkins Dies

Chicago—Robert M. Wilkins, secretary of the National Safety Council's Labor Conference and manager of the NSC labor department, died Jan. 5 after a long bout with cancer.

Wilkins, 51, had been a member of the Machinists and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Before he joined the NSC in 1958, Wilkins was a safety and process engineer and a tool and die maker. He headed the safety council's labor department since 1962.

Entertainment Unions Set Guidelines On Bicentennial Cultural Exchanges

American entertainment unions have reached agreement on a program to provide a multinational cultural exchange of theatrical and musical events for the 1975-76 bicentennial celebration.

Guidelines for the staffing and production of the events in the United States and in foreign countries were worked out in discussions with the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees and the World Theater Festival.

The agreement was announced by Hal C. Davis, chairman of the council's Arts, Entertainment & Media Industries Committee, following discussions with Alexander H. Cohen, producer of the festival.

Davis said the understanding was developed over the council's concern that the economic interests of American performers and cultural groups should not be impaired by the indiscriminate importation of foreign artists and troupes.

"We are confident that if these guidelines are observed," Davis said, "new and meaningful employment opportunities will be opened to American theater companies while the American public will be assured of opportunities to experience truly unique and distinguished presentations of the world's finest foreign-language theater."

A key provision of the understanding is the arrangement for eight-week tours of five top American resident theater companies in foreign countries, Davis noted.

American troupes making the foreign tours will be the Arena Stage of Washington, D.C., American Conservatory Theater of San Francisco, the Negro Ensemble Co. of New York, the Tyrone Guthrie Theater of Minneapolis and the New Phoenix Repertory Co. of New York. Appearances are scheduled for Edinburgh, London, Paris, Oslo, Belgrade, Tel Aviv and Rome.

While the U.S. companies are on their foreign tours, distinguished groups from other countries will perform in American cities during the bicentennial celebration.

The agreement also provides for a domestic touring schedule for the five American companies.

Other highlights:

- No more than 12 foreign troupes performing in English and foreign languages will be involved. To assure that English-speaking foreign companies will not deprive American companies of employment, the size and length of engagements of U.S. companies on foreign tours will match those of foreign groups touring the United States.
- No public funds will be solicited or used for the appearance of any foreign group.
- Foreign companies will not be permitted to monopolize the use of American stages for extended periods, jeopardizing appearances of domestic groups. Foreign engagements will be limited to five weeks in any theater or hall.
- Unions maintain their right to negotiate and administer collective bargaining agreements conforming to their own policies.

Participating in the discussions in addition to Davis, who is the president of the Musicians, were representatives of Actors' Equity, Theatrical Stage Employes, Television & Radio Artists and the Musical Artists.

The World Theater Festival is expected to cost about $5 million, with contributions coming from the American Revolution Bicentennial Administration and donors.

Michigan Is First:

State Jobless Rates Near Double Digits

Michigan has stepped over the threshhold and California and New Jersey are feared to be near a new milestone in the nation's economic disaster—double-digit unemployment.

With one of every three blue-collar workers in Detroit now estimated to be on layoff of some type, the state of Michigan reported an 11.2 percent jobless rate for December.

Double-digit inflation has been going on for months, with the December consumer price index expected to show calendar year 1974 with a cost-of-living increase rate in excess of 12 percent.

But until the massive layoffs of late 1974 in the automobile industry started to show in the Michigan jobless rate, no state had crossed into double-digit unemployment.

The figures aren't in for New Jersey for December, but its unemployment rate stood at 9.5 percent in November, leaving the possibility of joining Michigan in double figures before the end of 1974.

California's unemployment rate stood at 9 percent in December, and according to a United Press International survey of states, California officials are pessimistic about what the next month's figures will show.

Workers in Illinois and Texas have fared the best. In November, Texas had an unemployment rate of 4.8 percent and the Illinois figure was 5.4 percent, both under the 7.1 percent rate the nation hit in December.

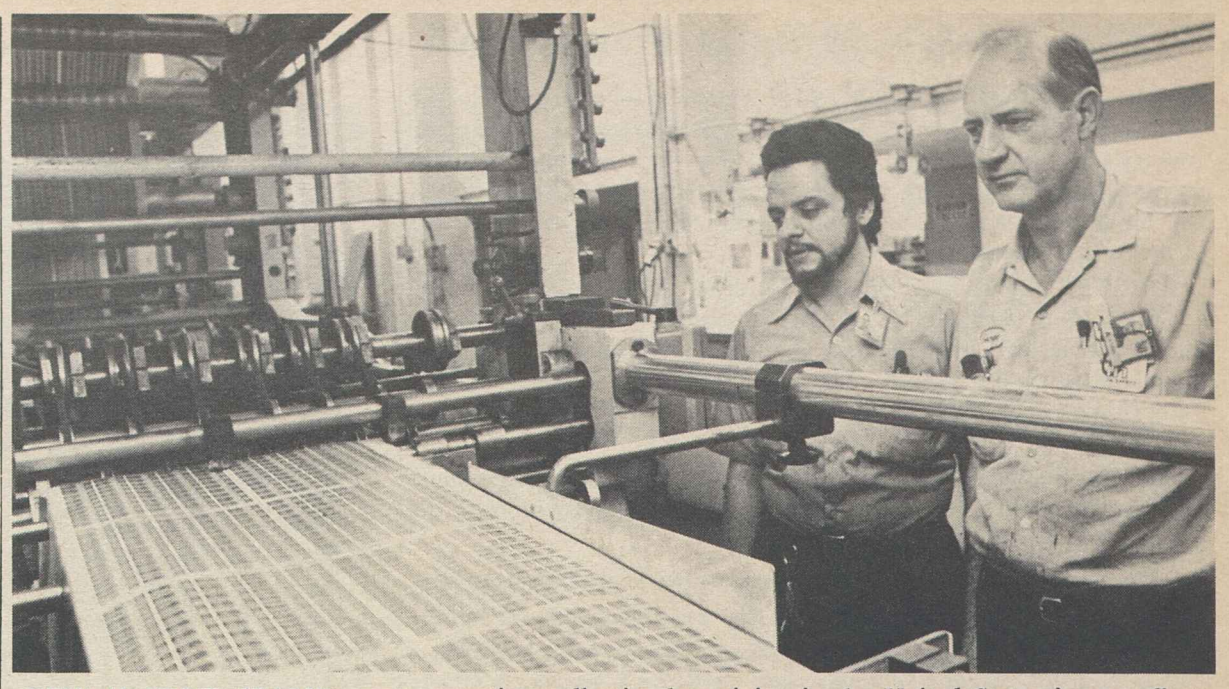
Two of the other largest industrial states, New York and Ohio, fell in between, better off than the national average but well above the Texas and Illinois rates. New York's jobless rate was 6.8 percent in November while Ohio, which has the second largest concentration of auto manufacturers, jumped from 6.1 percent unemployed in November to 6.8 percent in December.

The big three of auto manufacturing, Chrysler, Ford and General Motors, began their first full week of 1975 production with 244,000 of their normal 669,000 assembly workers laid off.

Other than the auto industry, the biggest layoffs were coming in copper mining, and news of recession level unemployment in Canada was keeping abreast of the United States—where 1.1 million jobs were lost in the last two months of 1974 and government figures showed a civilian labor force in December of less than December 1973.

Production of copper was scheduled to be cut back by about 9 percent by the Phelps Dodge Corp. at its four major western mines, and Bethlehem Copper announced plans for staged layoffs at its Canadian mines.

In other cutbacks and layoffs, the GAF Corp. said it had laid off or put on short-time about 2,700 workers, or 23 percent of its total production workers; operating companies of American Telephone & Telegraph in New Jersey and New England were reporting further layoffs, and the Chicopee Manufacturing Co. said it was closing its Manchester, N.H., cotton-textile plant, terminating 450 workers.



NEW 10-CENT STAMP commemorating collective bargaining in the United States is run off at the Bureau of Engraving & Printing. Monitoring the press run of 150 million copies of the stamp are members of Machinists Local 2135 Robert Calvert, left, and George Schmerbeck. The stamp will go on sale at post offices in a few months.

NLRB Issues Bargaining Order To Western Union Subsidiaries

A company cannot decentralize its operations into separate units in an attempt to replace union workers with non-union employes and then refuse to deal with the recognized bargaining agent of the parent firm's staff.

Western Union Corp. got that message from a National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge, who found the company guilty of unfair labor practices and ordered it to bargain with the Telegraph Workers.

Even though Western Union was split up into six different firms, NLRB Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig ruled that the company is still "a single integrated enterprise and a single employer for the purposes of collective bargaining."

Western Union began its restructuring operation in 1970 by transferring many of its functions to newly incorporated non-union companies. But all along, it continued to operate as a single integrated entity, the NLRB decision noted.

Western Union not only failed to notify the Telegraph Workers in advance about its fragmentation operation, Ladwig said, "but it concealed from the union the plans to operate the new companies on a non-union basis until after the 1971 collective bargaining negotiations."

It all started with the Western Union Telegraph Co., which the Telegraph Workers had organized in 1945, except for the New York division that is represented by a different union.

But after 1970, came the Western Union Corp., a holding company that eventually took over the telegraph company and operated it as a subsidiary. Other companies that emerged in the corporate fragmentation were the Western Union Realty Corp., Western Union Data Services Co., Inc., Teleprocessing Industries, Inc., and Gift America, Inc.

As the new corporations became functional, non-bargaining unit personnel were transferred to the firms. But the telegraph company continued to provide the necessary facilities, services and bargaining unit workers to carry on the operations.

The NLRB findings noted that many of the inter-company contractual arrangements were on a verbal basis and that even after arrangements were put in writing, they were often back-dated—months after the services had begun.

The Telegraph Workers soon became aware that its members were being replaced by non-union workers who were employed in jobs normally held by union members.

But when the union sought to bargain for all units in the 1973 contract negotiations, Western Union refused, declaring that the subsidiary firms were "separate and distinct" companies.

Since the Western Union reorganization began, it's estimated that the number of workers represented by the union had dropped to about 12,000—about half of the original representation.

Ladwig concluded that the issue in the case is not whether the fragmentation of the company was necessary or good for business practice, but whether the overall certified bargaining unit remained intact.

Despite the various reasons cited by the company for "corporate restructuring," Ladwig said that NLRB findings established there is an interrelation of operations, centralized control of labor relations, common management, common ownership and financial control of the six companies.

He concluded that Western Union's refusal to recognize the Telegraph Workers as the collective bargaining representative for the employes of the six companies is a violation of federal labor law.

Grape, Lettuce Boycott Given Worldwide Focus

A solid front of support for the Farm Workers is being built with an expanding international consumer boycott of non-UFW California grapes and lettuce.

AFL-CIO President George Meany alerted labor officials of the Scandinavian countries of the need for additional support of the UFW grape and lettuce boycott.

In a message to trade union officials in Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, Meany said the AFL-CIO would appreciate an expression of solidarity with the UFW through the observance of the consumer boycott.

Meany was assured by the Nordic trade union council that a study had been conducted to determine the most effective approach in supporting the UFW effort.

The worldwide focus of the boycott was given additional impetus by a resolution adopted by the executive board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

All affiliates of the ICFTU were urged to organize boycotts in their home countries during January and February and to take "any further action that may be appropriate in their national circumstances."

The added emphasis of the boycott in European countries stems from the expectation that growers will attempt to unload surplus grapes and lettuce left unsold in the United States and Canada because of the effectiveness of the AFL-CIO consumer boycott, which also has the support of the Auto Workers and the Canadian Labor Congress.

UFW President Cesar Chavez informed the ICFTU that the growers had 7.9 million boxes of grapes in cold storage in 1974, compared to 4.6 million the year before when there was no boycott.

Chavez warned that there is increasing danger the growers will dump the unsold grapes on the European market.

In addition to the ICFTU action, the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural & Allied Workers pledged efforts to reinforce the UFW struggle for survival against the growers and Teamsters.

Spouse of Auxiliaries Director Dies at 64

Donald K. Porter, husband of Novella Porter, executive director of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, died at Georgetown University Hospital in Washington after a short illness. He was 64.

Porter retired in 1969 after 40 years as a journeyman electrician in the Washington area. In addition to Mrs. Porter he is survived by a son and daughter and four grandchildren.

Four Major Oil Firms Reach Pattern Accords

Local OCAW units were also preparing to strike facilities of Ashland Oil Co., Standard Oil of Ohio and the Union Oil Co.

However, negotiations were continuing with several other major producers and a number of smaller oil firms. All of the union's 430 local contracts covering 60,000 workers expired Jan. 7.

Gulf Oil was the first of the major producers to reach accord with the union. The Gulf settlement came Jan. 10 and was described by OCAW President A. F. Grospiron as a "good, heavy package" that would become the "minimum standard" for other companies.

The Arco agreement came late Jan. 14, a few hours after an earlier company proposal had been rejected by OCAW negotiators because it did not meet the standard of the Gulf pattern.

Agreement was reached with Amoco and Texaco Jan. 16. The union said the Arco, Amoco and Texaco agreements meet or exceed the minimum standards of the Gulf contract in wages and fringe benefits.

Under the newly-negotiated agreements, OCAW members receive an immediate increase of 75 cents an hour plus a 4 percent raise in July. An additional 8 percent increase will go into effect next January.

Inflation protection is also provided in the second year of the contract through a wage reopener clause, which will become effective after the government's consumer price index rises 5 percent above the Jan. 1, 1976, level. If no agreement is reached on wages, the union will be free to strike.

Average wages will increase under the two-year formula from $5.83 an hour under the old contracts to $7.39 an hour effective next January, the union said.

The new agreements also reduce the effective retirement age from 62 to 60 without a reduction in benefits. But a 5 percent reduction in benefits will be applied for each year below age 60.

The pension benefits formula will be based on the three highest consecutive years paid in the last 10 years before retirement, compared to the five highest years of the last 10 under the old agreements.

The new minimum pension benefits will be $10 per month for every year of service.

The four firms agreed to increase contributions to medical insurance for families by $15 a month—$7.50 effective immediately and a similar amount next January. Contributions for individual members will increase $2.50 now and $2.50 next year for a total of $5.

A 10th paid holiday, still to be determined, is included in the benefits package.

The 94th's Bright Promise

THE OPENING OF THE 94th Congress—some call it the bicentennial Congress because it will be meeting during the country's 200th celebration of its founding—is a moment of bright promise. For the first time in a decade the House of Representatives will have a more liberal complexion and the Senate will continue to move in a liberal direction.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller says the 1974 elections produced a net shift of about 40 members "to the liberal persuasion" in the House along with an improvement in the liberal thrust of the Senate. The result may be the passage in the 94th Congress of labor-backed legislation that fell short by a few votes in the 93rd.

And the liberal margins may be helpful both in overriding some of President Ford's promised vetoes as well as possibly limiting the number coming from the White House.

The question still remains, however, "how liberal" will be the final record of the 94th Congress. The result depends on many variables, including the leadership that emerges from the Congress and the quality of leadership offered by President Ford and the White House.

The type of confrontation coupled with indifferent leadership that marked the relationship between former President Nixon and the last Congress will obviously fall far short of the sort of cooperation and accommodation needed to pull the country out of the current recession, to put America back to work at decent jobs for decent wages.

THERE IS A LONG AGENDA of unfinished business carried over from the 93rd Congress, and while the improved liberal complexion of the new Congress may help bring decisive action on job creation programs, tax reform and national health insurance, among other issues, the role of the White House and its generally conservative approach to policy problems pose a major hurdle.

How the Congress acquits itself will reflect in large part the influence of the new members elected in 1974, an election that was marked by a number of departures from conventional political wisdom and faith.

The elections disclosed, for example, that coattails apparently vanished as a factor, and ticket-splitting and sophisticated voter selectivity reached "epidemic proportions." It demonstrated also that a small vote, once thought to be routinely conservative, was more often than not a liberal vote in 1974.

The 1974 elections, because of the Watergate climate that dominated the period, brought out the largest field of superior liberal candidates in memory, mostly Democrats, resulting in part in the new liberal flavor of the House.

The Class of 1974, writes COPE Research Director Mary Goddard Zon, "will include some of the most attractive and best prepared new congressmen in recent history."

This is the moment of bright promise then that marks the opening of the 94th Congress. And all of that promise, along with the grueling, dedicated work of shaping necessary legislation to turn the country around will be needed in the next two years.

There is no better way for this Congress to truly become a bicentennial Congress.

Revival of Gunboat Diplomacy Pops Up in Mideast War Talk

By John P. Roche

RIGHT NOW Washington seems to be full of tigers eager and willing to use force to protect "western civilization" from the Arab oil cartel. As I suggested here, I don't think any of these fire-eaters have bothered to look at a map or to assess the extent to which our conventional war capacity has been run down since the "arsenal of democracy" was turned into the "military-industrial complex." All this loose talk makes me decidedly nervous: It reminds me too much of the national mood about Southeast Asia in the early and middle 1960s. There is also the same correlation between militancy and distance from the shooting.

Back in the winter of 1964-65, for example, the Army Chief of Staff and the Commandant of the Marine Corps took a very dim view of prospects in Vietnam. Indeed, they were telling every friendly journalist—notably Hanson Baldwin of the Times—that Vietnam would involve a million American soldiers. These were the men whose troops would be out there in the bush.

But this pessimism was frowned on, and fortuitously the Air Force and the Navy were out there front and center with their plan for a cut-rate war. Working in tandem with enthusiastic civilians in the Dept. of Defense, State and the White House (whom we skeptics dubbed the "Air Marshals"), they convinced the President that airpower could "punish" Hanoi into behaving nicely towards Saigon. I think they honestly believed that the minute U.S. planes buzzed North Vietnam, Ho Chi Minh would come running out with a white flag.

Similarly, discussions today seem to assume the full cooperation of a potential enemy. Our whole NATO strategy (to the extent that we have one) is founded on Soviet cooperation (or "rationality" as the game planners put it). The scenario runs roughly as follows: 1) the Warsaw Pact powers attack with overwhelming conventional strength; 2) NATO, faced with defeat, utilizes very small and well-targeted nuclear weapons to indicate to the Soviets that we are serious; 3) the Soviets recognize that we are serious and call off the invasion.

This is delightfully "rational," but suppose those nasty irrational Russians take a different tack: Instead of going to the conference table to negotiate, they let go with their tactical nukes—which are big, poorly targeted, and dirty. Rather than carefully destroying tank parks or airfields, they turn most of the cities of Western Europe into radioactive ashes. Then what do we do? Will we be "rational" and, realizing that the Soviets are serious, go to the negotiating table? Or would we launch a central nuclear war? (That is, loose the ICBMs and other strategic nuclear systems on the Soviet heartland.)

The reason I raise this appalling question is my conviction that there can be no such thing as "limited" nuclear war unless you work out in advance with the enemy all the rules to be followed (and provide them with small, "clean," nuclear warheads). To state the proposition is to negate it—while in a war game you can program the enemy, in a war he plays his own hand.

THE SCENARIOS that are now being discussed in Georgetown circles have the same ring of unreality. The underlying assumption is that Moscow would sit idly by as our armed forces occupy Libya, the Persian Gulf, or Saudi Arabia. Presumably the Politburo has a shared concern for the survival of "western civilization." I believe the contrary: that Moscow would see such insane adventurism as the perfect pretext for consolidating its power in the Middle East and Gulf region.

The first obvious item on the agenda would be the extermination of Israel while our mobile forces were off on some oily diversion. Lord knows, we had trouble enough last time getting emergency supplies to Israel—indeed, we had trouble finding the stuff to send without drawing down our own stocks. If we were engaged ourselves in military operations, our needs would take precedence.

I have avoided the moral question for the simple reason that this revival of gunboat diplomacy is worse than immoral; it is stupid. Maybe I run pessimistic, but I am prepared flatly to predict that any military safari in search of oil would in the long run cost more than laying out $11 a barrel to the Arabs. So let's stop the silly talk and start digging coal.

Layoffs Plunge Michigan Into Despair

Detroit — Michigan is well on its way to becoming the nation's number one unemployment disaster area unless quick government action is taken to bolster the economy.

Figures released early this month by the Michigan Employment Security Commission showed there were 430,300 jobless workers in the state during December, amounting to 11.2 percent of the work force.

And those figures don't tell the whole story. They were based on computations made through Dec. 13. Since that time layoffs have steadily mounted, mainly in auto and auto supplier plants, but also extending into nearly every portion of the state's economy.

At his Jan. 7 announcement of the December jobless figures, Employment Security Director S. Martin Taylor reported that "every week for the past four weeks, we have had over 50,000 new applicants for unemployment benefits."

The December unemployment rate, according to Taylor, is the highest for Michigan since MESC began keeping comparable records in 1956. It is more than double the December 1973 rate of 5.4 percent.

Things are worst in the state's auto producing centers. The six-county area of Metropolitan Detroit had a jobless rate of 12.4 percent for December. The number of unemployed rose from 174,700 in November to 229,300, an increase of 54,600 in one month.

Flint, where the workforce at the huge Buick plant has dropped by more than 50 percent in the past year, is estimated to have at least a 12 percent unemployment rate. Saginaw, Muskegon and other, smaller Michigan cities dominated by the auto industry, also have higher jobless rates than the state as a whole.

The so-called ripple effect of auto layoffs has swamped the construction industry.

Unionists in the building trades estimate that 25 percent of their members are out of work.

Pete McManus, business agent for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 17 in Detroit, observed: "We were wiped out the day before Christmas."

That was when, according to McManus, private contractors shut down construction jobs, leaving Local 17 with only 20 members working out of 800 who had been employed by the contractors.

The Jobs Crisis

McManus is bitter at what the slump has done to the union's program to train new journeymen.

"Last year they said the country needed 10,000 more linemen to maintain our energy needs. Our local graduated 150 journeymen linemen. Now every one of them is out of work, and I don't expect to see many of them ever return to the trade even if times get better.

"We're going to pay for this in the future," McManus concluded.

Retail stores throughout the state are beginning to cut payrolls as sales decline. Two of Michigan's biggest retailers, J. L. Hudson and Sears Roebuck, both have pink-slipped employes.

Food stores, too, are contributing to the economic decline. Horace Brown, president of the 23,000-member Retail Clerks Local 876, says that while supermarkets have had few layoffs, working hours have been cut from 5 to 7 percent "and that means our members are earning less."

Brown feels that supermarkets "panicked." So far, grocery sales have not dropped, he says. "Food is the last place people cut back, but store owners began reducing hours when the auto layoffs first began."

Ironically, the layoffs have helped Local 876 in its organizing drive at J. L. Hudson and the remaining unorganized Sears stores. Workers at the non-union stores, seeing their supposed job security threatened, have been signing up in the union at an unprecedented rate.

Jobs in the public sector, traditionally considered "safe," have not been exempt from the Michigan slump.

The city of Detroit, already suffering from declining revenues, laid off 1,500 workers shortly after the first of the year. Those furloughed ranged from sanitation workers and zoo attendants to attorneys.

Walter Oliver, president of Council 55 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, which represents city, county, township and school workers outside the Detroit area, reports that layoffs have hit his union membership "everywhere from Ann Arbor to the Upper Peninsula."

The cutbacks, Oliver says, have been in every type of employment classification and at every level of government, affecting hospital facilities, road commissions, schools and municipal governments.

The only place where the job market has shown an upturn is at the Michigan Employment Security Commission.

More than 1,000 additional workers have been hired to service the growing number of unemployed, with another 400 due to be added during this month.

MESC has also opened 24 additional offices throughout the state, but even with these in operation the lines of claimants are long, often extending out into the streets.

Thousands of workers, many off work since the energy "crisis" a year ago, had exhausted all their unemployment benefits by the time the Federal Supplemental Benefits program went into effect in Michigan this month. This program can provide up to 13 additional weeks of benefits, and claims offices were jammed the week it went into operation.

No one really knows yet how deep the suffering of Michigan's jobless goes. Unemployment compensation and supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) have enabled many laid-off workers and their families at least to keep their heads above water. Younger workers, many of them ineligible for full compensation benefits or SUB payments, are worse off.

There is genuine alarm in the state as to what will happen if the job situation does not improve. SUB funds are reported to be dangerously low and benefit exhaustions are certain to rise.

The articles that appear on this and the following three pages attempt to clothe the cold government statistics with facts on how the nation's surging unemployment is affecting its people.

The statistics alone are enough to prove that America is in trouble. But behind them lie thousands of stories of human tragedy, family disruptions and economically stricken communities.

The reports on these pages, gathered from various regions of the country, are linked by a common and ominous theme—the mood of fear and desperation that is quietly but steadily building in America as the jobless rolls grow.

Jobless Rate 'Tip of Iceberg'

Official Labor Dept. reports counting more than 6.5 million American workers as unemployed in December, 7.1 percent of the labor force, are really only "the tip of the iceberg," according to AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts.

Roberts noted the following disturbing facts underlying recent unemployment statistics:

- A 62 percent increase in the past 12 months in the number of household heads officially counted as unemployed. In December, 2,379,000 heads of households were jobless.
- A 68 percent increase during the same period in the number of married men counted unemployed in December—nearly 1.5 million as compared with 872,000 in December 1973.
- A 77 percent increase in the number of workers unemployed 15 weeks and over from December 1973 to December 1974.

The Labor Dept. also reported that 845,000 workers were "discouraged" in the fourth quarter of 1974—an increase of 250,000 over the third quarter. "Discouraged workers" are those who want a job but have stopped looking because they think work is not available.

This bloc of "hidden unemployed" doesn't show up in the department's monthly releases because to be counted as unemployed a worker has to be seeking work.

Roberts estimated the true number of "hidden unemployed" at nearly double the Bureau of Labor Statistics estimate—or about 1.5 million workers.

Even sticking with official figures, Roberts pointed out that more than 10.7 million people have job problems in America —6.5 million unemployed, 850,000 "hidden unemployed" and 3.35 million working part-time for economic reasons.

"With recent layoffs since the December unemployment figures were collected and with the understating of the number of discouraged workers, I estimate 12 million people with serious job problems," Roberts said.

"This suggests a 13 percent 'real' unemployment rate—or one of every eight workers unemployed or underemployed."

Roberts said the two-month rise of 1 million unemployed for November and December is "unmatched, extraordinary" in post World War II years.

Unemployment among blacks and other minorities, he continued, is also higher than at any time since the post-World War II years—12.8 percent in December — and inner-city unemployment is even higher.

He also noted that only 22 percent of the industries surveyed by BLS are hiring today. A year ago 75 percent were hiring.

When President Ford announced his "WIN" program in October, Roberts concluded, there were 86.5 million civilian jobs in the United States. In December, the number of jobs had dropped by 1,335,000.

Jobless Disaster Threatens California

Job Lines Growing Longer As Slump Batters Chicago

Chicago — Widespread unemployment hit Chicago before Christmas like a bitter winter storm.

Newly laid-off workers express a mood of resignation verging on despair as they stand in long, slow-moving lines to file claims for benefits at the state unemployment compensation office, just south of the loop.

A 52-year-old machine operator in a muffler plant with 11 years seniority said, "We knew it was coming. We'd been on four days for several weeks. They called us all together around 3:30 Monday and said, 'That's it.'" We asked them how long and they said they didn't know. They shut the whole plant down indefinitely."

He will get about $60 a week unemployment. "It's not enough to live on hardly, but we'll have to make out somehow."

A 26-year-old woman who packed carburetors said, "I think we're close to a depression."

A 65-year-old woman standing nearby said, "They won't hire you if you are 65. I've been everywhere, I already used up my 26 weeks. First you get 26 weeks of unemployment compensation, then if you work for awhile you can come back and get another 13 weeks. I'm on the 13 weeks. I am still looking for work every day. Somehow I'll make it."

"The lines are longer every week," said a 40-year-old factory worker, among 400 laid off at his plant. "I've been to seven places already today (it was 11 a.m.) and it's the same everywhere: 'We just filled it,' 'Nothing open,' 'Not hiring.'"

A 26-year-old bank teller echoed: "There's nothing open. I looked and looked. I borrow from my mother to get by. Unemployment's not enough."

A 38-year-old shipping clerk with six children said, "They give you a little bit more (in unemployment compensation benefits) for each child. But only up to four children. For the 5th and 6th, there's nothing added. What's the matter? Aren't they supposed to eat too?" He had visited 40 places in three days looking for work.

A 30-year-old nursing home attendant said, "If you got kids, you're in trouble." He was among 40 employes laid off "indefinitely" because of a business slowdown and cost cutting drive.

Many city workers said there were jobs in the suburbs. But in the unemployment office in suburban Maywood, west of the city, the lines were just as long and the worry just as piercing.

A jobless Sheet Metal Worker with four teenage children, who will get the maximum in weekly benefits, $105, said, "More than half of my local is out of work right now. We'll just have to get by somehow."

Further along in line a 20-year-old baker said, "It's incredible. There are never layoffs in a cookie factory at this time of year. It's our busiest time. It's never happened. But sugar's up 200 percent in price, sales are down. They're cutting back. Everybody's laying off. There's nowhere to go. That's why I'm here standing in line."

"It's horrible for me," said a 53-year-old TV technician. He was among thousands of workers in a major TV manufacturing plant who were given short-term layoffs with a promise of another two-week shutdown later.

Theresa Hawkins and Gloria Christopher are two young women who work at the State of Illinois Unemployment Compensation Office. They work on the counters, handling the claims, questions and problems of thousands of unemployed Chicagoans that come to their office each week.

"It's really rough right now and the lines are four times as long as they were two months ago," Gloria said. "Most people have three to four kids and the money's just not enough.

"So they are depresed, worried, angry, and sometimes they take it out on me. I try to be helpful, to see they understand and get what's coming to them."

Theresa Hawkins observed: "They resent having to stand in line, having to wait two weeks or more for their benefits. They say, 'It's my money. Why do I have to stand in line for what's already mine?'

"There is more tension now. This time of year I think, I would feel just despair.

"And you know the first thing someone does when they're laid-off? They look for another job. They don't come here the first day—maybe after a week or two of looking. By the time they get here, they see there are no jobs and they know they might be in for a long time of it.

"Sometimes when I get to work in the morning, the line is clear out the door and around the corner. I just feel like getting back on the bus."

15% Unemployment Rate Estimated to Grip State

Los Angeles—California, the nation's most populous state, is the victim of the worst ravages of the nation's economic plight.

Long considered the "brightest land of opportunity" California—and Los Angeles, its biggest city, specifically—is teetering on the brink of disaster.

Reason: people—lots of them. Twenty million, plus.

"If the truth were known, our total unemployment figure would be about 15 percent."

That came from an official of the state's unemployment insurance agency. He asked not to be identified.

Officially recorded statistics on the jobless rate, as well as unemployment insurance claims, as of Dec. 31, were detailed by Larry Neron, Los Angeles County section chief for state insurance benefits in the California Employment Development Dept.

According to Neron, the state's jobless rate has bobbed between 8.7 percent and 9 percent since the last day of 1974.

That translates into some 780,600 persons without jobs. In Los Angeles County, the elusive percentage was 8.4 on Dec. 31, or 250,500 unemployed.

However, as of the same date, only some 385,000 persons were recorded as having applied for, and received, jobless benefits throughout the state—a maximum of $90 per week.

There is no great mystery surrounding this disparity in the figures. Many persons had exhausted benefits, but more importantly, many still haven't begun taking advantage of the special unemployment assistance program which became effective Jan. 6.

This is a 13-week extension of benefits which includes previously non-covered groups, such as farm workers, domestics and government employes, part of a federal assistance program which recently became law.

Once those persons eligible under this plan begin filing for benefits "official" jobless figures are expected to climb rapidly toward the million mark in the "Golden State."

State agencies have tended to play the numbers game so prevalent on the national scene—percentages of this and that compared with that and this related to a comparable period. . . .

Now there's some straight talk.

"The (work) situation ranges from bad to horrible," said Calvin Emery, business manager of Plumbers Local 78 in Los Angeles.

"High rise jobs are dead. There are just no new starts of plans on the boards because of tight money. Ditto for apartment house construction."

Emery said unemployment in his local of several thousand in construction is quickly approaching 25 percent.

"We got a lot of people on unemployment benefits who never used it before. And a good many have taken traveler cards to seek work elsewhere—wherever that is."

Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., in his inaugural address labeled unemployment the state's No. 1 problem, and his first official act was to issue an executive order requiring every state agency to actively seek all available federal dollars that can be turned into jobs for Californians.

Building tradesmen take little heart, however. New housing in California during the first 11 months of 1974 dropped to 120,000 units—38 percent below the 194,917 units constructed during the same period of 1973.

While the auto industry has withered here, as in all other parts of the nation, aerospace has maintained a good level of employment. But while the big plants are holding the line, they are doing it with their longtime skilled hands.

Few, if any "help wanted" signs are out at Lockheed, McDonnell Douglas and the like.

But unskilled jobs, primarily non-union, are going begging, according to George Garland, Los Angeles manpower representative for the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute.

And hit hardest are the young blacks and chicanos. Those who have lost good-paying unskilled jobs haven't been able to duplicate them.

"There are a lot of jobs out there for $2.50 and $3 an hour," Garland said. "But there are few takers because they can make as much or more collecting unemployment."

"The sad thing is that the minorities' workforce doesn't have the experienced people available for some semi-skilled and skilled jobs."

Garland says this is compounded by a lack of private or public transportation for those few who are available for some of those jobs.

"Usually a guy who needs a job also needs a car to get to and from the job, and he doesn't have the money to get the car."

40% of Cleveland Crafts Out of Work

Cleveland—"Talk never put a plumber to work." This is how Frank J. McHale, secretary-treasurer of the 1,375-member Plumbers Local 55 of Cleveland described plans of politicians and developers here that would begin providing employment to his hard-hit members.

"Most of the plans for construction is just talk as far as I can see, and that won't put my men to work."

The Plumbers are among the hardest hit by the building depression in greater Cleveland.

McHale said approximately 40 percent of his members are unemployed. Many have run out of unemployment compensation, yet many are now ineligible for food stamps.

Daily as many as 100 men crowd into the union hall to wait for a callup job that never seems to come.

"We used to have more come down, but now the telephones ring off the hook as they call in," McHale said. "They don't have the gas money to come down so they call. It's terrible."

McHale is the business agent who must act as social worker, friend, adviser and sometimes more. He tries to help the most desperate cases to get them some relief.

McHale said he would not talk about the personal problems of his members because they are given in confidence.

But, he said many of his members have turned to other jobs in industry, stores or most anywhere they can go to keep their families fed and the payments made on their homes.

Many travel outside Cleveland to other cities seeking work. This causes great financial and social problems as two residences must be maintained and the father is away from the home.

Charles R. Pinzone, executive secretary of the Cleveland Building & Construction Trades Council, estimates nearly 40 percent of the city's 35,070 craftsmen are out of work.

Peter Liske, an unemployed Carpenter, has had to dig into his savings to pay for illness that has plagued both him and his family. Illness has prohibited him from working at a trade he has been with for nearly four decades.

But Liske said he is lucky because he has some savings from the good years when construction was booming.

"It's the young worker that is really suffering from this terrible recession," Liske said. "They are just getting started and have the children to feed and raise. They are the ones who really are hurting. And it's hard to get them to talk about it, I know, but I want to tell about it because it needs to be told. The young workers in the building trades are the hope of the future in construction and if they are discouraged and leave, who will build the houses and factories and skyscrapers in the future? They need to be given help, and by help I mean good, honest work. They are willing to do their best."

A Cleveland Ironworker said he has traveled to St. Louis and Atlanta for work. "I've gotten a little work and then it's gone," he commented.

"I can't understand how the government will let all these skilled workers just rust away," said a perplexed Bricklayer.

"And the spring construction season is just a few months off and it doesn't look like it is going to improve," said McHale.

Families Soften Full Impact of Job Loss

San Francisco—Leo Gillikan and Tom Ulisse stand in front of the Seafarers' union hall on Mission St. here and discuss how they get by without a job.

Gillikan has not worked since July and says "things look bad." In 32 years as a member of the union, this is the first time he has gone that long without working.

"Ford wouldn't sign the oil bill," he says. "There are 33 oil tankers laid up here."

His wife is working, and he is dipping into his life savings. What will he do when his unemployment insurance runs out? "I've never been in that kind of a predicament before," he answers.

Ulisse sold his car and an insurance policy. His wife's earnings as a printer provide the bulk of their income. He gets $95 a week in unemployment benefits.

"For most of the people making it all these months, somebody's working in the family," Ulisse says.

Ulisse worked only 37 days in 1974 and he notes that a member needs 90 days in a year to keep union benefits coming. "If I had to go to the hospital, I'd have no benefits," he explains.

"You just start liquidating your assets and hope things change," Ulisse says. A chief steward, he has been a member of the Seafarers for 29 of his 50 years.

The union's San Francisco port agent, Steve Troy, confirms the Ford pocket veto of the oil cargo bill "definitely affected us." The bill requiring 30 percent of oil imports to be carried in U.S. vessels would have meant " a hell of a lot of jobs."

San Francisco's suffering maritime industry is one reason the city's unemployment rate stayed over 9 percent for most of 1974.

Higher unemployment and recession have also taken a big toll in the city's culinary industry. Agnes Barnhill, secretary-treasurer of Cooks Local 44, says business at famed Fisherman's Wharf is off 75 percent from last year at this time.

The Jobs Crisis

"They've just started laying off," she says. "Long-time members are having trouble finding a job." This is due both to the state of the economy and the fact that "if people do eat out, they're going to McDonald's," even in this strong union town.

With business down, it is almost impossible to place older cooks. A handful of members come down to the union office at 9 a.m., but there has been one job posted in two days.

Henry Wai last worked a year and a half ago. This is his first time without a job in eight years as a member of Local 44. In three months his unemployment benefits run out. "I've got no ideas" for what to do after that, he says.

Wai has a family to support. His wife works part-time. "You just slow down the expense," says Wai, 63. His last job was at Fishermans Wharf.

Tony Uglesic, 45, came down to the hall to check if there were any jobs. The $76 a week he gets on unemployment is not enough. "I've got to keep going on what I get. It's pretty tight, but what are you going to do?" he asks.

The picture is not that gloomy in all unions. Stanley Jensen, directing business representative of Machinists District 115 says the union has been "very fortunate" so far.

The Machinists' situation in the San Francisco Bay area, Jensen said, is "Scattered layoffs but nothing massive." Hardest-hit are auto mechanics in two counties north of San Francisco. "A lot of plants have laid off 4-5 percent of the crew," Jensen said. He guessed about 4-5 percent of the lodge is out of work this year compared to last year's "virtually full employment."

John Watts, secretary of the Carpenters District Council, says unemployment in his craft is "bad—about 25 percent." Some of that is seasonal, but tight money and the higher fees required of developers make things generally worse, he says.

"Even some of your heavy construction companies have cut down their crews," Watts says. "An end to tight money would pick things up, but it wouldn't have a great impact."

The number of jobless Carpenters in the Oakland area could reach 50 percent in another month, warns Local 36 Business Rep. Al Thoman. "All through the year it was never under 15 percent," Thoman says. In the past, he says, unemployment would be almost non-existent in summer and 15 or 20 percent in winter.

"The stick building business is dead," Thoman says flatly. About 130 or 140 of the men in his local are employed on a sewer project "or I'd really be hurting."

The scene does not seem that bad at Carpenters Local 22 in San Francisco, where a rank-and-file member sitting at the local office says times were "fairly decent until now" and "not too bad yet." He very seldom goes more than a month without working. "It's a union town here so it's not so bad." It is worse south of San Francisco where there are more non-union contractors, he says.

Workers have a hard time when they reach age 55, he and a few other members say. "When a man passes 55, contractors don't want to look you up." For this reason, the social security age should be lowered to 55 in building trades, they argue.

A mirror of the hard times in the city is found in the San Francisco Joint Board of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Manager Mattie J. Jackson estimates about 400 of the 3,400 members are out of work. The rest are working on a rotating basis where they may work only one week out of two.

Last year, the number of unemployed in the San Francisco Joint Board was "perhaps 150," she says. Four plant closings occurred here since then. She attributes it to the inflationary spiral. "The picture may change but it doesn't look good in any case." About 10 members showed up at the union hall on a typical Tuesday to find no jobs on the board.

Generally worsening unemployment in the San Francisco area hit 8.7 per cent in December.

The federal emergency job program provided the city about 700 jobs expected to be filled by the end of the month. At least 34,000 San Franciscans were unemployed in December, the mayor's office estimated.

As in other cities, a flood of applicants showed up the first day they could to apply for the emergency public service jobs.

Even in well-to-do Marin County, just north of San Francisco, where November's unemployment rate in one of the nation's richest counties was only 6.7 percent, an overflow crowd of jobseekers jammed the Veteran's Memorial Building parking lot for the approximately 100 federal jobs given to Marin, which had 5,800 unemployed in November.

Both union officials and rank-and-file workers voiced the same despairing fear that things will get worse before they get better.

Business Up at Food Stamp Offices

Milwaukee — The unemployment situation has become so serious in some of the construction trades here that many union halls are referring only those workers who have used up their unemployment benefits to job openings.

James Elliott, president of the Milwaukee Building & Construction Trades Council, estimated unemployment in the Laborers, Carpenters, Bricklayers and Cement Finishers unions at between 20 and 25 percent.

And when many current projects are completed in the next month or two, he expects joblessness to mount quickly in the other trades, including the Electricians, the Plumbers and the Sheet Metal Workers.

Some 4,000 of the 5,730 members of Operating Engineers Local 139 are unemployed, about twice the number usually on layoff at this time of the year. Business Manager Joseph J. Goetz, Jr. said that unemployment in the underground utilities division of the local has reached men with 18 to 20 years of seniority.

Elliott said the construction trades union offices are busy referring workers to unemployment offices and urging them to apply for food stamps. "That's not generally been done in construction locals in the past," he said.

Waiting line problems have been particularly critical for food stamp applicants in Milwaukee County, and the county public welfare agency has begun to take appointments for three or four days later for new applicants.

After one day when unemployed workers reported waiting 7½ hours in vain, the county started the appointment system. John Rauschenberger, a spokesman for the department, said that the use of appointments for food stamp applications was unusual, and had been rarely tried before by the county.

In addition, workers are facing other hardships. Elliott of the Construction Trades Council said that many workers were unemployed long enough so that they had to pay out of their own pockets to keep medical insurance benefits in effect for their families under the health and welfare programs. This ranges from $6 to $12 a month, depending on the case, he said.

Cutbacks in both federal and state government construction have made matters worse in Wisconsin. Elliott was sharply critical of the impounding of funds by the Ford Administration on such projects as FHA Section 235 and 236 programs and for sewerage and water facility construction.

He said the release of funds for sewerage and water projects would spur employment throughout the state as many smaller communities would take advantage of the 90-10 sharing formula for financing. The quickly increasing costs of construction have brought about the cancellation of numerous other large projects, he said, including one for a new 38- to 40-story building in downtown Milwaukee.

The unemployment problem is hitting Wisconsin at a time when Gov. Patrick J. Lucey is asking the state to initiate an austerity program, including cutbacks in spending for university construction and the prospect of closing various state institutions which will throw others out of work.

John W. Schmitt, Wisconsin State AFL-CIO president, said he has urged Lucey to expand the highway program and thus add to the work force. It would be wise, Schmitt said, to put people back to work: "They would be paying taxes and not drawing unemployment compensation and food stamps."

The State AFL-CIO has scheduled its annual community services conference several months earlier than usual to draw attention to the role local unions can play in assisting the unemployed, Schmitt said. The conference will be held Mar. 8 and 9 in Wisconsin Rapids.

Werner Schaefer, president of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, also urged completion of various governmental projects. "Not only would this put people back to work," he said, "but it would change the attitude of those who are still working, which is even more important, and bring them more confidence."

Among the industrial unions, unemployment is spotty; actually, the Milwaukee area industry is strongly machine-tool oriented and varied and is usually last to feel recessions, according to Schmitt.

Because home construction is so tight, any firms associated with that industry are being hard-hit. Workers at an automatic garage door manufacturer in Waupaca, for instance, are facing a 60 percent layoff.

Some of Milwaukee's largest industries, however, are working steadily, including the Briggs & Stratton Corp., a maker of small gasoline engines and other goods, and Bucyrus-Erie Co., a manufacturer of mining machinery.

Desperate Job Seekers Swamp Atlanta Agency

Atlanta—They came by the thousands, jobless Atlantans in desperate search of work, any kind of work.

The early birds began lining up shortly after 3 a.m. on Jan. 10, their sleeping bags in hand to help them endure the long night's wait for 225 public service jobs, Atlanta's share of $5.5 billion in job aid passed by Congress in December.

City officials had reserved the Civic Center auditorium for the one-day sign-up session. With the unemployment rate at 7.5 percent and more than 20,000 out of work by early December, it was expected that as many as 2,000 might apply for the new city jobs.

But by dawn, there were already 2,000 persons in line under gray, drizzling skies. The line that began at the auditorium's glass doors twisted for hundreds of feet out of sight around the corner. A sole city policeman arrived at 7:30 and helplessly surveyed the growing crowd around the door, as dozens of persons pushed to the front of the line.

Among the early arrivals was James Wilson of Atlanta. At age 19 he was typical of many in the predominantly black, mostly young crowd.

Wilson was laid off last month from his job at a local Sears Roebuck warehouse. Asked what kind of work he was looking for, Wilson replied that he'd take "any kind of job, really. I've got a family to support."

George Washington, 31, was also in line long before the doors were set to open at 8:15 a.m. Washington hadn't worked since he lost his waiter's job three months ago.

Now, with his unemployment insurance exhausted and a wife and two children to support, he was ready to work at "anything."

A young white from Seattle, 24-year-old Randall Cranor, had left his job as a dock hand on the West Coast and headed south in search of warmer weather and a new home. His first two months in Atlanta he tried "everything—state civil service, private employment agencies, temporaries—there just aren't any jobs.

Police reinforcements began arriving by 8 a.m. as the waiting crowd, some of whom had been in line for five hours, grew increasingly restless. At 8:15 a single door was opened on schedule and the rush began.

The surging crowd pressed those at the front against the glass, smashing two plate glass doors and forcing many people into the debris.

"What's happening? I'm a veteran," a 24-year-old Atlantan cried in disbelief as he clutched a bloody pants leg. He hobbled about the lobby in pain, cursing loudly, until policemen helped him to the hospital.

As the doors burst open, the entire line quickly collapsed and thousands poured into the gold and velvet-cushioned lobby, milled noisily about, and then streamed into the 4,500-seat concert hall.

By the time the brief melee had ended, four persons had to be taken to the hospital for treatment of lacerations.

Atlanta Mayor Maynard Jackson and a host of other top city officials quickly rushed to the scene and attempted to calm the crowd. Jackson, the city's first black mayor, addressed the gathering from the auditorium stage, calling for massive federal assistance to combat the nation's spreading unemployment.

"What's happening here is an indication of what's happening all over the country, which is that people are desperate for jobs," Jackson said. "There are 3,000 people here looking for 225 jobs."

Underscoring the frustration of the 3,000 job-hungry Atlantans is the fact that the jobs they were hoping to get are temporary only and pay between $114 and $175 a week.

The largest single category, 56 jobs, is for litter and vacant lot cleanup crews. The second largest category, 24 jobs, is for manual laborers. Both pay only $114 a week and aren't expected to last beyond 1975.

The recession and growing unemployment have hit hard at Atlanta, a boom town that survived the nation's 1969-1970 recession virtually unscathed.

From November 1973 to May 1974, manufacturing in Georgia dropped off between two and three times faster than the national decline.

The real crunch didn't hit until late fall, however. Unemployment increased 28 percent in the month of October alone.

One of those hit by the layoffs was James Phillips, a 33-year-old bricklayer with a wife, four children and a fifth on the way. After years of steady work, Phillips found himself out of a job in October. Until then, he had been earning $6 an hour as a bricklayer. Then the bottom fell out for him.

"This is the first time I reckon I've ever been without a job," Phillips explained. "I couldn't even get a job in a restaurant washing dishes for $2.25 an hour."

Figures from the State Labor Dept. show that Georgia has finally caught the rest of the nation in unemployment. After lagging behind the national figure for all of 1974, Georgia's unemployment has now hit the 7 percent mark.

Hardest hit statewide is the textile industry, Georgia's largest single producer.

The textile industry here has devised a new type of unemployment in cooperation with state officials. It's called "partial employment."

A "partial" works a week, is off a week and collects unemployment compensation, and then is back at work again. In the last week of December, about 75,000 of Georgia's 150,000 unemployed were partial layoffs.

Local mill owners send state labor officials a list of the workers to be laid off for the coming week and the Labor Dept. sends the worker an unemployment check, bypassing the need to stand in long waiting lines.

Carpeting has been hit hardest of all. In the carpet center of Dalton, 60 miles from Atlanta, nearly one of five workers is unemployed.

"I've always been a man who said you could find some kind of work if you tried," said 50-year-old George Winters as he began a wait of several hours in the packed county unemployment office. "But I've about changed my mind now."

Waiting along with Winters was Bill Stone, a 50-year-old father of two who had been working at one mill for 18 years when, this fall, it shut down permanently.

In Atlanta, the auto industry accounts for the largest single number of layoffs. Nearly one in five of Atlanta's 20,000-plus unemployed formerly worked at one of the Ford or GM plants here.

Unemployment Cuts Swath Across St. Louis Work Force

St. Louis — As the lines of unemployed grew—and the wait as well—at a downtown office of the Missouri Employment Security Division here on one early January day—a man at the rear of one line fainted.

But only one person left his place in line to help the stricken man. The others were apparently fearful of losing their place in line. Employment Security personnel assisted the man, who was conscious by the time an ambulance arrived.

The incident was indicative of growing feelings of desperation among the jobless as the employment situation in the area worsens. The caseload of unemployed workers at one Employment Security office was described as "without precedent."

Elsewhere, lines were out the door. Estimates of the numbers seeking unemployment insurance benefits ran as high as 50 percent over the same time last year.

Of the eight employment security offices in the St. Louis area, seven reported handling more than 1,000 persons on a recent day.

And prospects for the immediate future are "dismal" in the opinion of Ollie Langhorst, executive secretary-treasurer of the Carpenters District Council of St. Louis.

Unemployment here has affected just about every class of worker, and each has a story of personal deprivation to tell.

A 22-year-old welder, his wife and 3-week-old baby are living on $35 a week in unemployment insurance. When he was working, his take-home pay was $145 a week.

An electrical engineer, 26, was making $11,400 a year until he was laid off by McDonnell Douglas Corp., a major aerospace employer. He found a job in Ohio, only to be laid off there the day after Christmas. His unemployment benefit is $50 a week.

As unemployment rises here, businesses are becoming more and more selective in filling even unskilled jobs, a spokesman for the Missouri Division of Employment Security commented.

Restaurant owners who "used to take anyone they could get, as long as they were neat, clean and could breathe" are now refusing referrals of anyone requiring training, he continued.

One problem facing this city's unemployed is the lack of adequate public transportation. In many cases, the jobless live in the city but the jobs are in the county, often beyond the bus lines.

Typical is a 27-year-old man, trained as a dental technician, who lives with his grandmother near the downtown area.

When he could find no work as a dental technician, he paid $1,000 tuition for a vocational course to learn how to apply vinyl tops to automobiles. He worked at General Motors for a while, but was laid off.

"I've worked in nursing homes and in dishwashing jobs since then," he said, "but I didn't get paid enough to be self-supporting. And the longer I stayed in jobs like that, the more unskilled I became."

His $57 a week unemployment benefits ran out six weeks ago. "I'm in a pretty hectic situation," he said.

The electrical engineer laid off in Ohio moved his family in with his parents. He said they were "grinding down on our savings now."

He hopes for an upturn: "If things work out, maybe my wife will get a job to provide at least some basic income. We owe $600 on our car and we're about $2,000 in debt. In another month we might be completely broke."

A $19,000-a-year electronics salesman, 43, out of work for about two months said he'd tried "three commercial placement offices, but they were all absolutely discouraging."

One segment of the economy has noted an upturn, however. Joe Cointin, directing business representative for Machinists District 9, said that automobile mechanics in his jurisdiction have not fared too badly. "People are having their cars repaired rather than buying new ones."

But Cointin anticipates worse times ahead, particularly as the effects of the cutback in automobile production are felt by industry suppliers.

Langhorst reported that 25 percent of the 11,000 carpenters in St. Louis are unemployed. Few have found work in other industries.

He thinks it will be "several months" before construction work improves, even with a massive infusion of mortgage funds.

The latest available figures show that unemployment in the metropolitan St. Louis area in mid-November was 7.2 percent. Compounding the depression in the construction industry and the slump in car sales is the continuing decline in manufacturing jobs in the area.

Robert E. Whaley, manager of the St. Louis Employment Security Office, said the worst unemployment situation he could recall "was in 1946, when we had all the servicemen returning from World War II.

"But we had jobs on the horizon then, when we were regearing from a wartime to a peacetime economy."

Shock Waves Hit Columbus

Columbus, O. — Shock waves from the national economic recession have sent unemployment skyrocketing in Ohio within the last six weeks.

Ohio is the second largest producer of automobiles and trucks, and the national slump in auto sales has hit Ohio workers hard. All three major auto producers — General Motors, Ford and Chrysler—have announced big cutbacks in their production facilities in the state.

At GM's huge Vega assembly plant in Lordstown, more than half the entire work force has been idled. Ford has announced layoffs of more than 14,000 production workers through Ohio, and Chrysler has furloughed thousands of workers at its Twinsburg assembly plant near Cleveland.

In the rubber complex near Akron, more than 102,000 workers have been sent home since summer. Many of these are auto production workers, but the three major tire manufacturers—Goodyear, B. F. Goodrich and Firestone—also have made big layoffs.

Another depressed area is Dayton where General Motors has a number of production facilities, including Delco Products and Frigidaire. Almost daily, newspapers in the Dayton area have front page news stories about more layoffs from the giant production companies. The Dayton Daily News recently reported more than 4,700 workers in that community have been idled since November.

William Papier, chief of the Division of Research & Statistics of the Ohio Bureau of Employment Services, reports large increases in jobless workers since the first week in December.

One "crutch" jobless Ohio workers are using to help them through the recession is the availability of the federal food stamp program. On Jan. 3, the Ohio AFL-CIO called a meeting of all full-time community services representatives in the state to explain how to help their jobless members file papers to collect food stamps. Personnel from the Ohio Dept. of Welfare were on hand to assist and explain rules and procedures.

It was emphasized that laid-off workers could be eligible to collect food stamps providing they have "liquid assets" that do not exceed $1,500 and have limited incomes. It was stressed also that workers do not have to be on welfare to be eligible for food stamps.

Critics Confounded:

Vitality of Bargaining Process Strength of Economic System

The following is excerpted from the presidential address of AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger to the annual meeting of the Industrial Relations Research Association in San Francisco, Dec. 28, 1974.

FOR MANY YEARS NOW the system of collective bargaining that has developed on this continent and the parties involved in the process have been under frequent attack, sometimes from the same people using opposite vantage points. The collective bargaining system is decrepit and rigid, it has been said, and the parties are too soft, too tough, too dumb or an interference with the competitive market model which could enable the computer to provide all the answers, if unions and collective bargaining would only get out of the way.

Such public exercises have continued in 1974, although less frequently. This year, amidst a deepening economic mess, the economics establishment—particularly the macro-economist Mandarins who dominate the economics departments of the elite universities and leading foundation subsidiaries—has been exposed as bankrupt, bereft of much ability to explain its continuing failures in recent years, to analyze major economic developments, to provide workable forecasts and remedies for the increasingly complex and dangerous problems that beset the economies of the U.S. and the western world.

And the self-styled pundits, who have blamed most difficulties on collective bargaining and organized labor, have been compelled to spend at least some time in 1974 wallowing in their foolishness, amidst the deepening economic crisis.

Indeed, the record clearly shows that in the past decade when almost every American institution has been badly pulled, tugged or nearly torn apart, the collective bargaining system and the trade unions have been among the few institutions with a high degree of stability. Indeed, their very diversity, pragmatism and flexibility—which have been the bane of their attackers— have also been basic factors in their relative stability.

With its lack of neatness, disregard for perfection and contempt for preconceived textbook formulas, collective bargaining has continued to reveal its inherent vitality as a dynamic system of problem-solving between the differing interests of labor and management at the workplace. Despite failures and setbacks, this system of collective bargaining has usually achieved workable solutions for practical problems—such as attempting to meet the challenges of radical and rapid shifts in technology at the workplace—by flexing and changing with the changing needs and demands of the parties in a fast-changing world.

For the most part, the parties to this sometimes turbulent process are unknown. The national leaders of the parties, whose names are reported in the news media, are known to the world. But the day-to-day work on the "shop floor" is performed by tens of thousands of business agents, stewards, committeemen, international union representatives, foremen, superintendents and plant managers—the unsung foot soldiers who each day and each week work out pragmatic, rather than ideological or even neat solutions, to difficult problems that arise in never-ending constancy at tens of thousands of varied workplaces in this continental-sized economy.

But the troubles in the economic environment have been growing. And they are placing onto the bargaining tables, issues that are increasingly difficult for many managements and for the overwhelming majority of workers. These include such matters as workers' pressures to catch up with raging inflation, while managements are confronted by recession-induced suppression of productivity gains and the impact of monetary policy on costs and liquidity, and there are such additional issues as job security and the status of pension and SUB funds.

The essential difficulty, however, is not with the collective bargaining system—with all of its warts and imperfections—or with the negotiators and the tens of thousands of other practitioners who keep the system operating.

THE MAJOR DIFFICULTY, by far, is with the federal government's economic policies and the policymakers. And it is also with the campus- and foundation-dominated economics establishment—with its overwhelming emphasis on aggregate numbers derived from the theoretical formula-bound computer responses, rather than observation, analysis and judgment—that has failed to provide the policymakers and the public with anything that approaches adequate analysis, critique and workable remedies.

Amidst all of this disarray and spreading economic debris—including the pressing interest-payment costs of local governments and the inability of many of them to float new bond issues—amidst all of this, the collective bargaining system and its tens of thousands of negotiators and "shop floor" practitioners have managed to carry out their functions. And it has been done with a high degree of success and accommodation and without high-flown pretense.

Proposal in Works:

Excessive Tax Rate Increase In Social Security Unjustified

AN EXPECTED PUSH for a social security tax increase from the Social Security Advisory Council is not justified now, nor in the future, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman declared. The rate hike proposal will likely come in the advisory council's final report to Congress.

Seidman renewed labor's call for contributions from general tax revenue to the social security system. He said that while there may be a need for a gradual rise of the present $14,100 taxable wage base, the advisory council should reject the idea of a sudden jump to $24,000.

He made the statements on Labor News Conference. Rudy Danstedt, one of six public representatives on the advisory council, was also questioned by reporters on the network radio interview.

Danstedt said that "it is high time" that Treasury funds be applied to social security, adding that at least four other members will join with him in the effort to include that recommendation in the council's report. He reported that he and others will also strongly oppose any boost in the tax rate.

Danstedt, who is assistant to the president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, rejected the contention that social security is "in the red" and the advisory council is under pressure to recommend steps to bolster the system. He stressed that even though the present council is stacked along conservative lines, its members found that the social security system is sound, and that it is not in danger of getting out of balance.

Danstedt and Seidman agreed that social security should not be totally funded by the federal government and converted into a welfare program for the elderly.

Workers and employers should continue to contribute to the system, they said; retirees should have a right to benefits without a demeaning means test; and the federal payments should be used to make specific improvements in the structure of the program, not across-the-board increases.

Questioning them on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Ned Scharff of the Washington Star-News and Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Through Advisory Panels:

Big Oil's Influence Shapes U.S. Policy

CONTROL OF NATIONAL OIL POLICY and influencing government to its point of view are skillfully effected by the petroleum industry through its multiple memberships on over 130 federal advisory committees and subcommittees.

Federal advisory committees are groups organized from the citizenry and industry as well as from official government agencies to assist in advising the legislative and executive branches of government on specific matters relating to their experience and expertise. Some committees are created by statute, some by executive order, and others by agency authority. Regardless of their juridical beginning, however, they are used in almost every policy area of the federal government.

So great was the proliferation of these advisory committees and so little known about them that efforts were mounted by Congress to bring some order out of chaos. The Federal Advisory Committee Act was signed into law in October 1972 and became effective in January 1973. It includes a reporting requirement designed to identify the location, function and costs of advisory committees in the Executive Branch, thereby providing an annual inventory.

THE OIL INDUSTRY is represented on a minimum of 132 federal advisory committees and their subcommittees. Actually, those figures are not to be considered as a definitive count because not all the subcommittees, work committees and task forces were reported under the act. The 132 committees used as a sample were selected from an inspection of those committees which appeared to have an oil industry connection or had an oil industry employe traced back to it.

The following examples will illustrate in part the difficulties of identification:

- The Economic Advisory Board of the U.S. Dept. of Commerce had the chief economist of Exxon and an economist of the Mellon National Bank, which is a Gulf bank, as two of its members.
- Of the National Business Council for Consumer Affairs' large number of subcouncils, no fewer than five had a representative of the oil industry:
- The National Export Expansion Council included among its members the chairman emeritus of Phillips Petroleum. Among this committee's subcommittees, the one on trade and investment in developing countries included a vice president of Arco, and the subcommittee on chemicals included representatives from Chevron, Esso, Lubrizol and Shell.

It was manifestly impossible to make visual inspection of the thousands of names and committees, many of them with generic names, in order to arrive at a definitive count of oil industry representation. Another factor which limits a total listing was the inability to recognize oil company subsidiaries. Thus the statistics compiled are only illustrative of oil industry penetration into advisory committee apparatus rather than definitive.

Of the oil companies with a large number of representatives on federal advisory committees, Exxon heads the list with 58 representatives, followed by Standard of California, Mobil, Atlantic Richfield, Texaco, Gulf and Continental with 20 or more each. Another 12 oil companies have 10 or more representatives.

Of the 132 advisory and subcommittees identified, the oil industry dominated some by virtue of constituting the majority membership. On the others, of course, they were merely representational, having one or two members. The list of government departments, independent agencies and special offices having responsibility for committees on which the oil industry has one or more members is led by 26 such committees for the Commerce Dept., 20 each for the Federal Power Commission and Federal Communications Commission, 13 for Labor and 12 for Interior. Another 14 federal agencies have 10 or less with oil company representation.

—From How Big Oil Influences Government by Norman Medvin in the December 1974 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

How to Buy:

Advertised 'Special Ingredient' Often Aspirin or Baking Soda

By Sidney Margolius

TELEVISION COMMERCIALS for various products often mention they have special ingredients of some mysterious nature which they never actually identify. In fact, these unnamed ingredients most usually are: aspirin, antihistamines, stomach coatings and other antacid ingredients, ammonia, twice as much ammonia.

Since these are all ordinary ingredients, some going back to grandma's day, the question is, why not just buy the basic ingredients and save money?

Anacin, of course, is the product that persistently advertises that it has more of the pain reliever "that doctors recommend." This pain reliever that doctors recommend is merely aspirin available at any pharmacy, department store or supermarket for 39-49¢ per 100 tablets and sometimes less. If you want more of it, simply take more of it.

Another widely-sold pain reliever at two and three times the price of ordinary aspirin is buffered aspirin. It is merely aspirin with a little antacid salts such as bicarbonate of soda to relieve any nausea some people might get from ordinary aspirin, especially when taken on an empty stomach.

Incidentally, the Federal Trade Commission, charged in a complaint issued last year that a number of pain relievers advertised as significantly superior to others really had aspirin as their main ingredient. There's no significant difference among various brands of aspirin, the FTC officially observed. The products in question include Anacin, Bufferin, Excedrin, Bayer Aspirin, Cope, Vanquish and Midol.

Similarly, when Contac's commercials compare it to a number of other products, such as cold tablets and night-time liquids, the basic active ingredient in all of these about which the advertiser is talking, is antihistamines. But Contac does not compare itself to other delayed-action antihistamine tablets, some of which are available at much lower prices under the private brand names of large retailers.

Antihistamines also are a major ingredient in a number of other preparations such as Coricidin and Inhiston.

Antihistamines inhibit allergic reactions and also tend to make you a little sleepy. The result is, a number of over-the-counter sleep preparations such as Sominex and Sleep-Eze are merely a form of antihistamine. Some brands also have a little aspirin.

DIGESTIVE REMEDIES such as antacids have become big sellers. For years many were promoted with exaggerated claims of giving relief from "nervous emotional disturbances," "nervous tension headaches," "cold symptoms," "consumption of alcoholic beverages," "food intolerance" and so on.

As the result of recent action by the Food & Drug Administration, manufacturers of antacid products now may claim only that these products give relief from "heartburn," "sour stomach" and acid indigestion.

But in this instance too, consumers could use merely the basic low-cost ingredients. The several hundred brands of antacid tablets, powders and liquids on the market contain a variety of ingredients. But one of the most familiar is simply sodium bicarbonate—ordinary baking soda. Another familiar ingredient is calcium carbonate.

One effect of the FDA's review was to require Alka-Seltzer to make clearer that its combination of aspirin and antacid should be taken only if the user actually has a headache as well as an upset stomach. Some medical experts felt that the combination was unnecessary and might be harmful to anyone suffering from serious gastrointestinal problems. That's why some of Alka-Seltzer's recent commercials announcing, not too loudly, that you should be careful, or saying in a caption, "Use only as directed."

Another persistent promotion is for household cleaners which proclaim that they have (1) ammonia; (2) more ammonia, and (3) twice as much ammonia, which you are invited to smell to believe.

Ammonia can be bought for as little as 25-30¢ a quart.

Scouring powders often boast that they have chlorine which helps bleach sink stains. Chlorine bleaches, of course, are available for as little as 25¢ a quart if the price didn't go up again this week.

Brainwashing Public:

Digest, Big Business Team Up on Unions

By Kenneth Fiester

TWO NATURAL ALLIES are teaming up for the first time on a new scheme to brainwash the public in pro-big business, anti-trade union ideology.

Reader's Digest and the Business Roundtable will jointly sponsor a series of monthly articles which will appear both in the magazine and in 50 college newspapers. The articles will be written by the Digest staff as though they were editorial material. But then they will be screened by the public information committee of the Roundtable, and when approved, inserted in the magazine chastely labeled "Advertisement."

However, the Digest will promote the series, titled "Our Economic System—You Make It Work," just as though it were a regular editorial feature. The big difference is that the Business Roundtable will pay $1.2 million for the 136 pages the articles will fill during the year.

The Digest will spend about $108,000 of its take to place the pieces as ads in those 50 college newspapers. Their original sponsorship will thus be buried another layer deep.

The first article, on productivity, will appear in the February issue. Other installments already in the works will cover product quality, entrepreneurship, pricing strategy and inflation.

The Digest's 44 million readers are thoroughly familiar with its editorial bias against unions and in favor of 19th Century capitalism. Its partner is less well-known but thoroughly congenial.

The Business Roundtable was founded several years ago by Roger Blough, retired chairman of U.S. Steel (and the subject of President Kennedy's wrathful "jawboning" when he sought to defy a price program). The Roundtable's avowed goal was to stimulate industrial expansion by "reducing construction costs," which it said could be helped along if big corporations put their heads together. Among the heads that are part of this togetherness are DuPont, Alcoa, American Can, Olin Industries, General Motors, AT&T and three oil companies, along with big steel and General Electric.

Reporters soon discovered that the Roundtable's chief notion about "reducing construction costs" was to eliminate or emasculate the building trades unions. This caused a measure of unfavorable publicity and the Roundtable has maintained a low profile since—until now. (PAI).

Soup to Nonsense:

Law of Averages Proves Myth In Real Life Decision Making

By Jane Goodsell

THE LAW OF AVERAGES ought to be repealed. It just doesn't work. It ought to work, of course. As any gambler can explain with paper and pencil, the laws of mathematical probability can't miss. But as many a gambler has discovered, wiring home for bus fare from Las Vegas, it can, it does.

Consider the times you've paused at a crossroad, uncertain whether to turn right or left. According to the law of averages, you should have a 50-50 chance of making the correct choice. But how often do you? Whichever road you take, you should have taken the other one. You find out you made the wrong choice after you've driven 10 or 15 miles, and have to make a U-turn and head back to that intersection.

If you try to outsmart yourself by turning back sooner, you'll be wrong again. You were on the right road in the first place and, if you'd stayed on it, you'd be at your destination.

How many times have you picked the right line to stand in at the supermarket? You're an intelligent person, and you use your head. So, logically, you queue up in the shortest line. There are only three people ahead of you, whereas the other line consists of five customers. So what happens? A lady in the other line gasps, "Oh, I forgot to buy nutmeg!" and the customer in front of her mutters, "Goodness, that reminds me I'd better pick up some ginger!" Both of them drift out of line, reducing it to three people.

But while the other line clicks briskly along, yours has bogged down to a standstill. The customer two places ahead of you has only three items in her cart, but she has a box of empty bottles in her car which the clerk has to help her carry in. She has a fistful of coupons she wants to redeem, and a complaint to register about a pot roast she bought the other day. The lady directly in front of you has a box of eggs, and she needs only half a box. Would the clerk mind cutting the box in half? She has to cash a check, but she forgot her pen. And would it be all right if she dashes off for a half a second to pick up a bottle of vanilla? The old law of averages didn't work so well, did it? Not even with the odds in your favor.

There are two movies you want to see, and they sound equally good. Whichever one you pick, you can't miss. Or can you? How many times have you walked out of the theater saying, "Well, we certainly made the right choice, didn't we?"

You're having guests to dinner and, at the last minute, you remember that you've forgotten to buy coffee cream. Should you rush to the store and buy some? Or take a chance that none of your guests uses cream?

The odds ought to be about even. And, in a way, they are. Half the time you will apologize for not having cream, and the rest of the time you'll wonder how to use up the cream you bought that nobody used.

The law of averages works fine on paper. But real life is different. As Satchel Paige so accurately put it, the odds are always 60 to 40 against.

State of Union 'Not Good':

Ford Mixes Tax Cuts, Hikes, Opposes New Program Funds

During 1975, Ford said, regardless of how high the consumer price index rises, no such increase should exceed 5 percent and there should be no provision for a "catchup" raise in future years.

Ford warned Congress that he "will not hesitate to veto any new spending program." His veto threat apparently extends to such basic anti-recession measures as accelerated public works, increased public housing and direct job creation.

The President advanced his energy tax proposals as a means of prodding individuals and business to use less fuel. He also proposed both deregulation of natural gas prices and an excise tax on natural gas—both of which would mean higher prices for consumers. The White House estimated that it would send the consumer price index up by about 2 percent.

AFL-CIO President George Meany endorsed the goal of reducing U.S. dependence on imported oil. But he said that Ford's program would only increase living costs. "It is rationing by taxation and high prices and is, therefore, inequitable and inflationary."

Ford proposed what he termed a "windfall profits tax" on oil to accompany price deregulation. But Meany said the President's plan amounted to "simply another excise tax on each barrel of oil" that would be passed on to the consumer in still higher prices.

The President's proposal for a permanent tax cut, with the biggest impact in the lower income levels, and for a handout of $80 a year to persons who don't earn enough to pay taxes was intended to answer criticism that the higher fuel prices would fall hardest on those who could least afford it.

Meany said most people would still lose from the tradeoff.

The President's proposal for a rebate of up to 12 percent of 1974 taxes to stimulate the economy would clearly put added purchasing power in the hands of those who already have most to spend.

Thus, taxpayers with incomes above about $41,000 a year would get $1,000 from the government while the rebate for a family of four with a $7,500 income would be $58, and for a $6,000 family it would be $29.40.

When Ford announced this plan in a televised speech to the nation, Meany termed it "peanuts for the poor."

The President did promise to ask new funds for energy research and development—the one exception to his hold-the-line budget policy.

He proposed modification and deferment of anti-pollution standards for automobiles, greater use of coal through modification of the Clean Air Act, an expanded investment tax credit to spur nuclear power plant construction, commercial development of naval oil reserves, and a 15 percent tax credit on costs of improving insulation of private homes.

On other domestic issues, Ford merely said that he will send Congress separate messages on general revenue sharing, extension of the Voting Rights Act and perhaps some other matters. Conspicuously missing was any reference to national health insurance or to the nation's housing crisis.

His relatively brief foreign policy section in the State of the Union message protested mildly the trend to congressional restrictions on the President's freedom to act.

"By the Constitution and tradition," Ford said, "the execution of foreign policy is the responsibility of the President."

STATE OF THE UNION is "not good," President Ford acknowledged in his address to Congress. His proposals to deal with unemployment and inflation involved a combination of tax increases and tax cuts that the AFL-CIO said wouldn't do the job.

Advisory Panel Stresses Low-Income Tax Relief

Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel, Clothing Workers President Murray H. Finley; Seafarers President Paul Hall; Auto Workers President Leonard Woodcock; Teamsters President Frank E. Fitzsimmons and Mine Workers President Arnold Miller.

The management members included the board chairmen of General Motors, Alcoa, General Electric, Sears Roebuck, Mobil Oil, the Bechtel Companies and the First National City Bank, plus the vice chairman of U.S. Steel.

The panel also adopted a set of principles for a national energy policy, which it recommended to the President.

Its key was expansion of domestic energy supplies to meet the nation's needs and free America from the threat of any future foreign oil embargo.

On tax policy, the Labor-Management Committee recommended:

- An individual income tax cut, effective Jan. 1, 1975, totaling about $15 billion. This would be accomplished by granting a $70 tax credit for each exemption on a tax return (a $280 tax cut for a family of four) and a 5 percent cut in taxes due after the exemption credit. There would be a $375 ceiling on any tax reduction so that persons with high incomes would not receive a substantially higher tax cut.
- A $5 billion tax savings for business through a rise in the investment tax credit from 7 to 12 percent.

The labor-management group said the tax package should be enacted quickly and independently of overall tax reform legislation to be acted on later this year.

It stressed also that the tax cut alone won't solve the nation's economic problems and that additional measures will be needed "to produce more jobs over the longer term."

Meany termed the committee's two-pronged tax proposal "a responsible, equitable compromise." He noted that the committee considered but did not recommend the corporate tax cut the President proposed in addition to the rise in the investment tax credit.

"The President's proposals are not the compromise to which the Labor-Management Advisory Committee agreed," Meany said, and the AFL-CIO "will fight them in Congress."

The labor-management panel called for expansion of both coal and nuclear power as well as oil and natural gas. It asked government aid for research and development of new energy sources and facilities, as well as accelerated development of mass transit systems.

It proposed a stretchout of present environmental restrictions on energy production and use. But environmental goals should not be abandoned, the panel said.

Democratic Leadership Outlines 'Action' Plan

If interest rates haven't shown a significant drop by July 1, the task force proposed consideration of "more drastic remedies, including the possibility of a progressive tax on interest income which would be prohibitive on income derived from excessive rates of interest (9 percent and above) and evolving downward to nominal on income from low rates of interest (below 6 percent).

The Democratic task force wrote a proposal on wage and price stability that was fuzzy enough so that news stories from the Associated Press and United Press International opened with different conclusions.

The full text is as follows:

"We need a tough but selective program to halt the current wage-price spiral, Phases I and II of the Nixon Administration program controlled wages with a vengeance while permitting prices to rise, resulting in a cruel diminution of the wage earner's purchasing power.

"There must be no return to such a policy. The present Council on Wage & Price Stability is a toothless tiger. The need is for an independent agency with subpoena power, the resources to hold extensive hearings, the authority to delay price increases up to 90 days and, in extreme cases, the authority to impose controls more permanently on a selective basis. The selectivity should be aimed at those industries where near-monopoly and administered prices render the forces of true competition inoperable."

On energy conservation, the report listed various suggestions that have been made to cut back on fuel use and then added that "the range of options should not be limited to those here enumerated." It did ask "careful consideration of the effect of any proposed fuel tax increase upon the millions of working Americans who have no available or practical alternative to the use of their automobiles in getting to and from their daily work."

The report endorsed accelerated public works as well as additional public service jobs to deal with unemployment. And it asked the "appropriate committees" to develop recommendations for an emergency housing program.

It also urged early action on legislation "to forestall the apparent intention of the Administration to increase the price of food stamps to low-income Americans."

Apart from these "priority" issues, the House leadership panel endorsed for action during the first session a "comprehensive national program to assure adequate health and medical care for all."

It called for long-range development of new energy sources, possibly financed by a trust fund. It asked for enactment of an effective Consumer Protection Agency bill, incentives to food production and possible new aid to ailing industries that are "vital to the nation's economic health."

The task force, headed by Rep. James C. Wright, Jr., of Texas, asserted that the nation's problems are "not insoluble" but warned that they will be aggravated if solutions are needlessly delayed.

The Program Is 'Unsupportable'

AFL-CIO President George Meany had this comment on the State of the Union message:

The AFL-CIO General Board will meet Jan. 23 to recommend emergency measures that can, should and must be taken immediately to restore stability to the economy and get America back to work.

The President's proposals to the Congress will do neither.

His program would increase inflation; would not stimulate the economy; would not end the recession. Therefore, it is unsupportable.

Obviously, the President's energy goal of reducing U.S. dependence on imported oil is sound. But his program will not achieve that goal and will only increase the living costs of the American people. It is rationing by taxation and high prices and is, therefore, inequitable and inflationary.

His program would increase the price of everything that oil touches—from gasoline to heating; from food to medicine.

Just one small part of the President's program—deregulation of natural gas—would cost consumers about $10 billion a year. To that inflated price tag must be added his proposed excise taxes on natural gas and imported and domestic crude oil.

The President's so-called "windfall profits tax" is not a tax on profits at all. It would not affect the obscene profits giant oil and gas companies made during the past year, while they pay taxes to the U.S. at an effective rate of about 6 percent. His proposal is simply another excise tax on each barrel of oil and every consumer would pay it.

The President's income tax proposals are clearly inequitable.

The one-shot tax rebate of 12 percent would provide too much for too few, with too little for the too many in the low and middle tax brackets.

The vast majority of American families would pay more in energy-related price and tax increases than they would receive from the proposed permanent tax cut.

The President's proposal to give corporations both an increased investment tax credit and a cut in the corporate tax rate would only compound tax injustice and is economically unjustified.

In making his tax proposals, the President largely ignored the unanimous recommendations of his Labor-Management Advisory Committee. The committee's recommendations were a responsible, equitable compromise of the positions of both labor and management and, most importantly, would have effectively provided the massive stimulus so necessary to turn the economy around. The committee discussed a cut in the corporate tax rate and did not recommend it to the President.

The President's proposals—linked as they are to staggering energy cost increases—are merely an incomplete effort to rebate those costs to taxpayers. They are not in any sense a stimulus to an economy that is sick and needs an immediate boost in consumer purchasing power.

Therefore, the President's proposals are not the compromise to which the Labor-Management Advisory Committee agreed. The AFL-CIO cannot support his proposals and will fight them in the Congress.

For Public Workers:

Supreme Court Extends Stay In Wage-Hour Enforcement

The Supreme Court has granted an injunction suspending enforcement of the federal minimum wage law for 3.4 million public employes until it has considered the issue.

The court extended a stay that Chief Justice Warren Burger had previously granted on a temporary basis, suspending the extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to the public employes covered for the first time on May 1, 1974. The stay suspends enforcement of a minimum wage increase from $1.90 to $2 an hour scheduled for Jan. 1, 1975, and has the effect also of suspending enforcement of the previous step applied last May.

The decision by the full court to extend the stay granted by Burger came on Jan. 10, one day after the AFL-CIO and a group of unions representing public employes had asked the court not to keep the injunction alive and to grant them leave to intervene in the case.

In extending the stay, the court set late January deadlines on further presentations in the case, which grew out of a challenge by the National League of Cities and other parties to the FLSA overtime provisions becoming applicable to fire fighters and police on Jan. 1, 1975.

Fire fighters and police, along with all public employes, received the minimum wage increase last May, but the later effective date on the overtime provisions was drawn up by Congress to allow time to rearrange the extraordinary work schedules of fire fighting and police forces.

In setting up the separate date for overtime coverage, the 1974 FLSA amendments had allowed considerable flexibility in scheduling hours of work. On Jan. 1, the obligation would have been to pay time and one-half after 60 hours in a seven-day period or after 240 hours in a 28-day work period.

In suspending the expansion of coverage, the stay stopped enforcement of overtime provisions along with other provisions effective last May. All jurisdictions were thought to be in compliance with the $1.90 minimum except Cape Girardeau, Mo., one of participants in the suit initiated by the National League of Cities.

In an affidavit accompanying the union request to be allowed to intervene in the case, Fire Fighters President William H. McClennan pointed out that locals in his union were already well along in arranging an orderly transition in the work schedules before the League of Cities began its legal action in December. McClennan is also president of the AFL-CIO Public Employees Dept.

Contrary to the league's contention that the stay was needed to ease the fire fighters' changeover from old work schedules, McClennan said that the last-minute action would throw a monkey wrench into the transition. He stressed that the period between May and December was too long for the league to contend they were ill-prepared or had inadequate notice. He added:

"It should also be noted that in a number of instances in which state and local governmental employers have acted to reduce the weekly hours worked by individual fire fighters so as to avoid the necessity of paying overtime compensation under the act, they have hired additional fire fighters to maintain the same level of service, thus accomplishing one of the primary purposes of the overtime requirements of the act to increase employment."

McClennan also refuted the league's contention that most Fire Fighters do not want coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act because it would interfere with second jobs. McClennan said that for 16 years, Fire Fighters' conventions have called for FLSA coverage, including the overtime provisions, and that in all that time, his union received only one letter asking that the FLSA not be applied to Fire Fighters.

The broader questions of the case involve the authority of the federal government to impose standards on state and local governments. Thus federal regulations on equal pay and age discrimination would also be at issue.

The league's request for a stay was originally turned down by a three-member panel of federal judges on the grounds that the Supreme Court had already answered the same question in a 1968 case stemming from earlier FLSA amendments. But Burger subsequently granted the stay and the full court then extended it.

The union brief refuted the National League of Cities' contention that an emergency existed to justify the stay, noting that during congressional consideration of the FLSA amendments, the league's testimony had been used as an expert opinion on the overall cost of the provisions.

The brief also cited previous Supreme Court decisions on the application of federal civil rights laws to local government employment.

In addition to the AFL-CIO and the Fire Fighters, the suit was joined by the State, County & Municipal Employees, Operating Engineers, Service Employees, Teachers and the National Education Association.

House Democrats Vote New Era on Chairmen

caucus, probably Thomas S. Foley of Washington for the Agriculture Committee and Melvin Price of Illinois for Armed Services. Both are the next senior members. Poage or Hebert—or anyone else—could then be nominated from the floor. Poage indicated that he will support Foley for the post; Hebert was quoted as threatening to break caucus discipline and carry his fight to the full House, seeking Republican aid.

The full caucus, in a turnabout, declined to go along with Steering Committee recommendations for replacement of two other chairmen — Wright Patman of Texas and Wayne Hays of Ohio.

The Steering Committee, in a surprise move, had voted to replace Banking Committee Chairman Patman, who has served in the House since 1929, longest of any congressman. The panel passed over the next two senior members and proposed Henry S. Reuss of Wisconsin as chairman. But the full caucus rejected Reuss by a 146-141 vote. Procedural differences entered the debate and Reuss has said he will still be a contender when the caucus meets again.

The Steering Committee also voted to reject the substitution of Frank Thompson, Jr., of New Jersey for Hays as chairman of the Administration Committee—a post of considerable influence on the internal workings of the House. The margin made it likely that Hays would retain the chairmanship at the next caucus.

There was no challenge to the top party leaders—Carl Albert of Oklahoma had no Democratic opposition for re-election as Speaker of the House and Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., earlier was unanimously re-elected majority leader.

Retirements and resignations brought new chairmen to a number of other committees, including the ascension of Al Ullman of Oregon to head the powerful Ways & Means Committee. Rep. Wilbur D. Mills, seeking to overcome a self-described alcoholism, agreed to step down voluntarily.

A 43-seat Democratic gain in the House, raising the party's majority to 291-144, resulted in committee changes at least as far-reaching as the replacement of chairmen.

Earlier the caucus had voted to establish party control of every House committee by a 2-1 ratio plus one additional Democrat. Thus, the Commerce Committee will have 29 Democratic and 14 Republican members. In the 93rd Congress, the Democratic majority was only 25-19.

The new lineups will give nearly all committees a liberal or moderate liberal majority, largely nullifying the ability of a coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats to control decisions.

There will be one less committee in the 94th Congress. The Democratic caucus voted and the full House confirmed the abolition of the Internal Security Committee—formerly the Un-American Activities Committee—and transfer its functions to the Judiciary Committee.

There are 75 freshmen Democrats, counting both those who replaced retiring Democrats as well as those who won Republican-held seats, and most of them are relatively liberal.

Within the Democratic caucus, the unusually large freshman contingent emerged as a power base.

Committee chairmen whom new congressmen once courted for favors were now called before the Democratic freshmen for polite but pointed questioning.

In the Senate, Republicans had a leadership skirmish.

Liberal Jacob K. Javits of New York sought the chairmanship of the Republican conference, the party caucus. He was beaten by conservative Carl T. Curtis of Nebraska, 23-14.

Two Rail Unions Move For Mediation of Talks

Two of the 17 unions bargaining with the naiton's railroads have exercised their right to ask the National Mediation Board to step into the negotiations.

Requesting mediation were the Railway & Airline Clerks and the Machinists, which along with other rail unions have been in negotiations with the major carriers since last fall. Earlier, the Sheet Metal Workers set a strike date of Jan. 24.

A request for mediation is one of the steps necessary to conform with the Railway Labor Act.

President C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks previously had said the offer made to his union was "without a shred of reality."

The Machinists described the action as a refusal on their part to accept "the stalling around of weeks of talks and scores and meetings." Machinists Vice President John Peterpaul said the union had submitted 22 proposals to management and had received a "flat no" on 18 of them and a "wholly inadequate offer on four—on wages, cost of living, health and welfare and subcontracting."

The general chairmen of four shopcraft unions also bargaining with the railroads met in Washington, D.C., and said the management offer "is totally unacceptable and must be rejected." They are the Carmen, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Firemen & Oilers and the Boilermakers.

The National Mediation Board re-entered the Sheet Metal Workers' negotiations in an attempt to avert the Jan. 24 walkout. The union has been free to strike since last August, but has continued in negotiations on issues left over from 1973 bargaining.

The strike notice against five major carriers was followed by an announcement by other carriers that they would not assign work to the Sheet Metal Workers if the five lines were struck.

In all, about 500,000 workers represented by 17 unions are affected by the current round of bargaining to replace 18-month agreements that expired Dec. 31.

The unions have asked a 20 percent initial wage increase, followed by another 15 percent boost on Jan. 1, 1976. They are also seeking a cost-of-living escalator and improved fringe benefits.

So far, the carriers, bargaining through the National Railway Labor Conference, have offered only a 9 percent initial increase and a limited cost-of-living clause.

Wholesale Price Index Rose 20.9% During 1974

The wholesale price index closed 1974 with the biggest year-to-year increase in 28 years, despite a leveling off in December as the recession began to set in deeply.

Wholesale prices declined five-tenths of 1 percent in December, the first monthly decline since October 1973. But for the year, they rose 20.9 percent, the biggest jump since a 31.1 percent increase in the post-World War II boom year of 1946.

The December decline in the index was attributable primarily to a 4.1 percent drop in the price of farm products. The decline followed increases of 2.5 percent in the index in October and 1.2 percent in November. The 3.9 percent jump in August had been the year's highest monthly increase.

In releasing the wholesale index, the Dept. of Labor warned against expecting the December decline to show up in consumer prices for December, which are yet to be released. The consumer price index contains such charges as hospital care and other services which have no wholesale equivalent, the department pointed out.

GENERAL BOARD of the AFL-CIO, including the top officers of affiliated unions and departments, called on Congress and the President to take the "immediate, massive, emergency measures" needed "to turn the economy from the edge of disaster."

Board Asks Action By Ford, Congress

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO has placed before President Ford and Congress a comprehensive and specific action program to turn the economy around and spare the American people "the misery of a depression."

It spelled out at an emergency session of the federation's General Board a major six-point program bolstered with details and documentation and asserted that "we will not relent in our support of this program to put America back to work."

The 450 unions leaders at the General Board meeting, representing the federation's 110 affiliates as well as its departments and state federations and major local central bodies, carefully listened to a series of reports on the sweep of the crisis across all sectors of the national economy and adopted unanimously the program presented to the board by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. (Text on pages 6 and 7.)

They heard AFL-CIO President George Meany detail America's "bad news" and declare that "our program must be one of action. Actions the President can take immediately. Actions the Congress can take within 60 days. It will be an emergency program."

And when the board finished its day-long task, Meany told them he will "send a copy of this program to President Ford and to every member of Congress tomorrow morning" and challenged Congress to come up with something better, if possible.

The meeting drew more than 150 reporters and broadcasters, and eight television cameras covered the opening session. National Public Radio broadcast the sessions live across the nation.

Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland described the "grim condition" of the economy and called for quick and decisive action to "restore public confidence and turn the economy around" as he presented the action program.

The program adopted by the board called for action in six major areas:

- "An immediate tax cut of at least $20 billion, primarily for low- and middle-income taxpayers, to stimulate the economy through added purchasing power."
- "Immediate government measures to reduce America's dependence on imported oil and establishment of a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing."
- "Immediate reduction of interest rates and allocation of credit for high-priority social and economic activities."
- "Immediate, massive federal efforts to create jobs for the unemployed."
- "Immediate action to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition."
- "Immediate government assistance to the unemployed to minimize their hardships."

"Without this emergency action," the board warned, "unemployment will feed on unemployment. Production cutbacks will spread

'Frustration, Heartache':

Recession's Impact Leaves Its Mark Across the Nation

No industry, no craft, no region of the nation has been immune to the spreading cancer of unemployment.

Six union leaders, speaking as representatives of a cross-section of the workforce, reported to the AFL-CIO General Board on the impact of a worsening recession whose end is not yet in sight.

The reports were grim and laced with anger at a too-little, too-late, response from government.

- I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and of the Steelworkers, cited the loss of 766,000 production jobs in the durable goods industry over the past year, adding: "You know and I know that statistics do not convey any sense of the frustration, the heartache and the dashed hopes of this vast new army of unemployed and their families."
- Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., charged that the Administration's "discredited" economic policies pushed the construction industry into a depression, with a 15 percent unemployment rate nationally and above 30 percent in some cities and crafts.
- W. Howard McClennan, president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and of the Fire Fighters, stressed that government employment is not immune to recession in the private sector. "When you're laid off, when your wages stop, it doesn't make any difference where you used to work, whether in the public sector or the private sector."
- Murray H. Finley, president of the Clothing Workers, said the unemployment rate has shot up to 10.5 percent in the textile industry and 10.7 percent in apparel. At the same time, hours of work have dropped, some of the best-known firms have been forced out of business and one-plant communities have become disaster areas.
- James T. Housewright, president of the Retail Clerks, termed unemployment a "disaster" for workers in the traditionally low-paid retail and service trades, many without union protection for whom the minimum wage has been "at once a floor and a ceiling."
- Al H. Chesser, president of the United Transportation Union, warned that the blight that has fallen on all segments of the industry will be worsened if President Ford's fuel tax is allowed to go into effect. Airlines, railroads, trucking and the maritime industry have been caught in the vise of higher fuel costs and decreased buying power in the economy.

A common theme in the six reports to the General Board was the urgent need for massive government action before the recession develops into a disastrous depression.

"We must insist," Abel said, "that the White House and the Congress act quickly, with con-

Consumer Price Index Up 12.2% Over Year

Sky-high prices forced American families to pay 12.2 percent more for the necessities of life in 1974, even as the purchasing power of the family breadwinner over the same period shrunk by 5.4 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

A rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in the government's consumer price index last month lifted the index to 155.4 percent of its 1967 average. The 12.2 percent over-the-year increase in the CPI was the highest since 1946.

Except for 1917, 1918, 1919 and 1946, years in which the United States was either engaged in or coming off a war, last year's rise in the cost-of-living was the sharpest since BLS began measuring changes in consumer prices in 1913.

While the December rise in the CPI was the smallest increase in five months and compared with increases of nine-tenths of 1 percent in each of the two preceding months, the gain was still high by historical standards.

And while retail prices continued to mount, the average worker's paycheck in December still bought less, dollar for dollar, than in 1965. Despite a four-

New Committees Turn To Legislative Agenda

By David L. Perlman

Congressional committees, many of them under new leadership, turned to a legislative agenda that is likely to clash with President Ford's severely limited program.

Ford held a televised news conference to defend his tax and energy proposals against a torrent of criticism and to reiterate his opposition to any form of increased government spending on the nation's needs.

He expressed the hope that Congress "won't make too many changes," and said the proclamation he has now issued imposing a first-step $1 a barrel tax on imported oil "will set in motion the most important and far-reaching energy conservation program in the nation's history."

Key congressmen and senators have introduced a resolution suspending the President's authority, to impose the oil tariff.

An enlarged, more liberal House Ways & Means Committee opened hearings on tax-cut legislation amid strong indications that its final shape will be greatly changed from Ford's two-part proposal.

The big new Democratic majority on the committee and in the House as a whole is not expected to approve $1,000 refunds for the affluent and what AFL-CIO President George Meany termed "peanuts for the poor."

The tax controversy will be the PROBLEMS OF WOMEN WORKERS and the drive for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment are discussed by AFL-CIO President George Meany and the top officers of the Coalition of Labor Union Women in Meany's office at federation headquarters. CLUW, formed last March by 3,200 trade unionists, is working on programs to bring more women into unions, end job discrimination because of sex and secure improved pensions and maternity benefits, child care programs and other legislation.

Federal Adjustment Benefits Denied To Import-Plagued Glass Workers

The Labor Dept. has denied trade adjustment assistance to 700 glass workers who lost their jobs because of imports of sheet glass, compounded by the slackening demand from the faltering auto and housing industries.

The denial is the first announced by the Labor Dept. since the passage of the Administration's foreign trade bill, although 210 Boot & Shoe Workers have since been certified eligible for adjustment assistance.

Affected by the denial were 350 glass workers at the Fourco Glass Co. at Fort Smith, Ark., and another 250 at Fourco's plant in Clarksburg, W.Va. Petitions for assistance were filed with Labor Dept. for the workers by the Glass & Ceramic Workers and the Glass Cutters.

These 700 glass workers are only a portion of the nearly 2,000 others in the same industry who were denied adjustment assistance in recent months under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962.

In 1970, the U.S. Tariff Commission found that imports had caused injury to the U.S. glass industry and the President authorized the affected workers to apply for assistance with the Labor Dept.

Howard Chester, executive secretary of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee of six AFL-CIO unions, estimated that from 5,000 to 6,000 glass workers have lost jobs because of imports since 1970.

Sheet and float glass imports rose from 24 percent of the U.S. market in 1970 to 28 percent in 1973, Chester noted. However, with the drop in demand in 1974 from the housing and auto industries, the imports slipped to 16 percent of the market.

Begium, Italy and Japan are the largest shippers of glass to the United States. But Communist countries have greatly expanded shipments in recent years and currenty account for 35 percent of all imports.

Union petitions for trade adjustments assistance for 1,950 glass workers have been rejected by the Labor Dept. since September. Affected by those denials were 650 workers at PPG Industries at Henryetta, Okla.; 425 workers at PPG Industries at Clarksburg, W.Va.; 250 workers at Okmulgee, Okla., in addition to the 700 Fourco workers at Fort Smith and Clarksburg.

In rejecting the unions' petitions for the Fourco workers, Deputy Under Sec. Joel Segall said that imports were not the major factor in layoffs. He attributed the decline in production to reduced demands from building construction and the substitution of float glass for sheet glass.

The 210 shoe workers certified eligible for adjustment assistance had been employed by the American Girl Fashions, Inc. at Portsmouth, N.H. Under the 1962 trade act they would be eligible for adjustment benefits of up to 65 percent of their average wage for 52 weeks, plus testing, training and job placement.

Far more workers have been denied trade adjustment assistant under the 1962 trade act then were certified eligible for benefits.

As of last October, the Tariff Commission had denied 157 petitions involving 62,566 workers affected by foreign imports. Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. had certified about 48,000 eligible for assistance. Even so, only about two-thirds of them actually received benefits.

Under the 1974 trade act, which becomes effective in April, adjustment assistance will be increased to 70 percent. The act also transfers virtually all trade adjustment assistance functions from the Tariff Commission to the Labor Dept.

And if the act is properly implemented and necessary funds are appropriated, workers displaced by imports could stand a much better chance of being certified for benefits.

Chester said that while unions are hopeful the assistance process will be liberalized, they will have to wait and see.

Alcoholic Held Concern Of Unions, Employers

Alcoholism on the job is a national problem that can be controlled with effective social programs developed through the cooperation of labor and management, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis declared.

Speaking at the 25th annual luncheon of the Labor & Industry National Coordinating Committee of the Beverage Industry, Perlis noted that the problem is found at all levels of society. And efforts are under way at all levels of society to assist problem drinkers.

The liquor industry, with labor-management support, also has accepted the responsibility of contributing to research and education programs aimed at prevention and treatment, Perlis pointed out.

He noted that the absence of effective evidence about the causes of alcoholism makes information, detection, referral, recovery and rehabilitation particularly important.

One major approach to helping the alcoholic in industry overcome the problem is through joint labor-management programs developed through collective bargaining.

"The approach should not be pro-management or pro-union, but pro-patient," Perlis stressed. "The alcoholic on the assembly line should be treated much the same as the alcoholic in the executive suite."

He said the emphasis should be on motivating all alcoholics on the journey to recovery, assuring them that the trip is worth taking.

Perlis noted that efforts to assist alcoholics in American industry have been reinforced with the creation last year of a top labor-management advisory committee to the National Council on Alcoholism. Co-chairmen of the committee are AFL-CIO President George Meany and James Roche, former board chairman of General Motors.

The full utilization of that committee should be a challenge to both governmental and voluntary funding committees, Perlis suggested. He also said the AFL-CIO will continue to press for insurance coverage for alcoholics and for the development of adequate community services for the treatment and rehabilitation of alcoholics.

New Department Begins Newsletter

The new AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. has begun publication of a biweekly newsletter, entitled In the Public Service.

Congress Prepares Legislative Agenda

first big test for the new Ways & Means chairman, Rep. Al Ullman of Oregon, who took over this year from Wilbur D. Mills in one of four replacements of incumbent chairmen by less senior members of committees.

While Mills had agreed to step down as chairman, three other veteran congressmen were dropped from the chairmanships of major committees by secret ballot votes of the House Democratic caucus.

In one case, after a series of votes, the caucus completely shattered seniority precedents by picking the fourth-ranking Democrat as chairman. It elected Henry S. Reuss of Wisconsin to head the Banking, Currency & Housing Committee.

A week earlier, the caucus had narrowly rejected Reuss for the post in apparent disagreement with the procedure under which the Democratic Steering Committee made the initial decision to nominate Reuss instead of Wright Patman of Texas, long-time chairman and the oldest House member in terms of service.

The Steering Committee then submitted Patman's name. Reuss and an even more junior member of the committee, Robert G. Stephens, Jr., of Georgia, were nominated from the floor. Stephens was eliminated on the first ballot and then Reuss was designated chairman by a 152-117 vote over Patman.

There were no clearly ideological conflicts between Patman and Reuss—both have called for reduced interest rates—and the debate dealt largely with issues of effectiveness, vigor and personal style.

Two other committee chairmen who were ousted—F. Edward Hebert of Louisiana and W. R. Poage of Texas—were vulnerable as conservatives who had worked and voted more closely with the Republicans than with the majority of House Democrats.

The caucus approved Melvin Price of Illinois to replace Hebert as Armed Services chairman and Thomas S. Foley of Washington as chairman of the Agriculture Committee.

The caucus, however, refused to replace Wayne L. Hays of Ohio with Frank Thompson, Jr., of New Jersey as head of the House Administration Committee. It also rebuffed challenges to several influential chairmen of Appropriations subcommittees, relying on an infusion of new Democratic members to ensure that key programs aren't starved for funds.

No committee chairman had been denied reappointment since 1967, when Adam Clayton Powell of New York was dropped as chairman of the Education & Labor Committee.

In the Senate, both the Democratic and Republican caucuses endorsed resolutions requiring all committee meetings to be open to the public and press unless the members voted to close them for specified reasons. House-Senate conferences would also be open unless conferees from either chamber voted to close the sessions.

The hottest behind-the-scenes fight on the Senate side was in the Democratic Steering Committee, where assignments to legislative committees are made.

The issue was the filling of a Democratic vacancy on the Judiciary Committee, whose chairman is James O. Eastland of Mississippi and whose jurisdiction includes the expected renewal this year of the Voting Rights Act.

The civil rights coalition strongly opposed the bid of Alabama's James B. Allen for the vacancy. The Steering Committee first voted 10-7 to give the post to James Abourezk of South Dakota. It later defeated on a 9-9 tie vote a move to enlarge the committee so as to create another Democratic opening that Allen could fill.

On the Senate floor, a familiar skirmish was being refought over the rule that requires a two-thirds vote to cut off debate and break a filibuster.

A bipartisan group of senators is again trying to change the rule so as to allow 60 percent to halt a filibuster. In the past, rules changes have been blocked by filibusters that prevented them from being brought to a vote.

In the near future, Vice President Nelson Rockefeller will be asked as presiding officer of the Senate to declare whether the Senate can get to a vote on a proposed rule at the start of a new Congress by a simple majority vote.

If he so declares, it will be up to the Senate whether to accept his decision, which would likely pave the way for a change in the filibuster rule, or overturn it.

Daniel J. Sullivan Dies, Officer of Rail Clerks

Chicago—Daniel J. Sullivan, secretary-treasurer of the Railway & Airline Clerks since 1969, died at his home in Deerfield, Ill., Jan. 18. He was 59.

Sullivan held a number of BRAC local and regional offices in the New York area. He was general chairman of the New York district until he was elected vice president of the union's express division in 1963.

The BRAC executive board elected Sullivan secretary-treasurer in June 1969 and he was re-elected at the union's convention in 1971.

In a message to Sullivan's widow, Theresa, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that "his lifetime of service to the labor movement earned him the respect and affection of many thousands of trade unionists."

BRAC President C. L. Dennis said the unexpected death of Sullivan "is deeply felt by all officers and all members of the brotherhood."

At a special meeting of the BRAC executive board, Vice Pres. D. A. Bobo was elected to fulfill Sullivan's unexpired term. Bobo had been a general chairman with the Transportation Communications Employees Union when it merged with BRAC in 1969.

In 1971, Bobo became the first vice president of BRAC's transportation-communications division and was elected a vice president of the international in March 1972.

Fred J. Kroll, general chairman of the union's Penn Central system board, was elected to succeed Bobo as a vice president.

further. The threat of widespread bankruptcies of businesses and banks will become reality."

It pointed up that the recession that began more than a year ago is the most prolonged "and the deepest since the 1930s," and that the "downward spiral is gathering momentum."

Meany's opening speech to the special meeting termed President Ford's program "one of the weirdest . . . I have ever seen"—a program that is based on "statistics, computer profiles and economists' models, but not on human needs."

He warned Ford that "the AFL-CIO will not shrink in its support of vital social programs just because (he) is threatening to veto any new programs."

Tracing the history of Nixon economic policy through the Ford Administration, Meany noted that the AFL-CIO "repeatedly and consistently warned of the dangers facing this country . . . but the policy makers were deaf to our warnings and blind to the evidence." We take no satisfaction in being right, he added, "every one of us wishes we had been wrong."

He sharply assailed Ford's tax and energy programs as falling short on fighting either the recession or inflation and specifically attacked his proposal to put a 5 percent ceiling on social security cost-of-living increases as well as other retirement programs and federal workers' wages.

Meany's keynote was followed by reports on the economic crunch in various sectors of the economy by Presidents I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Robert Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., W. Howard McClennan of the Public Employees Dept., Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks and Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union.

The action program was presented to the board by Kirkland, and each of the six major areas was supported and expanded on by AFL-CIO vice presidents—John H. Lyons on taxes, Paul Hall on energy, Joseph Keenan on housing and credit, Martin J. Ward on public works and impounded funds, Peter Bommarito on foreign trade, and Jerry Wurf on unemployment insurance, welfare and public service jobs.

The proposal for a tax cut specifically called for Congress to act on the unanimous compromise recommendations of the Labor-Management Advisory Committee to the President for a $15 billion cut in individual income taxes effective Jan. 1, 1975, through reduced withholding from paychecks by means of a $70 tax credit per exemption and a 5 percent cut in the tax remaining after the exemption credit, with a maximum cut of $375 per return.

There would also be a $5 billion cut in corporate taxes through an increase in the investment tax credit from the present 7 percent to 12 percent and from 4 percent to 12 percent for utilities.

The energy proposal called for a quota on oil imports "including a ban on such imports originating in those countries that embargoed oil to the United States and Holland in 1973-74." It called for opposition to the President's $3 per barrel duty on imported oil as an excise to be paid by consumers and rejected his proposal to decontrol domestic crude oil and deregulate the price of natural gas.

On interest rates, the program asked legislation mandating the Federal Reserve Board to reduce interest rates and allocate credit.

Immediate release of a substantial portion of the $19 billion in appropriated funds impounded by the President was the lead item in the job creation proposal along with action on an accelerated public works program and full funding of the public service jobs program.

The proposal on trade called for the President to establish quotas on imports of industrial goods where U.S. production has declined in recent months and export controls on raw materials in short domestic supply, as well as dealing with tax privileges for multinationals.

On assistance to the unemployed, the program called for substantial improvements in the unemployment insurance system to cover benefits, duration and other requirements during the emergency period, provide health care for the unemployed who lose health insurance coverage along with their jobs, improved welfare during the emergency with the costs borne by the federal government and an improved food stamp program with no increase in cost.

fidence of purpose and with equity, to put our members and America back to work. As one who lived through the '30s and barely survived, I say one depression in a century is more than enough."

Abel said the "ripple effect" of cutbacks in major industries is becoming "a tidal wave." Cutbacks in auto sales and production have meant cutbacks in tire plants, in parts shops, in glass manufacturing and other suppliers.

Construction declines mean that 7,000 members of the Pottery Workers who normally manufacture bathroom fixtures are unemployed and 2,000 others are on reduced workweeks. Cement production is down, furniture sales are off and "the electronics industry is, by anybody's measure, a disaster area." Its employment is 206,000 below a year ago, Abel said, and at least 15 percent of the members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers are out of work.

"Americans want jobs, not welfare," Abel said, "and this great country of ours should be able to give them work."

Chesser said development of alternate fuel sources, not high oil taxes, is needed for self-sufficiency. He added:

"If it takes federal assistance to revive and restore our vital transportation systems, so be it. If the private power companies can't bring on cheap nuclear power, let the government increase expenditures on projects that will make the nation stronger.

"If these measures do not bring back full employment, then let the government expand unemployment assistance and create jobs in fields and projects which would be of benefit to the nation and its people.

"After all, that's the real purpose of government. It's our government and it must respond to the people's needs."

Housewright noted the AFL-CIO's repeated warnings of economic disaster at the time when the Administration's economists were dogmatically advocating "high interest, tight money and budget cuts."

Only now, he said has there been a belated, grudging change in government economic policy.

For low-paid retail and service workers, Housewright said, the era of wage controls was a disaster that has left those who still have jobs at the mercy of the fierce inflation.

A 5.5 percent ceiling on wages that were too low to start with meant that the workers and their families were unable to cope with an inflation that was most severe in the necessities that comprise the bulk of their living expenses.

Angrily, he said: "Our people want to know what our government is going to do to get us out of the rotten mess we are in. They aren't going to be satisfied with a $50 tax rebate . . . particularly when those proposing the tax cut will receive a $1,000 rebate."

Trickle-down economic theories, Housewright said, "should have died with the Hoover Administration."

Georgine gave a vivid account of the impact on "the nation's largest industry" of government policies keyed to high-interest rates, freezing of housing programs, cutbacks in federal construction and "defiantly impounding many millions of dollars of funds contrary to the intent of Congress."

As a result, he said, "the construction industry is fighting for its breath. The housing industry has collapsed. Electric utilities have been compelled to cut back on vitally needed energy expansion programs. Commercial construction has dropped dramatically. Highway construction is virtually dried up. Contractors by the tens of thousands are being forced to the wall."

Finley spoke of the staggering blow to apparel and textile industries as the slump in consumer buying power came on top of unemployment created by imports from the cheap wage areas of the world.

When buying power shrinks and people fear for their jobs, clothing purchases are put off, Finley noted. And textile and apparel workers are laid off.

The blow of joblessness often hits "in one-shop towns" without alternative employment opportunities, he noted, and also in large cities where unemployment is already higher than average.

"In addition," Finley said, "the apparel and textile industries employ large numbers of women and members of minority groups, for whom jobs are even scarcer during recessions."

McClennan compared the "needless human grief" of a nation "pockmarked by economic explosions" with disasters he encountered as a fire fighter.

Particularly at the local level, he said, business recession and consequent drops in tax revenues have forced layoffs and cutbacks of public employes. Statistics in this area are somewhat misleading, he suggested, since the emergency public service jobs created to ease unemployment in the private sector often conceal layoffs of regular city employes.

McClennan warned that "the public service jobs program doesn't go nearly far enough to meet the needs of the unemployed today, regardless of whether they worked in the private sector or the public sector before they lost their jobs."

Kircher is the former AFL-CIO organizing director and also has served as a trustee of Ohio University.

A Time for Action

THIS GENERAL BOARD has been called into emergency session because of the state of the American economy. President Ford last week said it is "not good." That sets some sort of a record for understatement. The fact is: the economy is in the worst shape it has been in since the Great Depression.

Six and a half million workers were counted by the Labor Dept. as officially unemployed in December.

Another 850,000 unemployed are reported as too discouraged to even look for work. Still another 3.4 million people are working part-time for what the Labor Dept. calls "economic reasons."

That adds up to 10.7 million Americans who are either out of a job or underemployed as a result of the current recession. And those are only the ones counted by the government.

Unemployment among blacks and other minorities is higher now than at any time since World War II. And the government's official statistics do not reflect real conditions in the ghetto. Unemployment rates estimated as high as 40 percent. Rampant discouragement. Real deprivation and hopelessness. The cold statistics miss this human misery.

The gross national product—a Commerce Dept. statistic—dropped 9.1 percent in the last three months of 1974. This is the largest decline in the GNP in nearly 30 years. The primary cause was a drop in consumer spending.

Double-digit inflation—fueled by the prices of food and energy and by high interest rates—continues unabated. The buying power of workers' paychecks is lower now than it was in 1965. And if the buying power of paychecks can't keep up with inflation, you can imagine what has happened to unemployment compensation checks.

The only good news in the President's speech was that he admitted there was only bad news. In fact, the real bad news in the President's message was his proposals. His economic program was the weirdest one I have ever seen:

To fight recession and stimulate the economy, he resurrected the old, discredited "trickle-down" theory of economics that Arthur Burns first learned before the 1930 depression.

For those who are suffering the most—the unemployed, the aged, the sick and the poor—he proposed even more suffering.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSALS were very disappointing. They were based on statistics, computer profiles and economists' models, but not on human needs. Unless an Administration looks at people as flesh and blood, and not as simple statistics, its proposals will not be good enough for the American people.

The American people demand a program to end recession . . . a program that will get America back to work . . . a program that will stabilize the economy. That is why we are here today.

This has not been a very happy speech. It wasn't meant to be. This is not a very happy time for America.

But we have faith—in this country, in its system of government, in the strength of its people. We wouldn't be here if we didn't have faith.

Faith has carried America this far. But we can't live on faith alone. It must be buttressed by action. Now is the time for action—compassionate, sensible, fair action by Congress and the President.

A Word Edgewise:

Boston School Mess Makes Young Pay for Elders' Sins

By John P. Roche

IF I HAVE ONE WISH IN 1975, it is that the appalling educational shambles in Boston will be cleared up. It would take about 50 pages to simply explore the background, but to put the matter in shorthand, Boston has been hit simultaneously by at least four crises: 1) leadership; 2) money; 3) class; and 4) race. When you put these in a pot and let them brew for over a decade, the result is a noxious mix. And that is precisely what has happened. Alas, the victims are not the politicians who played hypocritical games but a bunch of youngsters who are paying for the sins of their elders.

To be precise, when the pioneer state racial imbalance act was passed a decade ago—at a time when civil rights was the "in" thing—the legislators looked on it as a pious abstraction—a special novena for cosmetic purposes. It had, after all, been sponsored by a blue ribbon panel including Richard Cardinal Cushing and a number of other ethical magnates. Then . . . nothing. The Boston School Committee ignored it, mayors of Boston blamed the School Committee, the governors blamed . . . and so it went. Those who supported the measure learned that every fifth time around, they got a brass ring.

From the outset I argued that the racial imbalance act was a fake and would remain one until a new system was implemented to fund Boston's schools. Boston, like other cities and towns in the Commonwealth, raises school funds from a general property tax—but roughly half of the property in the city is tax exempt. Thus the whole school system has been starved. I have no objection to busing children to obtain a better education—and in a multi-racial community that involves learning in an ethnically mixed context—but it has struck me as a logical tragedy to bus kids from one lousy school to another.

Which brings us to the real barrier: the Chinese wall the affluent suburbs have built around Boston. Our daughter, for example, rode a bus seven miles each way to and from our friendly "neighborhood" school, but when she got there she got as good an education as our town's broad tax base could supply. I don't have the statistics handy, but my guess is that our system laid out roughly twice as much per pupil as Boston's.

At the risk of being lynched, I think this is outrageous. The school property tax should be abolished and all schools funded from income tax revenues with whatever tax increase is necessary to do a decent statewide job. This would make it possible to build good schools in the poor areas—whether inhabited by blacks, whites, Chicanos or Eskimos. The present arrangement perfectly fulfills Jesus' observation that "from them that have not shall it be taken away."

IN CONCRETE TERMS this means that my tax money would go to support schools in Roxbury and Hyde Park. Fine—I have always understood that one of the functions of taxation in a democratic society is to redistribute income in the interest of improving everybody's education, health, housing and general welfare. Despite the wild shrieks of School Committee yahoos, the hard fact is that Boston just can't cope in isolation.

So back we go to square one: the current mess in Boston. It is a grievous error to look at the brawls as a race war. A bunch of tough poor kids have been dumped on the turf of another bunch of tough poor kids—accidentally one bunch is black, but you would be seeing the same problems if the invaders were Italo-Americans, Polish-Americans or poor Appalachian WASPs. The key is class—economic status and all that goes with it—no skin color. (About 40 years ago in Dorchester the poor, tough Jews were fighting it out with the poor, tough Irish: A friend of mine still bears scars from that war.)

Top priority right now must be given to the enforcement of Judge Garrity's desegregation order. Second, a number of Boston politicians should be afflicted with acute laryngitis for about six months. But third, and in the long run most important, the new governor and General Court should eliminate the archaic school funding system and equalize opportunities for all young people in the Commonwealth.

Meany to JLC:

Decline of U.S. Leadership Threatens Human Rights Goals

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany to the Jewish Labor Committee eighth annual award dinner in New York City:

HUMAN RIGHTS are a disgrace in the United Nations. They are a mockery in the Soviet Union; they are threatened with extinction in the Middle East; they are trampled on by scores of petty dictatorships on several continents; they are an embarrassment to some of our Western European allies; they are a nuisance to our businessmen, who are hankering after detente dollars; they are twisted and unrecognizable in lands ravished by famine and natural disaster, and, yes, they are too painful to think about in that poor little country of Vietnam.

Now, this is not a pretty picture, and what's the cause? What's the reason for this worldwide human rights recession? Is it that people don't care about human rights any more? I don't think so. That would be like saying that unemployment is rising because people don't want to work any more.

I think that in both cases there is something wrong with our policies and definitely something wrong with our leadership.

I'm not blaming all of the world's troubles on Henry Kissinger, but I'm saying, in the final analysis, the cause of human rights in this world is dependent on the strength—the economic strength, the military strength, the moral strength —of the United States of America.

If we falter, freedom is shaken everywhere. And I don't say this because I am a jingoist or a chauvinist. I say it because I've been around a long time, because I read maps, because I read history and witnesses, and because I can count. I say it because I've heard it again and again from the people who know best, the refugees and victims of totalitarianism, whether of the right or the left.

And I believe—advisedly believe, sincerely believe—that Dr. Kissinger has presided over an era which has seen a decline of American strength —military, economic and moral—of unprecedented proportion.

The decline in America's strength and moral leadership is severe enough to present this generation of Americans with the very real prospect that they may live out their lives in a world dominated by the most powerful and reactionary totalitarian force in the history of mankind.

Yet, this horrible prospect does not seem to agitate large numbers of thoughtful Americans, especially those, I'm sad to say, from whom we in the labor movement seek the closest cooperation on domestic and economic issues.

I'm speaking, of course, of many of our liberal friends, who are gung-ho for detente at any price. And I speak of them not with bitterness, but with a certain sense of bafflement. For here are the people who looked at what the Nixon-Agnew Administration did to our domestic affairs, to our economy, to the war on poverty, to senior citizens, to civil liberties, to minorities and all the rest, and they said this was terrible, a disaster, an unmitigated disaster.

But then they looked at the foreign policies of these same people, headed by the same man they denounced as the most corrupt president in the history of this country, and they looked at detente and they say it's wonderful, it's progressive, it means a generation of peace.

And what about the economic aspects of this detente, brought to you by the same folks who brought to you the miracle of recession with inflation? That's wonderful, too. Free trade is terrific; trade is the road to peace.

And when we in the labor movement raise our voices to ask what impact these trade policies will have on American workers, on American jobs, what are we told? We are told, in effect, don't worry. The Administration wouldn't think of sacrificing your jobs to achieve its own political purposes. After all, just because the Administration has already given us 7 percent unemployment, there's no reason to be suspicious of its plans for international trade. We're told this, not just by the Administration, but by some of our liberal friends.

WELL, TO THE ADMINISTRATION and these so-called liberal friends, we say, "Thanks, but no thanks. We're not buying."

We're not paranoid, we're very practical people. Protecting American workers and their jobs is not a hobby with us and it's not an afterthought. And on this score, I think our overall record is good. And if the truth be told, we also have a pretty good record of sizing up the economy from the point of view of the country as a whole.

Read our statements, our predictions going back to 1969, and you'll see that we have a pretty good record. Then read—going back a year or only a few months ago—read the predictions of the Administration's own egg-heads, who are running the show. And then read ours and see who is paranoid.

So, we say to some of our liberal friends, the contradiction is on your side of the fence, not ours. We are consistent. What we want for ourselves at home—political democracy, social justice, economic security—we want for all people. We think that is a pretty worthy object for American foreign policy.

Meanwhile, we continue to make our own independent judgments on matters of foreign policy, regardless of how those judgments rub the Administration or the loyal opposition party. It is our judgment that the foreign policies pursued by our government in the last half decade have failed to produce any of the major results that were predicted.

As Unemployment Mounts:

Improved Enforcement Urged To Curb Child Labor Abuses

STIFF ENFORCEMENT of the Wage & Hour Law and prohibitions against child labor should be a high priority for the Labor Dept. during this period of deepening recession and mounting unemployment, Service Employees economist Rudolph Oswald said.

Even hit-and-miss federal monitoring last year uncovered 15,000 children illegally employed, Oswald said. He pointed out that federal inspectors investigated only 2 or 3 percent of the nation's workplaces and turned up only a small fraction of the actual child labor law violations.

Oswald, SEIU research director, said that citizen complaints can help curb child labor abuses. He urged that suspected violations be reported to the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division offices located throughout the country. He said that unfortunately, many employers cut legal corners feeling that children are more flexible than adults, will work for lower wages and can be fired or laid off without complaint.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Oswald said that tight enforcement of minimum wage and overtime requirements, as well as the child labor laws, is especially important during recessionary periods. He pointed out that the Fair Labor Standards Act was adopted during a major recession, with one of its key aims to put the floor under wages so that unemployed workers would not be underbidding workers with jobs, causing a downward spiral of wages.

Oswald renewed the call to shorten the standard workweek and increase the overtime penalty to double-time, to create more job opportunities for workers who need jobs but can't find them. He noted that the time-and-a-half overtime penalty was set in 1938, when most of the payroll was purely wages. He said that with the growth of fringe benefits over the years, on which no overtime payment is required, the deterrent against scheduling excess hours instead of hiring more workers is quite outdated.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ALMOST A YEAR AND A HALF AGO the Arab oil-producing nations stunned the United States with their oil embargo and their huge increase in the price of crude oil.

With bitter memories of empty gas tanks and the long lines of customers waiting, sometimes in vain, to buy a few gallons of gasoline, the United States resolved that this should never happen again; that the nation must become self-sufficient in energy that is vitally needed to keep the U.S. industrial machine going no matter what its source.

How much progress has been made in attaining or even starting to attain that goal? The answer is not good at all.

Congress has set up a Federal Energy Administration, has directed the Atomic Energy Commission to explore new sources of energy and has debated all sorts of energy bills. Yet, what to do about energy is still a burning question in both Congress and the Ford Administration.

Democrats in Congress have come up with their latest call for an energy program to encourage exploration for new domestic oil and gas supplies "to encourage the development of secondary and tertiary recovery techniques for existing oil wells; to develop a national strategic energy reserve and to mandate a concentrated program of research and development aimed at other sources and methods of energy production."

As debate rages over what to do about cutting down on gasoline consumption without crippling the nation's economy and taking more money from the pockets of its workers, relatively little attention is being paid to the development of new sources of energy.

Most of the President's so-called energy section of his State of the Union report to Congress was taken up with petroleum products—an import fee on petroleum, crude oil price decontrol, natural gas deregulation, the Naval Oil Reserve, the outer continental shelf, ecological factors in drilling for oil, auto gasoline mileage increases, strategic petroleum storage—about everything you can think of about the oil shortage.

There was a considerable amount of discussion about increased coal supplies, but when it came to other sources of energy the presidential message was largely restricted to long-term energy goals "beyond 1985."

MUCH THE SAME is true of a recent report of the newly created Federal Energy Administration, entitled "Project Independence." On the basis of that report, "independence" is far off.

Here again the overwhelming emphasis is on oil—obviously crucial as that is—but again the 1985 date pops up with discussions on what the oil situation will be by that year. Some analysis is made on the possibilities of other energy sources by that date, but oil still gets the major consideration.

Yet, as long ago as October 1973—the very month that the Arab embargo was declared—the AFL-CIO 10th convention said:

"The long-range energy needs of America and the ability of the national economy require immediate measures to secure America's self-sufficiency through development of varied and alternative energy resources and technologies. That is why we most strongly recommend enactment by Congress of legislation that would mobilize the nation's scientific and technological resources through a 10-year, $20 billion crash program to expand existing and develop alternative energy resources—including advanced nuclear power technology, oil shale development, improved utilization of coal resources, electrical power technology, conservation of fuels and energy and modes of transportation."

There is little of this sense of urgency for developing a "crash program" in either the President's energy proposals or the Federal Energy Administration's "Project Independence."

The United States has gone through great crises before. As the AFL-CIO noted, out of the first New Deal came the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Public Utilities Holding Act and the Bonneville Power Administration. It is this kind of imaginative thinking that the federation called for "to put America's energy house in order."

DEEP RECESSION and high unemployment demand stiff enforcement of the Wage & Hour and child labor laws, Service Employees Research Director Rudolph Oswald, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Dale McFeatters, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News.

Text of General Board's 'Action' Plan

The following is "An Action Program to Put America Back to Work" adopted by the AFL-CIO General Board, Jan. 23, 1975, at Washington, D. C.

AMERICA IS IN AN economic emergency. The recession, which began more than a year ago, is already the most prolonged and the deepest since the 1930s. There is no end in sight.

The downward spiral is gathering momentum. In December, industrial production tumbled 2.8 percent, on top of a 4.6 percent decline in the previous 12 months. Public confidence in the government's ability to manage the economy continues to erode from one record low-point to another.

The country is on the brink of depression. Immediate, massive, emergency measures are required to turn the economy from the edge of disaster.

Without this emergency action, unemployment will feed on unemployment. Production cutbacks will spread further. The threat of widespread bankruptcies of businesses and banks will become reality.

Therefore, to spare the American people the misery of a depression and to turn the economy around and provide jobs for American workers, the AFL-CIO General Board urges the following immediate actions by the Congress and the President:

I. An immediate tax cut of at least $20 billion, primarily for low- and middle-income taxpayers, to stimulate the economy through added purchasing power.

Specifically, we urge immediate congressional consideration of the unanimous compromise recommendations of the Labor-Management Advisory Committee to the President. This emergency tax package calls for:

1—A $15 billion cut of individual income taxes, effective Jan. 1, 1975, through reduced withholding from paychecks, heavily weighted on behalf of low- and middle-income families, by means of a $70 tax credit per exemption and a 5 percent cut in the tax remaining after exemption credit, with a maximum cut of $375 per return; and

2—A $5 billion cut in corporate taxes to create jobs through an increase in the investment tax credit from the present 7 to 12 percent on business investment in equipment and machinery in the United States and from the present 4 to 12 percent for utilities.

The President ignored the recommendations of his Labor-Management Advisory Committee. He proposed a 12 percent tax rebate, up to a maximum of $1,000. This would amount to less than $12 for a family of four earning $5,000 and only $157 for a similar sized family earning $12,500 a year. By contrast, a family would have to have an income of more than $41,000 (about 2 percent of U.S. families) to receive the maximum $1,000 rebate.

The President's proposal would not stimulate the economy, because it gives the bulk of its benefits to those income groups who don't need it. Low- and middle-income families, those hardest hit by inflation and recession, need a tax cut in order to purchase consumer goods and they need it every week, not just in two pitifully small lump sums. Therefore, we will oppose the President's lopsided rebate proposal.

In addition, we will support enactment of a program to give relief to those working poor who pay no income taxes because their earnings are too low. Such a program will also stimulate the economy by giving added purchasing power to those who need it the most.

Following enactment of the needed emergency tax-cut stimulus for the economy, we urge the appropriate committees of the Congress to promptly begin work on closing the loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and corporations. Only through tax justice will the government's needs for tax revenue be met by a fair and equitable tax structure.

II. Immediate government measures to reduce America's dependence on imported oil and establishment of a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing.

President Ford's energy proposals are rationing by unfair taxation and high prices and would not conserve energy. He has proposed unfair tax and price increases for oil and natural gas which would be passed on to all consumers without distinguishing between essential and unessential consumption. In fact, increased energy costs would far exceed the President's proposed tax reductions for the vast majority of American families.

His proposed so-called "windfall profits tax" is not a tax on profits at all. It is yet another excise tax on each barrel of oil and will be paid by consumers. His proposed reduction in the corporate tax rate is economically unjustified.

Therefore, the AFL-CIO urges the Congress to take the following immediate actions:

1—Enact a quota on oil imports, including a ban on such imports originating in those countries that embargoed oil to the United States and Holland in 1973-74.

2—Take the importation of oil out of private hands and place it in the hands of government. The government should determine the amount of oil imported, negotiate its price and provide for its internal allocation.

3—Establish a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing to minimize regional, industry and individual hardships.

4—Reject the President's proposal to deregulate the price of natural gas and decontrol the price of domestic crude oil. In addition, the government should revoke the lease of any oil or natural gas producer who refuses to pump supplies discovered on land leased from the United States. These leases should then be turned over to companies who will produce the needed supplies.

5—Block the President's imposition of a $3 per barrel duty on imported oil. This proposal is nothing more than another excise tax which would be paid by consumers and is particularly discriminatory against the industrialized Northeast.

6—Encourage enforcement of the reduced highway speed limit, encourage drivers to reduce optional trips, increase operating subsidies to mass transit for fare reductions.

7—Terminate U.S. government subsidies for the giant international oil companies, including elimination of the depletion allowance on foreign oil operations and the dollar-for-dollar credit against U.S. taxes for these corporations' royalty and tax payments to foreign governments.

8—Adopt a genuine excess profits tax, such as the successful tax in effect during the Korean War.

9—Stretch out present environmental restrictions on energy production and use to reduce energy consumption and facilitate expansion of domestic energy output. This is a matter of timetable not of objectives. The advance of technology and development of clean energy sources can permit realization of environmental objectives. The two programs should be viewed as compatible parts of a single problem. Extension of auto emission control standards should provide that the auto companies be required to increase mileage per gallon and to lower prices, dollar-for-dollar, for any cost reductions enjoyed as a result of an extension.

10—Establish a petroleum stockpile to guard against future oil embargoes.

When these emergency steps are taken, the Congress must then begin work on creation of a federal oil and gas corporation to provide a yardstick for new energy exploration and development; launch a crash program to develop alternative energy sources and technology; investigate monopolistic practices of the giant oil companies; and regulate foreign investments in the U.S. from the oil-producing areas of the Middle East.

III. Immediate reduction of interest rates and allocation of credit for high-priority social and economic activities.

Under the Credit Control Act of 1969, the President has the authority to direct the Federal Reserve Board to reduce interest rates and allocate credit. If he continues to refuse to use this authority, the Congress must enact legislation mandating the Federal Reserve Board to take these actions.

Significantly lower interest rates are essential to restore the health of the home-building industry and to encourage the general expansion of sales, production and employment. In addition, available credit must be allocated for housing, local government facilities and basic industrial expansion. Curbs must be placed on the extension of credit to speculators, gambling casino operators and foreign borrowers.

The AFL-CIO also urges the following actions:

1—Presidential reactivation of all programs for low- and middle-income housing. Revival of these programs, already authorized and funded by the Congress, would support the construction of thousands of needed housing units, providing jobs on the construction sites and in the various supply industries.

2—An immediate reduction in interest rates for FHA and VA home mortgages to 6 percent under federal mortgage assistance programs.

3—An immediate review of government regulations holding up the awarding of federal funds for the construction of housing.

4—Establishment by the Congress of a government agency to be the lender of last resort for business and state and local governments. The interest rates should be reasonable and loans should be directed at the preservation and creation of jobs in the private sector, including housing, as well as to assist state and local government efforts to maintain and expand public facilities and services.

In addition, the Congress should immediately undertake a broad review of federal housing programs with a view toward expanding federal efforts, better coordinating programs and reducing unnecessary red tape. If the United States can make loans of U.S. taxpayer money to the Soviet Union at 6 and 7 percent interest rates, then it can surely authorize home mortgage loans to the American people at similar interest rates.

IV. Immediate, massive federal efforts to create jobs for the unemployed.

There is only one solution to unemployment, and that is jobs. Therefore, the AFL-CIO urges emergency action on the following job-creating programs:

1—Immediate release of a substantial portion of the $19 billion in appropriated funds impounded by the President. Priority should be given to releasing those funds that would create jobs. Specifically:

a. $9 billion of the impounded funds for construction grants for sewers and waste treatment plants.

b. Nearly $4.4 billion for federal aid to highways.

c. $372.5 million for hospital construction and modernization.

In addition, we urge the President not to carry out his announced intention to impound about $6 billion more in highway funds for Fiscal Year 1976.

Release of these funds could immediately result in orders for building materials and the hiring of workers for on-site construction.

2—Immediate congressional action on an Accelerated Public Works program providing a minimum of $2 billion in grants to communities with high unemployment to enable them to step up short-term construction and repairs of public facilities.

3—Full funding by the Congress and full implementation by the Labor Dept. and state and local governments of the Public Service Employment Program adopted by the Congress in December.

The long lines of applicants for these public service jobs in communities across the country also indicate the need in fiscal 1976 to increase the present authorization so as to provide one million additional public service jobs for Americans who cannot find work.

We insist that federally financed public service jobs must be additional jobs and that state and local governments must not be permitted to fire permanent employes in order to hire temporary public service job seekers. Workers hired under the public service employment program should be accorded the same general conditions of employment as regular state and local government employes.

4—Expansion of federal programs to provide assistance to young people to stay in school, and a doubling of the youth summer job program to help young people earn enough money to return to school in the fall.

V. Immediate action to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition.

Because of the nation's economic crisis and the continuing large deficit in the U.S. balance of payments, we urge the President to:

1—Immediately use his powers under the Trade Act of 1974 to establish quotas on imports of industrial goods in those areas where U.S. production has declined in recent months.

2—Immediately impose import restrictions against countries whose trade practices have placed unfair or unreasonable burdens on U.S. commerce.

3—Immediately impose export controls on raw materials and other products in short domestic supply, including petroleum products and coal, through a system of monitoring and licensing.

Because of the unfair economic competition resulting from the expansion of foreign operations of U.S.-based multinational companies, we urge the Congress to:

1—Revoke provisions for the deferral of tax payments on foreign-earned profits.

2—Eliminate the foreign tax credit.

3—Repeal Sections 806:30 and 807 of the Tariff Code which encourage foreign production for shipment back to U.S. markets.

4—Regulate the export of American capital and technology that results in the export of American jobs.

VI. Immediate government assistance to the unemployed to minimize their hardships.

For unemployed workers, the government must:

1—Substantially improve the nation's unemployment insurance system by:

a. Making extended unemployment compensation benefits available to jobless workers recently covered by the Emergency Jobs and Unemployment Assistance Act of 1974 for the same duration as for jobless workers covered by the permanent program.

b. Eliminating the "waiting week" requirement in state programs which delays the payment of benefits for the jobless.

c. Increasing the individual's weekly benefit amount to two-thirds of his or her weekly wage, up to 75 percent of the statewide average weekly wage, with the increased costs paid by the federal government during this emergency period.

d. Requiring Employment Security Offices in those areas of substantial unemployment to remain open longer hours all week long, hiring enough additional staff to process claims without the demeaning and unnecessary delays to which the unemployed are presently subjected.

2—Provide health care to the millions of workers who lose their health insurance coverage under employer-employe plans when they become unemployed. The health care crisis facing the unemployed—who are denied Medicaid and stripped of their group coverage—is further evidence of the need for urgent congressional enactment of National Health Security. Therefore, we also call upon the House Ways & Means Committee to quickly hold subcommittee hearings and begin work on the long-neglected problem of an adequate health care system for America.

3—Make the limited Aid to Unemployed Fathers program mandatory in all states. Additionally, because workers exhausting their unemployment insurance will have to rely increasingly on welfare to sustain themselves and their families, Congress must immediately begin work on establishing federal minimum benefit standards for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children Program.

4—Provide that the increased costs of welfare during the present emergency are borne by the federal government. Ob-

tenths of 1 percent rise from November, real spendable earnings —take-home pay adjusted for inflation—were down 5.4 percent from the year-earlier level.

At $89.12, the real spendable weekly earnings of a married worker with three dependents were $2.20 below the level for the year 1965 and $5.12 less than a year ago. December marked the 22nd straight month in which real spendable earnings were below their year-earlier level.

In an analysis of 1974 CPI changes, BLS noted about 40 percent of the increase in the index over the year was due to a rise of 13.2 percent in nonfood commodity prices. Food prices rose 12.2 percent and accounted for a fourth of the annual rise.

"The food index rose sharply in the first quarter, slowed substantially in the second, and accelerated again in the third," BLS noted. "Food prices continued to rise at a rapid rate in the fourth quarter—advancing at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 14.6 percent."

About a third of the rise in the CPI last year was due to an increase of 11.3 percent in the services index, BLS said. Price increases for energy items—gasoline, motor and fuel oil, coal, and residential natural gas and electricity—accounted for more than one-tenth.

The higher prices in December were blamed on most food items, especially sugar and products using sugar, housekeeping supplies, gas and electricity, and public transportation.

"The effect of these increases was partially offset by declines in prices for beef, fresh fruits and vegetables, clothing and used cars," BLS said.

The food component of the CPI rose seven-tenths of 1 percent in December after adjustment for seasonal variations. The nonfood commodities index rose four-tenths of 1 percent, the smallest monthly rise in 1974, while the services index increased nine-tenths of 1 percent, about the same as in October and November.

Food bought in grocery stores increased by eight-tenths of 1 percent from November to December while food purchased away from home — restaurant meals and snacks — rose by 1 percent, BLS reported.

Besides sugar, unusually sharp prices were posted for cereal and bakery products. Prices for these items went up 2.3 percent over the month, or at an annual rate of 27.6 percent. Prices for dairy products rose by 1.7 percent, an annual rate of 20.4 percent.

Pork and poultry prices rose instead of declining as they usually do in December, BLS noted.

Prices continued to increase for a wide range of nonfood commodities. Advances were larger than in recent months for some items such as tobacco products and tires. Gasoline prices rose slightly following four consecutive monthly declines.

Sixty percent of the rise in the services index in December was due to higher charges for household services such as rent, gas, electricity, property taxes and appliance repairs, BLS noted.

Taxicab, railroad, airline and intercity bus fares rose sharply, and auto insurance charges continued to increase over the month. Charges for most other services, such as medical care, recreational and personal care, continued to rise in December.

TWUA Urges Stricter Dust Safeguards

New York—Stricter federal controls are needed on cotton dust to protect textile workers from the disabling "brown lung" disease, the Textile Workers Union of America told the Secretary of Labor.

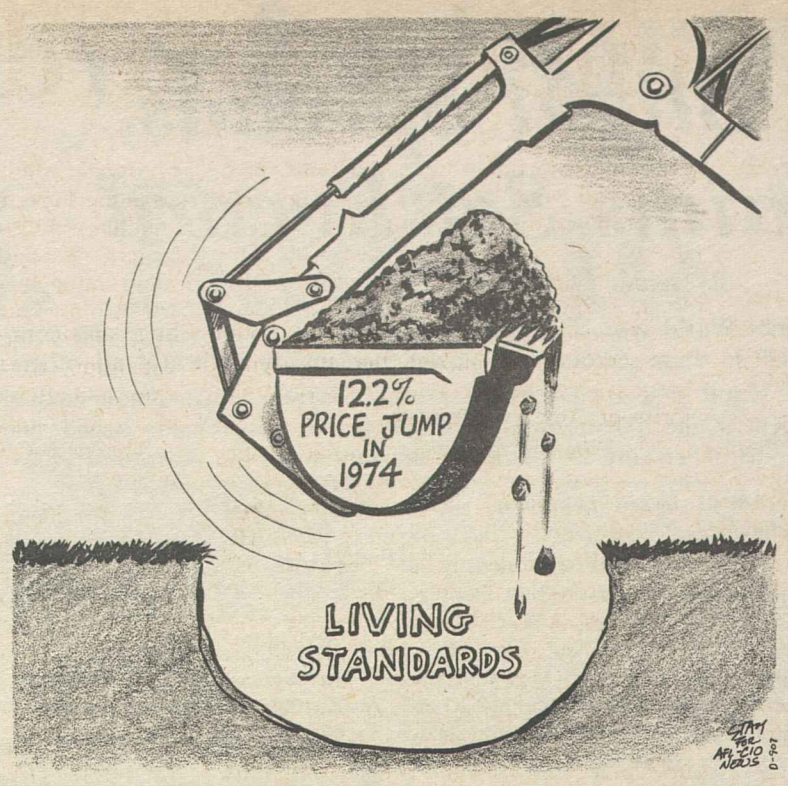
TWUA President Sol Stetin said the current exposure level permitted by the federal government is inadequate in safeguarding workers against byssinosis.

A TWUA petition filed with the Labor Dept. urges immediate action to reduce the health hazard for 800,000 textile workers across the country.

The union has asked the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to set a standard lowering the permissible exposure level in workplaces to cotton dust to 0.1 milligram per cubic meter of air during an eight-hour period—one-tenth of the level currently permitted.

TWUA has estimated that up to 100,000 active and retired textile workers are suffering from brown lung disease. These victims are afflicted with shortness of breath, tightness of the chest and coughing.

A revised criteria document issued recently by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health recommends that concentrations of the cotton dust be reduced "to the lowest feasible level, but in no case as high as 0.2 milligrams" and further supports the TWUA's petition for the reduction from current levels.



Meany Hits 'Recession' In Human Rights Cause

New York—The cause of human rights is in "a world-wide recession," AFL-CIO President George Meany asserted in a speech to the Jewish Labor Committee's annual award dinner here.

In the United Nations, Meany said, only four nations opposed recognition of "the organized murderers known as the Palestine Liberation Organization."

Human rights "are a mockery in the Soviet Union," he said, "threatened with extinction in the Middle East" and "trampled on by scores of petty dictatorships on several continents."

Meany was the principal speaker at the JLC dinner honoring Clothing Workers President Murray H. Finley with the organization's human rights award. He praised Finley as representative of "a new and up-and-coming generation of labor leaders who combine old-fashioned labor idealism and toughness with the new skills and knowledge that the modern labor movement demands."

To say that the "recession" in human rights came about because people around the world no longer care about human rights, Meany said, is as invalid as to say "that unemployment is rising because people don't want to work any more."

Meany declared that "the cause of human rights in this world is dependent on the strength — the economic strength, the military strength, the moral strength — of the United States."

He expressed a "sense of "bafflement" at some of labor's "liberal friends" who pursue "detente at any price" and who consider free trade as "the road to peace."

The AFL-CIO's foreign policy positions have been consistent, Meany stressed, in supporting democracy and social justice throughout the world.

In the case of beleaguered South Vietnam, he told the gathering, America's choice now is whether to provide the "ammunition" the Vietnamese seek "or make the conscious decision to let the freedom of South Vietnam be permanently destroyed."

Other speakers in the tribute to Finley included New York's Gov. Hugh Carey, who made an unscheduled appearance at the dinner, and Bayard Rustin, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute. Clothing Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman welcomed the guests in his role as president of the JLC, and Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was dinner chairman.

Finley, in his response, said the continued existence of "a free and responsible labor movement" in the United States is an assurance that the voice of truth "will never be stilled."

Sir Archibald Gordon, Ex-Labor Attache, Dies

London—Sir Archibald Gordon, who served as labor attache and first secretary at the British embassy in Washington from 1943 to 1954, died here before the end of the year. He was 82.

Sir Archibald, who had been in the British civil service since 1912, was widely known as an arbitrator and conciliator. He also had been president of the United Nations League of Lawyers.

'Mop-up' Talks Produce New Oil Contracts

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers signed new national agreements with five more major oil producers, two intermediate-size companies and several smaller firms, as the union proceeded to wind up its current round of negotiations with the industry.

"We're entering the mop-up stage in this bargaining program," OCAW President A. F. Grospiron said. "The companies that still have not settled are attempting to chisel the union on minor details."

About 33,000 of the union's 60,000 members in the industry now are covered by new contracts, he said.

OCAW's national oil bargaining policy committee here approved new two-year agreements with Cities Service, Mobil, British Petroleum, Ashland and Tenneco, all major firms, and with Champlin and Getty, intermediate-size companies.

The pacts generally follow the pattern established in the union's Jan. 10 agreement with Gulf, the first of the major producers to settle. The Gulf settlement increases basic wages by 26.8 percent over the life of the contract. It also provides cost-of-living protection, improved medical and pension benefits, a 10th paid holiday and other fringe benefit improvements.

Meanwhile, the union pressed its demands with strikes against Union Oil, Husky, Phillips Petroleum and Continental Oil—walkouts involving about 3,000 workers.

Strikes against Skelly, Standard Oil of Ohio and Marathon were delayed because talks with the firms were progressing to the union's satisfaction.

The OCAW's 430 local contracts with the industry expired at midnight, Jan. 7. Negotiations are conducted on a plant-by-plant basis with agreements approved by the union's policy bargaining committee before being submitted to the membership for ratification.

A Program 'to Put America Back to Work'

viously, financially hard-pressed states and cities cannot bear the aditional burden.

5—Reject the Administration's efforts to increase the cost of food stamps to the unemployed and the poor. In addition, we urge the following immediate improvements in the food stamp program:

a. Reduction of the present 30-day certification period to 15 days.

b. Adequate staffs of trained workers should be provided to handle certifications.

The AFL-CIO further believes that unions have a special responsibility to help meet the immediate needs of their unemployed members. Therefore, we urge:

1—Local central labor bodies to enlist, through their community service programs, the participation of all government, voluntary and private agencies to expedite the handling of applications, complaints and special needs of the unemployed.

2—Local central labor bodies to work with the Human Resources Development Institute to develop jobs and provide adequate counseling and referral for unemployed union members.

3—State federations to expand their efforts to inform newly-covered unemployed workers of the availability of unemployment insurance benefits and to prod state Employment Security Offices to provide better service for all unemployed.

4—Local central labor bodies to arrange to use union halls as emergency centers for processing unemployment compensation claims in order to reduce the long lines outside overloaded employment service offices.

Further, we take note of the President's proposal to place a 5 percent ceiling on mandated cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security, Railroad Retirement and civil service and military retirement benefits, and a similar 5 percent ceiling on pay increases for federal employes required under the Federal Pay Comparability Act.

This is unfair and inequitable. On the one hand the President proposes higher prices for just about everything people must buy and, on the other, attempts to deny retirees and federal employes that to which they are legally entitled.

Therefore, the AFL-CIO will vigorously oppose the President's proposed ceiling in the Congress.

Conclusion

This is the AFL-CIO program for action. We present it to the President and to the Congress. And we call for immediate action on each and all of its points.

We pledge to our members, our fellow workers and our fellow citizens that we will not relent in our support of this program to put America back to work.

Industrial Output Plunges:

Economic Blight Spreads, Jobless Claims Set Record

By James M. Shevis

The most precipitous recession since World War II picked up speed as the nation's huge and complex economy ground to a virtual halt in some sectors, and slowed perceptibly in nearly all others.

Starting with a Commerce Dept. report that gross national product, in real terms, plummeted at an annual adjusted rate of 9.1 percent in the fourth quarter of 1974, the government issued one dismal set of statistics after another to underscore the gathering momentum of the downturn:

● A record 970,200 Americans filed new claims for unemployment insurance benefits in the week ended Jan. 11, the highest number of initial claims since the jobless benefits program got under way in 1937, the Labor Dept. announced.

● The nation's industrial output plunged 2.8 percent in December, following a 2.5 percent slide in November, the Federal Reserve Board reported. The December drop showed industrial production 6.5 percent below the year-earlier level.

● The Fed also noted in another report that manufacturers' use of their productive capacity declined to 75.9 percent in the last three months of 1974, the lowest rate since the first quarter of 1972 when capacity use was 75.6 percent.

● The number of new houses started in December dropped to an adjusted annual rate of 868,000, down 12 percent from the previous month and the lowest rate for any month since October 1966. For all of 1974, the number of starts fell 35 percent below the 1973 level, the Commerce Dept. said.

The decline in "real" GNP over the October-December period was the steepest since the first quarter of 1958 when the drop was nearly the same, 9.2 percent. It marked the fourth straight quarter of decline.

Real GNP is the value of the country's total output of goods and services, after adjustment for the effects of inflation.

From the last three-month period of 1973 to the fourth quarter of 1974, real output dropped 5 percent—the sharpest year-to-year decline recorded for any quarter since 1947 when the government began compiling such statistics.

The current recession already is the longest since the Great Depression of the Thirties, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger noted. The downturn began in the fall of 1973, and slid steeply when the Arab oil-producing countries imposed their embargo on the United States.

The 9.1 percent decline in real GNP in fourth-quarter 1974 followed downturns of 1.9 percent in the third quarter, 1.6 percent in the spring quarter and 7 percent in the opening three months of the year. For all of 1974, the drop in real output was 2.2 percent from the previous year.

Reflecting the mounting number of layoffs, particularly since last November, a record 4,627,200 persons were receiving unemployment benefits in the week ended Jan. 4, the Labor Dept. reported. The number of workers covered by jobless insurance who were unemployed reached 7.1 percent. The previous high was 5.2 percent in December, which tied a record set in January 1961.

The largest increase in unemployment insurance benefits payments was in North Carolina which reported heavy layoffs in the textiles, clothing and furniture industries. Other states posting higher volumes of payments were Pennsylvania, New York, California, Tennessee, Connecticut and Michigan.

The large number of new applicants for jobless benefits is expected to swell the January unemployment rate for the nation as a whole. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which is scheduled to announce the new rate on Feb. 7, normally conducts its joblessness survey during the first workweek of each month.

In its report on the December drop in industrial production, the Federal Reserve Board described the latest declines in production as "large and widespread among products and industrial materials."

On the continuing decline in residential construction, Michael Sumichrast, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders, observed that the "bottom hasn't been reached." He said the housing starts rate "very likely is going to hit an all-time low" in the next 30-60 days.

The housing industry, the first to suffer from the current recession, received some cheering news as the Housing & Urban Development Dept. announced a drop from 9 to 8.5 percent in the maximum interest rate on government-backed home loans.

The cutback stemmed partly from recent declines in major banks' prime lending rates. The rate now stands at 10 percent for most lending institutions and at 9.75 percent among a handful.

The prime is the rate banks charge their most creditworthy corporate customers.

Meanwhile, the Conference Board reported consumer confidence in the state of the economy fell to an all-time low in its most recent survey. The board's consumer confidence index dropped to 39.9 percent of its 1969-70 average in the last two months of 1974—9 points below the September-October level and 22 points below the November-December 1973 level.

The index has dropped steadily since last spring. The board's buying plans index in the closing two months of 1974 hit a low of 76.8 percent, 17 points below the year-earlier level.

Social Security Panel Asks Payroll Tax Shift

The Social Security Advisory Council edged a step closer to the AFL-CIO's contention that a government contribution should be added to the payroll tax on workers and employers that now finances the program.

It voted tentative approval of a plan that would shift the portion of the payroll tax that is now earmarked for Medicare into the basic social security program. This multi-billion dollar addition would avoid the need for a sudden sharp rise in the taxable wage base or in the social security tax.

Under the proposal endorsed by a 9-4 vote of the advisory council, the federal government would then replenish the Medicare fund from general Treasury revenues.

Thus, if the plan were adopted, the social security program would continue to be funded exclusively by workers and employers but most of the money needed to operate the Medicare program of health care for the elderly would come from general tax revenues.

Additional changes may be made in the advisory council's recommendations before they are sent to the President and Congress. But a draft covering the items of tentative agreements included these statements:

● "The earnings-related OASDI program should be preserved as the nation's primary means of providing economic security in the event of retirement, death or disability. Future changes . . . should conform to the fundamental principles of the program: universal compulsory coverage, earnings-related benefits paid without a test of need, and contributions toward the cost of the program from covered workers and employers."

● Benefits for persons added to the retirement rolls in the future should be more closely tied to earnings levels, with cost-of-living increases limited to the post-retirement period.

● Persons receiving social security benefits who have annual earnings of over $2,520 a year now lose $1 of benefits for each $2 in wages above that amount until the age of 72, when there is no earnings restriction. The council proposed a less rapid loss of benefits after the earnings cutoff is reached. It recommended that $1 of benefits should be withheld for every $3 of earnings between the exempt amount and twice the exempt amount, and $1 for $2 above that level.

● Sex differences should be ended, but dependent benefits should be reduced if a dependent is receiving a pension for work that had not been covered by social security.

The document noted that not all of the council members agreed with all recommendations and that differing views might be filed when the report is completed.

First Quarter NLRB Cases Jump by 10.3%

The National Labor Relations Board reported it processed 11,600 cases of all types during the first three months of its 1975 fiscal year, which began last July. The total was 10.3 percent above the year-earlier period.

The case intake of 11,600 was also the largest number for any July-September period, the NLRB noted in a statistical summary. The number of unfair labor practice charges filed during the three-month period was 12.9 percent higher than the like period a year earlier, and the number of representation petitions was up 6.6 percent.

The overall 10.3 percent rate of increase was substantially greater than for all of fiscal 1974 when the 42,373 cases filed with the board—a record number in itself—were just 3.2 percent more than in the preceding fiscal year.

The NLRB received 7,636 charges during the quarter alleging that employers, unions or both had violated provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 875 more than were filed a year earlier.

In addition, there were 3,964 petitions for employe representation elections, union-shop deauthorization polls, amendment of union-representation certifications and clarifications of employe bargaining units, an increase of 210 over the same quarter of fiscal year 1974.

Building Trades, Navajo Nation Reach Pioneer Job Training Pact

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Navajo Nation jointly announced the signing of an unprecedented agreement under which Navajo workers will train as apprentices in a number of building and construction trades.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine said the agreement provides an organized method of training Navajos to become qualified building trades craftsmen.

"For the building and construction trades, it is a first venture," Georgine observed. "Never before have we had an overall training program for the development of skills which simultaneously involved all of our affiliates. We consider it a most significant development."

Navajo Tribal Council Chairman Peter MacDonald also praised the pact as a "giant step forward for Navajo workers."

"Our people now have an opportunity," MacDonald said, "to become skilled craftsmen and to bring their wages up to the level long enjoyed by union workers."

In addition to the training and work opportunities, another main purpose of the agreement is to insure that all construction work within the vast Navajo Reservation — in the states of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Colorado — shall proceed efficiently, economically and without interruption.

Meanwhile, a Navajo Construction Industry Manpower Program is being organized to increase the rate at which Navajo Indians have been securing suitable employment opportunities in the construction industry, especially within or near the Navajo Reservation.

NCIMP grew out of the joint efforts of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., a committee of international representatives appointed by the presidents of building trades international unions, the Four Corner States building trades organization (New Mexico, Arizona, Utah and Colorado), the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, and the Office of Navajo Labor Relations.

The principal objective of NCIMP will be to produce construction industry journeymen by bringing Navajos into the construction industry via the apprenticeship route and, for those beyond apprenticeship age but in possession of some of the occupational skills, through journeyman training programs.

NCIMP also will develop and coordinate technical assistance activities aimed at improving the ability of Navajo contractors to compete successfully and achieve a greater share of the construction activities.

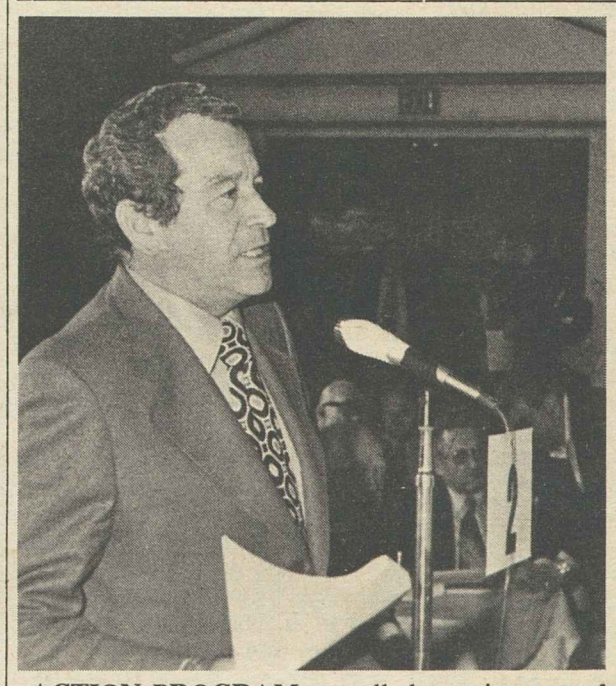
Labor Presses Tax Slash To Revive Buying Power



ACTION PROGRAM to pull the nation out of recession was strongly supported in floor discussion at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting. Among the participants were Sol. C. Chaikin, left secretary-treasurer of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and President Clyde M. Webber of the Government Employees. (Story, Page 3)

Economy Continues Sharp Skid

The nation's economic outlook grew steadily bleaker as the Commerce Dept. reported its index of leading indicators dropped in December for the fifth straight month.

The index, a barometer of the state of the economy which the government uses to forecast trends, fell 2.4 percent over the month. The cumulative decline of 11 percent since last summer was the steepest slide in the index's history.

At the same time, the Commerce Dept. revised its original estimate of the November drop in the index from 1.5 percent to 3.5 percent, the largest one-month drop on record.

Of the nine economic indicators in the index, six pointed toward deepening recession. They included new claims for unemployment insurance benefits, new orders for durable goods, stock prices, consumer installment debt, the average workweek and the price of industrial materials.

Grim news also flowed from the Labor Dept. in the form of the government's weekly report on the number of workers drawing or filing for the first time for unemployment insurance benefits.

For the latest reporting period, the week ended Jan. 18, another 851,700 initial claims for benefits were filed at employment security offices across the country. A total of 4,561,300 persons were actually receiving benefits for the week ended Jan. 11.

Meanwhile, other sectors of the economy revealed drastic cutbacks in machine tool orders in December, a severe drop in the volume of newspaper help-wanted advertising and a steady stream of reductions in work forces and production schedules.

New orders for durable goods were off 11.1 percent in December, the steepest decline in more than 20 years, the Commerce Dept. reported. And the Labor Dept. issued a report showing productivity in the private economy fell at the annual rate of 10.1 percent during the last three months of 1974. For calendar year 1974, the government said, the output of goods and services declined 2.7 percent, the first year-to-year drop on record.

Among the new layoffs were a 2,000-worker reduction at Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Co., Virginia's largest private employer, and a cutback of 3,000 employes at Seatrain Shipbuilding Corp. of New York.

Other big layoffs were ordered

Backs Bid To Block Oil Tariff

The AFL-CIO pressed Congress for an immediate tax cut of at least $20 billion to halt the nation's slide into economic disaster.

Most of the tax reduction should go to the low-income and middle-income households "whose need for increased purchasing power is greatest," AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger told the House Ways & Means Committee.

Goldfinger submitted to the panel the emergency economic program adopted by the AFL-CIO General Board the previous week. It includes the tax cut package that had been unanimously recommended by the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee — and largely ignored by President Ford.

Unless purchasing power can be increased, Goldfinger warned, "there is no end in sight" to mounting unemployment and production cutbacks.

He said the AFL-CIO "fully supports" the attempt by the Ways & Means Committee to block the President's power to impose a $3 per barrel tariff on imported oil. He termed such a tariff "nothing more than another unfair excise tax" that would be passed on to consumers through higher prices that would swallow up the added purchasing power generated by a tax cut. It would also cause extensive hardship in the northeastern states, he warned.

Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.) and the enlarged Democratic majority of the tax-writing Ways & Means Committee appeared moving towards a two-phase tax cut that would include a limited rebate on 1974 taxes with a reduction in

Despite Gains:

1974 Pay Increases Trail Cost of Living

Union negotiators achieved first-year wage increases averaging 9.8 percent in major collective bargaining agreements in 1974—substantially more than the 1973 and 1972 averages but still well below the pace needed to keep even with soaring living costs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Consumer prices last year climbed 12.2 percent over the year before, the highest over-the-year rise since 1946.

First-year wage boosts under contracts covering 1,000 workers or more averaged 5.8 percent in 1973 and 7.3 percent in 1972. The 9.8 percent rate last year was lower than the average first-year increases negotiated in both 1970 and 1971, before the government imposed economic controls.

In 1970 and 1971, first-year increases averaged 11.6 percent for each year.

A BLS survey of major bargaining settlements reached during 1974 showed that increases averaged 7.3 percent annually when measured over the life of the contract, compared with a 5.1 percent average in 1973 settlements.

The BLS survey covered 1,171 contracts affecting nearly 5 million workers in the private sector of the economy, primarily in the steel, communications, construction, retail trade, apparel and bituminous coal mining industries.

In key contracts—those covering 5,000 workers or more—the first-year increase in wages and benefits combined averaged 10.7 percent in 1974, up from 7.1 percent in 1973. Measured over the life of the contracts, the wage benefits packages under such agreements averaged 7.7 percent a year compared with 6.1 percent in 1973.

The report also showed that major contracts negotiated in 1974 had an average duration of 30.2 months. Overall, BLS noted, the size of wage-rate settlements tended to decline as contract duration grew.

About 60 percent of the agreements concluded last year contained cost-of-living escalator clauses

4 Rail Unions Reach Accord On New Pact

Four unions representing more than half of the nation's 500,000 railroad workers have reached tentative agreement on new contracts with the carriers increasing wages and other benefits by 41.6 percent over a three-year period.

Two of the unions—the Signalmen and Maintenance of Way Employees — approved the settlement at meetings of their general chairmen.

President Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union said the agreement is being mailed to local chairmen for approval at membership meetings. The fourth union, the Sheet Metal Workers, is putting the terms directly to its members through a mail referendum.

Health Security Case Brought Before AMA

Chicago—Labor took its case for National Health Security to the American Medical Association, stressing that access to quality care by all citizens must be the "fundamental test" of any national health insurance proposal.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said in a statement presented to the AMA's National Leadership Conference here that labor and the AMA are generally agreed on what the nation's health care needs are, but disagree on the approach required to meet those goals.

Seidman noted that while America "has no peer" when it comes to the scientific and clinical aspects of medical practice, not all of its citizens can afford to get the quality care.

A key element of Health Security would be fully prepaid comprehensive health care coverage for all without deductibles or co-insurance, he pointed out.

The Medicredit proposal supported by the AMA is tied to the deductible and co-insurance approach, Seidman observed, while the Health Security plan would be financed through payroll taxes on employers, employes and other individuals, matched by general revenue funds.

Rights Coalition Spurs Drive for Jobs, Justice

The Civil Rights Leadership Conference will mobilize its coalition of black, labor, church and liberal organizations to fight the unemployment and inflation that hit hardest "those least able to bear it—the poor and minorities."

Chairman Roy Wilkins warned the Leadership Conference's annual board meeting that "civil rights and social peace do not thrive in an atmosphere of economic scarcity and injustice." As the poor of all races and ethnic groups compete for a "diminishing number of decent jobs and dwellings," Wilkins said, "tension grows and the danger of intergroup conflict and social disruption mounts."

Wilkins, who is also executive director of the NAACP, acknowledged differences within the civil rights coalition.

"The NAACP and AFL-CIO do not always see eye-to-eye. Differences arise between black and Jewish groups and between blacks and the Spanish-speaking."

But, he stressed, there is "far compared with about 40 percent in 1973. They provided for average annual wage gains of 6.1 percent, exclusive of any potential cost-of-living increases, compared with 4.9 percent in 1973.

Contracts without cost-of-living escalators provided for annual wage adjustments averaging 9.1 percent, compared with 5.3 percent in 1973.

The acceleration in wage increases negotiated in 1974 was more pronounced in non-manufacturing than in manufacturing. In non-manufacturing, first-year increases for some 3.2 million workers averaged 10.4 percent; the life-of-the-contract increase was 7.9 percent a year.

In the manufacturing sector, first-year increases for about 1.8 million workers averaged 8.7 percent while over the life of the contract raises averaged 6.1 percent a year.

For the 1.1 million construction workers covered under major agreements last year, first-year increases averaged 11 percent compared with 5 percent in 1973. On a life-of-contract basis, construction settlements provided 9.5 percent average increases per year, compared with 5.1 percent in 1973.

During 1974, escalator clauses were introduced in 164 settlements covering 869,000 workers, BLS noted. This was the largest expansion of such coverage since 1971, when unions in the steel and communications industries adopted COL clauses.

BLS said the 1974 pickup in escalator coverage occurred in a wide variety of industries, including construction, bituminous coal, and apparel where such provisions were previously uncommon. COL escalator clauses now cover about 5.3 million, or 51 percent, of all workers in major bargaining units, BLS said.

Wurf Urges Special Aid to States, Cities

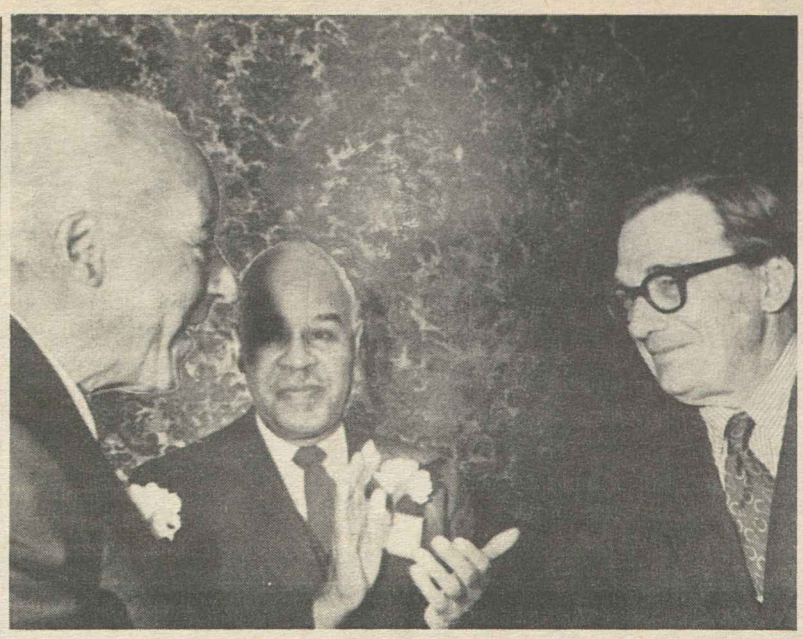
The State, County & Municipal Employees warned that a $5 to $6 billion "emergency transfusion" of federal funds to the states and cities is needed to avert the "worst wave of layoffs since the great depression."

AFSCME President Jerry Wurf at a news conference in Washington called upon public officials and Congress to rally behind the cities and states with special financial assistance and full funding for existing federal aid programs.

He said "a special grant of between $5 and $6 billion specifically aimed at maintaining the level of service envisioned at the time that state and local government budgets for the current fiscal year were being formulated" would reverse a wave of public employment layoffs that threaten to debilitate government services.

Attributing the municipal finance crisis to decreasing tax revenues and increasing operating costs. Wurf specifically cited cutbacks under way in New York City, Baltimore and Atlanta.

He said slashes in city services "become the problem of a mentally retarded child with inadequate training facilities, of an elderly widow on an unsafe street, of poor, congested neighborhoods with twice-a-month garbage collection."



LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE on Civil Rights honored one of its founders, A. Philip Randolph, at its annual board meeting. Randolph, for half a century a leader in both the trade union and civil rights movements, is congratulated by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. Leading the applause is Roy Wilkins, chairman of the conference and executive director of the NAACP.

He noted that 40 national organizations—representing labor, farmers and consumers—are convinced that only Health Security meets the precepts of a comprehensive national health insurance program.

"Consumers want comprehensive health care benefits without deductibles and co-insurance," Seidman said. "They want fully prepaid medical care. They want to pay for their medical care when they are well and working, not when they are sick and off the job."

In a panel discussion before the AMA conference, he stressed that Health Security would be administered and financed on "tried and tested" principles of social insurance that have proved successful in other countries.

He also refuted a number of misleading statements that have been used by opponents of the Health Security approach. Health Security would not establish socialized medicine, he stressed, nor would it make doctors government employes. It would not abolish fee-for-service practice, nor force doctors into groups. It would not establish government control over the practice of medicine, nor adversely affect the doctor-patient relationship.

Neither would Health Security cost the American people more than any of the alternate national health insurance proposals, Seidman stressed.

The cost of health care adds up to the same total whether it's paid through taxes, insurance premiums or out-of-pocket fees, he noted. And the same initial total would be reached under any national health insurance program, or even if none is enacted.

If Health Security were launched in fiscal year 1976, Seidman said the initial total cost would be about $76 billion. While the additional federal funds needed would be $28 billion—over and above present expenditures—nearly $6 billion of that would represent relief to states and localities because medical services for the poor would be shifted to Health Security.

The major difference between Health Security and other proposals is that the alternative plans rely on insurance companies to administer the programs and to collect premiums from employers and workers, he said.

Proponents of the alternative measures would have consumers believe that mandatory premium payments are less painful than mandatory taxes, Seidman observed. "Frankly," he said, "we do not see the difference."

The AFL-CIO is strongly supporting National Health Security because it is convinced that national funding, national budgeting, careful planning to eliminate waste, and quality incentives are needed if all Americans are to receive health care, he said.

Times Reporter Wins Guild's Broun Award

Selwyn Raab, a reporter for the New York Times, received the Newspaper Guild's 1974 Heywood Broun Award for an article revealing new evidence calling into question the convictions in 1967 of former top-ranking boxer Rubin "Hurricane" Carter and John Artis for a triple murder in Paterson, N.J.

The 34th annual award, which includes a citation and a $1,000 prize, was presented at a luncheon with the Guild executive board. The award memorializes the newspaper columnist who was the Guild's first president.

The judges said Raab's entry was selected from a record 110 entries on the basis of three major criteria: (1) the effort to right a wrong; (2) the human qualities of the story, and (3) the reporter's initiative.

Raab's investigative reporting, spanning more than a year, resulted in reopening of the judicial process in the case and, the judges said, "reflected Broun's deep concern for justice and the underdog."

Honorable mentions were awarded to Linda Pavlik of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, Michael Graham and Jim Neubacher of the Detroit Free Press, and Mark Etheridge III and Michael Schwartz of the Charlotte Observer.

Judges were Richard Valeriani, diplomatic correspondent for NBC News; Frances L. Lewine, White House correspondent for the Associated Press, and Raymond G. Dick, assistant managing editor of the Washington Star-News.

Economic Justice:

more agreement than division" and unity in a commitment to "the goal of a free, plural, democratic society that accords equal opportunity, equal justice and equal treatment to all its citizens."

Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, warned that the economic collapse has "already wiped out many of the scant economic gains blacks have made" and expressed concern that it might put "new strains on the civil rights movement itself, as black people and minorities struggle for economic opportunities."

Jordan stressed that "the fundamental interests of blacks and whites are the same. Both need basic social and economic reforms. Both need jobs, wages and housing. Both need that open, integrated society without which other reforms will have little effect."

He called for unity behind a program of full employment, a family income floor, decent housing for all and a quality national health insurance system.

The link between labor and the civil rights movement was spotlighted in the presentation of the Leadership Conference's annual award to A. Philip Randolph, who devoted his life to both causes.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland spoke for the Leadership Conference in the tribute to Randolph, one of those who helped establish the conference 26 years ago. Kirkland noted that Randolph, longtime AFL-CIO vice president, had "a closetful of plaques" and presented him with a book inscribed by the conference officers to a man "who personifies our coalition's principles of liberty, equality and human dignity for all people. His life of struggle for these goals is our example."

Randolph, noting that he will be 86 in April, spoke of the unity of the "two great forces" for social change, the labor movement and the civil rights movement.

Standing tall and dignified at the podium, he was greeted by wave after wave of applause at the luncheon presentation.

The conference heard reports from task forces in a number of fields and put particular emphasis on an anticipated legislative battle this year for extension of the Voting Rights Act, whose passage in 1965 broke down racial barriers to voter registration in the South.

The law will expire June 30 unless Congress acts. A panel chaired by Clarence Mitchell, the LCCR's legislative director, stressed the continued need for the law.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger was one of the panelists in an afternoon program chaired by Bayard Rustin, who heads the Leadership Conference's executive committee.

Goldfinger said the progress made during the 1960s in narrowing the economic gap between blacks and whites has been set back by the economic crisis that has fallen disproportionately on blacks.

A delegation from the conference presented the coalition's program to President Ford at a 45-minute meeting in the White House.

Air Controllers Draft Safety Guideline Policy

Chicago—The Air Traffic Controllers drafted a two-phase program for improving safety standards for the nation's air traffic system at a special meeting of 300 PATCO representatives.

The PATCO program encompasses both short- and long-range efforts to reduce airline accidents. The 15,000-member organization is an affiliate of the Marine Engineers.

A resolution adopted unanimously reaffirmed the need of PATCO members to maintain "the highest professional standards in their work by adhering to all regulations and procedures established by the Federation Aviation Administration."

PATCO said the decision to adhere closely to FAA rules comes in the wake of recent accidents followed by the agency's efforts to impose "an arbitrary and capricious program of severe disciplinary action for controllers who are involved in system errors, no matter what the facts may be."

In an effort to meet long-range accident prevention efforts, PATCO President John Leyden said the union has created a safety committee to develop guidelines for controllers. He said the guidelines may go well beyond the current standards set by the FAA.

Leyden said that the recent FAA action affecting PATCO members and the agency's rejection of the union's suggestions for the use of improved technology to upgrade air safety has adversely affected the morale of the controllers.

Leyden also expressed concern over news reports that three aviation industry officials are being considered to succeed FAA Administrator Alexander Butterfield, raising further fears that the government agency created to regulate the airlines is becoming a captive of the industry.

Additional stress between FAA and PATCO stems from the failure to reach a collective bargaining agreement with the agency after 11 months of negotiations, Leyden said.

Representatives at the one-day meeting extended full authority to Leyden and PATCO Executive Vice Pres. Robert Poli to continue negotiations in the effort to "achieve a satisfactory agreement."

Dystrophy Group Re-Elects Unionists

Los Angeles—Seven trade union officials, including AFL-CIO President George Meany, were re-elected corporate members of the Muscular Dystrophy Association at its annual meeting here.

The others are union presidents Hal C. Davis of the Musicians, James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks, W. Howard McClennan of the Fire Fighters, Frederick O'Neal of the Actors & Artistes and James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers, and Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to Meany.

Donahue, O'Neal and McClennan also were re-elected to the MDA board of directors.

At General Board Meeeting:

Union Leaders Spur Action On Labor's Jobs Program

The AFL-CIO action program to halt further economic deterioration and get America back to work was strongly backed by leaders of federation affiliates who called for its immediate implementation.

As Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland presented the program at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting, its major elements were spelled out in detail by a series of speakers.

"This is no time for pussyfooting by either the Executive or Legislative Branch of government or by the two major political parties," President Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipefitters declared.

"When the unemployment lines are as long as they are today, the federal government has a clear responsibility to put forth an immediate and massive effort to create jobs."

Ward said the jobs program outlined in the plan adopted by the General Board contains elements that "have been used successfully in the past to stimulate a stagnating economy." And, he stressed, "never have they been more desperately needed than today."

Analyses of other parts of the program were presented by Iron Workers President John H. Lyons, who looked at the board's emergency tax package; Seafarers President Paul Hall on the energy recommendations; Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers on the need to lower interest rates; Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito on steps to protect American jobs from unfair foreign competition, and President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees on aid to the jobless.

Speaking on the special problems of federal workers, Government Employees President Clyde M. Webber noted the federation's action program opposes the Administration's plan to put a 5 percent ceiling on wage increases for federal employes and military personnel this year. He expressed appreciation for the support the AFL-CIO "will be giving us in this battle as we go down the line."

Repeatedly, the union leaders castigated the Ford Administration for its delaying tactics in combating the deepening recession. The President now has the power to create jobs for the unemployed and the authority to act against high interest rates, but his economic counselors have given him poor advice, they charged.

"What can the President do?" Ward asked. "The most important thing is to admit to himself that the economic program he has put forth will not solve the recession and will not impede inflation," he said.

"On the one hand, it purports to put more dollars into consumers' hands, and on the other it takes these dollars away.

"It would produce additional social and economic inequities, but it will not produce a net increase in either consumer spending or jobs," Ward stressed.

He called upon Ford to release immediately a substantial portion of the $19 billion he is impounding —funds already appropriated by Congress—and funnel it toward construction programs that would create jobs.

Hall charged Ford's energy proposals, including his plan to impose a $3 per barrel tax on imported oil, constitute "the biggest rip-off in the history of this country."

He said that if it is put through, "this $3 a barrel (tax) is going to translate itself right off the bat to a $50 billion per year rip-off. And it's going to come right down to you, the working people and the ordinary people of this country."

He said the AFL-CIO energy proposals—which include import quotas, "a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing," blockage of the President's proposed tariff on foreign oil and a genuine excess profits tax—would result in significant cutbacks in the price of oil.

Lyons observed that the $20 billion tax cut recommended to stimulate the economy would place increased purchasing power in the hands of those who most need it.

"It is truly aimed at the average worker, not at the top 15 percent of the work force who would be the recipients of approximately 85 percent of the tax rebates proposed by the Administration," Lyons said.

Seventy-five percent of the nation's taxpayers earn less than $15,000 a year, he noted, "and it is this huge majority that would receive the benefits of this program. It is this huge majority that would rapidly transfer these tax reductions into purchases that would put people back to work."

Under the AFL-CIO plan, individual income taxes would be cut a total of $15 billion, with a $375 maximum cut per return. Corporate taxes would be reduced $5 billion by raising the investment tax credit from 7 to 12 percent generally and from 4 to 12 percent for utilities.

Keenan, addressing the crisis brought on by the Federal Reserve Board's tight money policy, pointed out that most families cannot afford to buy homes at today's record-high mortgage interest rates. He called on Congress to adopt the federation's proposals for lower interest rates.

"Congress should amend the Emergency Home Purchase Assistance Act of 1974," he said, "to provide that for mortgages with an original principal amount of $35,000 or less, the maximum mortgage interest rate is to be 2 percentage points below the maximum interest rate prescribed in accordance with a formula in that act. This would mean about a 6 percent rate."

Keenan also called for a fairer method of credit allocation, urging Congress to enact legislation "to create the machinery for selective regulation of capital and credit fund extensions when the demands for funds exceed the supply."

Wurf observed that the federation's recommendations for assisting the nation's unemployed workers "is an indictment of this rich society." The board's program is both "comprehensive" and "realistic," he said.

Bommarito warned that the Ford Administration is again preparing to "blitz" Congress in an attempt to subsidize multinational companies and get most-favored-nation status for the Soviet Union, moves that would cost the United States both jobs and revenue.

The AFL-CIO economic program would prevent the export of American jobs to foreign countries, he said, and, it also would remove those tax advantages that encourage U.S. corporations to move their operations overseas.

4 Rail Unions Reach Agreement on Contract

have broken off negotiations with the National Railway Labor Conference, the carriers' bargaining arm, and have asked the National Mediation Board to enter the talks.

Mediation also got under way betwene the carriers and four shopcraft unions—the Carmen, Firemen & Oilers, Boilermakers-Blacksmiths and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—following a one-day strike against three railroads.

The unions were free to take "self-help" action under the Railway Labor Act after 10 days had elapsed from the breakdown of talks. The struck lines, the Chesapeake & Ohio, Burlington Northern and Louisville & Nashville, petitioned the Mediation Board to enter the dispute.

President Harold C. Crotty of the Waymen described the new agreement as "the largest contract gain in the brotherhood's history."

Announcing terms of the settlement, Crotty said the 41.6 percent total contract gain breaks down as follows: wages and cost-of-living adjustments, 37.5 percent; added health and welfare costs, 2.5 percent; a dental plan, 1.2 percent, and an additional paid holiday, four-tenths of 1 percent.

The agreements between the carriers and the other three unions generally parallel the terms announced by the Maintenance of Way Employees.

Under the new pact, BMWE's 100,000 members in the United States will receive wage boosts of 10 percent retroactive to Jan. 1 when the old agreement expired; 5 percent effective Oct. 1; 3 percent on Apr. 1, 1976, and a final 4 percent on July 1, 1977.

A cost-of-living escalator clause is included in the agreement with provision for a periodic "roll in" of accumulated COL increases.

The COL clause, effective Jan. 1, 1976, will add at six-month intervals 1 cent in wages for each rise of four-tenths of a point in the consumer price index for the first three adjustments. The final adjustment will be made at the rate of 1 cent for each rise of three-tenths of a point. There is a maximum allowance of 68 cents an hour in COL increases over the life of the contract.

The dental plan is a first for the union. Addition of the day before Christmas as a paid holiday becomes effective in 1976, and will give BMWE members a total of 10 paid holidays.

Crotty noted the initial 10 percent wage boost "will put substantial buying power in our members' hands right now when it is vitally needed both to help them catch up with high prices and to stimulate our bogged-down economy."

Other rail unions now in various stages of negotiations with the industry are the Railway Supervisors, Train Dispatchers, Locomotive Engineers, Transport Workers, and the Yardmasters.

The Sheet Metal Workers, in addition to its tentative agreement on the new three-year wage-benefits package, also reached a settlement of its work-rules dispute with the carriers that dates back to February 1973.

Index Shows Economy in Steep Slide

by Armstrong Rubber Co. in West Haven, Conn.; General Electric at Schenectady, N.Y.; Cummins Engine Co., Columbus, Ind., and Dayco Corp., Dayton, Ohio.

The December drop in machine tool orders—1.5 percent from the November level—brought such orders to a level 66 percent below the year-earlier total.

The 8.1 percent decline in the volume of help-wanted ads last month dropped the Conference Board's index of help-wanted newspaper advertising 30.7 percent below a year earlier.

"Since July of 1974, the index has fallen 34 percent," the research organization noted. The unemployment rate has risen to 7.1 percent from a cyclical low of 4.6 percent reached in October of 1973.

"Historical precedent and current analysis combine to suggest that neither the fall in help-wanted advertising nor the rise in unemployment will be arrested before the unemployment rate reaches 8 percent."

Strike Rise Tied To Lag in Wages

Strikes resulted in 2.4 days of idleness out of every 1,000 worked in 1974, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The number of days lost to work stoppages last year compared with 1.4 and 1.5 in 1973 and 1972, respectively. While higher than in either of those two years, last year's level was considerably below that of 1971 and 1970.

Last year's increase was attributed to a backlash from the removal of wage-price controls from the economy on Apr. 30, and to the fact that 1974 was a heavy collective bargaining year.

When controls were lifted, "unions demanded substantial wage increases in an effort to catch up with the accelerated rise in consumer prices," BLS said.

On Blackmail . . .

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES that paid blackmail to the Arab extortionists, that emptied America's grain reserves, that exported other goods in short domestic supply, that tightened the money supply and jacked up interest rates—those are the direct causes of double-digit inflation and recession.

It wasn't wage increases or excessive demand or social security increases or a drop in productivity.

Every American schoolchild could have told the government how to handle the blackmail demands of the Arab oil sheiks. The response should have been: "Not one cent for tribute."

Instead, Henry Kissinger had a new quotation for the history books: "Pay."

And pay we did. And we will continue to pay until the United States deals with the blackmailers in the manner that they deserve.

No tribute, no foreign aid, no trade, no jet fighters—nothing, until the blackmail stops.

If the United States embargoed oil from those countries that cut off supplies to this country, there would be hardship. There would have to be strict allocations and strict rationing.

But allocations and rationing are a small price to pay to avoid total economic collapse and to take America's economic destiny out of the hands of the Arab sheiks.

. . . and Unemployment

I WANT TO TALK about the misery of unemployment. I think some people have forgotten just how miserable it is.

The National Association of Manufacturers is promoting the idea that unemployment is not all that bad.

While the NAM would never be expected to know the depths of despair unemployment causes for a worker and his family, I think that many in Congress may have also forgotten.

If you think your representative or senator needs to be reminded when he next comes home for a visit, take him with you to the unemployment office.

Invite him to stand in the cold with those in the unemployment lines and shiver. And to wait in line for hours to sign up for benefits, only to have to return to stand in line for hours to get the check.

Maybe those Administration advisers who call for balanced budgets should go home with an unemployed worker, and sit at the dinner table with the worker's family while they figure out how to balance their budget.

Maybe an Arthur Burns or an Alan Greenspan can figure out which is more important: medicine or milk. Maybe they can figure out which kid is the sickest, so that he can go to the doctor and get a prescription that will be divided among the other children.

Maybe these same advisers should go with the unemployed worker seeking work. Let them have the door slammed in their face. Let them hear—over and over again—"We're not hiring."

Maybe—just maybe—if the people's representatives in the Congress and the Administration's policymakers see, feel, touch and taste the people's problems, then jobs will be created for Americans.

'Efficiency' Not Only Criterion In White House Organization

By John P. Roche

EVERY YEAR a number of extremely valuable books appear . . . then vanish, go down the well without a splash. My candidate for the lost book of 1974 is Dr. Milton Eisenhower's account of his 50 years of service to the republic.

"The President Is Calling" (Doubleday) is inherently interesting as a chronicle of American public administration (usually at the highest level) in an epoch which saw, first, prosperity, then depression, war and finally cold war. It is hard today to realize that until about 1941 "Ike" was "the other" Eisenhower.

However, far more interesting than the splendid record of accomplishment that Dr. Eisenhower achieved in every position he held—at least he left Scotland and the Foreign Service in 1926 with a "historic hangover" (an unusual departure from grace caused by friends deciding a Kansas boy should learn to drink and spiking his wine with brandy)—is the paradox hidden in his book.

On one hand, he is constantly urging bureaucratic reform, efficient tables of organization, the creation of "executive vice presidents" for this and that. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that, despite his modesty, Milton Eisenhower could get a job done in the midst of chaos.

Belonging to the school that believes reorganizing the bureaucracy is what political leaders do as a substitute for policy, I have little sympathy for the Erector set devotees who generally dominate government thinking in these matters. It is very well to say that in the interest of "efficiency" (an elusive concept if ever there was one) the President should delegate more authority to, say the Secretary of State. Or set up the Nixon labyrinth in which a presidential aide with a national reputation had to be cleared by four members of the praetorian guard before he could talk to "his" boss.

However, the consequence of this devolution of authority is inevitably a mushroom growth of mini-Presidents. I once pointed out to President Johnson in a rather chilly discussion of our Vietnam strategy that never in American history had anyone been elected Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Milton Eisenhower would reply that the presidency today is simply too big for any one man to handle. This counsel of despair may make some sense, but the alternative—in terms of the key democratic principles of responsibility—seems worse.

WATERGATE, AFTER ALL, featured a number of characters playing President, and look how long it took to find out who, under those orders, did what to whom. There has to be one desk where the "buck stops."

No, playing with boxes on charts is not the route of salvation. And ironically Milton Eisenhower's career is strong evidence for this point. In the 18th Century it was observed that "the Men of Massachusetts could make any Constitution work." In the same sense, Eisenhower's record indicates that his precise location on somebody's chart was fundamentally irrelevant. Would he have had any less influence on his brother as a "Counsellor to the President" than he had in a wholly unofficial capacity?

In this connection I hope that somewhere in Milton Eisenhower's safe is an "unsanitized" version of who said what to whom. Anybody in Washington who could get from the White House to the Hill without a Seeing Eye dog knew Milton was very influential. But he ain't talking; and—in an odd way—given the flood of "Me and Kennedy," "Me and Johnson," to say nothing of the impending torrent of "Nixon and Me," volumes, his reticence is refreshing. Yet I would still love to know what Ike said to Milton, after a couple of relaxed libations, about Richard Nixon.

Finally, in a political universe where the muck is still being washed from the walls, it is reassuring—even moving—to read this low-keyed report by a man of transparent decency and integrity. Dwight Eisenhower was not the only good soldier in the family: When the President called, Democratic or Republican, he knew that Milton would answer—and deliver.

Kirkland to General Board:

Roots of Recession Traced To Nixon-Burns Money Policy

From the text of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland's remarks to the AFL-CIO General Board meeting, Jan. 23, 1975:

THE RECESSION IS DEEPENING, dragging down production, destroying public confidence in the government's ability to manage the economy.

Unemployment is mounting daily. The ranks of the discouraged and disillusioned are growing.

The roots of recession are deep in six years of economic mismanagement by Richard Nixon and Dr. Arthur Burns.

The current inflationary wave, touched off by the huge Russian grain deal in mid-1972 and devaluations of the American dollar, was dangerously compounded by the worldwide oil crisis and fourfold increase in the price of crude oil.

The Nixon-Burns response to these mounting troubles was to put the American economy into a stranglehold of tight money and the highest interest rates since the Civil War—adding to inflation and throwing the economy into a dangerous recession.

Even now, with a new President in the White House and the economy in a headlong decline, these disastrous policies remain essentially intact.

President Ford's most recent economic proposals, outlined in his State of the Union message, would mean more inflation, more recession and more unemployment. If that program is implemented the economy will be further depressed. Retail sales will drop even further, because most American families would be left with less buying power, after paying much more in energy-related prices and tax increases than they would receive from the President's proposed tax cut.

Evidence of the grim condition of the American economy abounds:

● The buying power of the average worker's weekly take-home pay dropped 5.4 percent in the past year and 8.6 percent from the peak reached in October 1972. Consumer buying power has fallen so sharply, an increase of nearly $60 billion in the rate of total after-tax personal income would be required to bring the average buying power of every man, woman and child in America back to the level of a year and one-half ago.

● Residential construction, devastated by the Nixon-Burns policies, has been in a depression for over a year. Housing starts are down 64 percent from the early months of 1973. Production and employment in the various supply industries, from lumber to home appliances, have been falling.

● Reflecting the drop in buying power and high prices of autos and fuel, the auto industry, too, has been plunged into a depression. Auto sales are now down about 50 percent from the beginning of 1973, with huge inventories of unsold cars and severe cuts in production.

● Retail sales generally are also declining, after accounting for inflation. This drop in volume of retail sales affects a wide range of consumer goods industries, from textile and clothing to electrical goods and furniture.

● The real volume of business investment in plant and equipment, which moved ahead in the first half of 1974, has been declining since mid-year. High interest rates and inflated fuel prices forced many companies—particularly public utilities—to cancel or postpone plant expansion and modernization programs during 1974.

● Declining sales caught business with the high costs of huge inventories in warehouses and on the shelves. These inventories, accumulated during the past two years in an attempt to profit from rising prices, are now being liquidated—further cutting back orders, production, working hours and employment.

● Employment is dropping. Part-time work schedules are spreading, and unemployment is soaring. By early December the official number of unemployed was 7.1 percent of the labor force or 6.5 million workers—up one million in two months and 2.4 million since October 1973. An additional 3.4 million workers were compelled to work part-time in December, because full-time work was not available. Another 845,000 were so discouraged they have given up looking for work. Unemployment among factory workers was 1.9 million or 8.6 percent, 664,000 construction workers or 15 percent were jobless; 1.4 million or 8.3 percent of the workers in wholesale and retail trade had no work; 1.3 million or 12.8 percent of blacks and other minorities were unemployed.

● Large-scale layoffs, since mid-December, have resulted in much greater and more widespread unemployment at present. For example, in the final week of 1974, more people received unemployment insurance benefits than in any week since the unemployment insurance program was established in 1937.

● The nation's banking system is under severe strain and pressure. The lax regulation of recent years and the pursuit of quick profits further weakened the system. The rapid growth of international banking operations—to 750 branches of U.S. banks abroad and 143 foreign bank branches in the United States—also aggravated the situation. In addition, the floating of the world's major currencies, following two formal devaluations of the American dollar in 1971 and 1973, has been accompanied by gambling in foreign currencies. The results were losses of tens of millions of dollars, several bank failures overseas and the failure of a large New York City bank.

This crisis represents a national emergency, with the wellbeing of the nation and the American people at stake. Immediate emergency action is required to halt the deterioration, restore public confidence and turn the economy around towards balanced growth and full employment.

On Labor's Program:

Legislative Action Pressed To Avert Economic Collapse

THE AFL-CIO IS COMMITTED to an all-out fight for "drastic and immediate action" to head off "the worst depression since the 1930s," Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

Steps ranging from a quick tax cut to embargo of all oil from "blackmailing" Arab nations, spelled out in the action program shaped by an emergency meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board, are the nucleus of what it will take to pull the U.S. economy back from the brink, Biemiller declared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

He said Congress could enact the bulk of labor's program within 60 days, and that large parts of it "could be done tomorrow morning" through White House action.

Neither the President nor the Democratic leaders in Congress have laid out an effective plan to stimulate the economy and create jobs, Biemiller said, and the AFL-CIO program was shaped to fill that void. The President's so-called tax rebate "is nothing but a gesture toward the higher income groups," with low- and middle-income taxpayers getting little or nothing, he charged.

"Rather than this phony business of the President concentrating on a $1,000 rebate to people of means and peanuts for the poor," America needs a quick tax cut that will reduce withholding "anywhere from $3 to $8 a week" in the low- and middle-income tax brackets, the former congressman declared. He said the President should also cut loose the $19 billion of impounded funds under his control, which would give great stimulation to the economy through the construction of sewer systems, disposal plants and other badly needed public works projects.

Biemiller said the President's energy program is "a Rube Goldberg-type plan," holding out the lure of a tax rebate that it "then takes away from you about five times over by inflating the price of every kind of oil-related product—everything affected by oil."

THIS NATION moves into 1975 governed, for the first time, by leaders selected under the 25th Amendment to the Constitution.

For some, the amendment has worked well—just as its authors hoped. For others it undermines the democratic fabric, seating in the nation's two top officials who were not selected through the democratic election process.

A Senate Judiciary subcommittee under the chairmanship of Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), author of the 25th Amendment, will hold hearings on the subject and many proposals are expected.

President Ford, of course, became the first Vice President under the provisions of the amendment when he was nominated by Richard Nixon following the resignation of Spiro T. Agnew. And when Nixon resigned last August Ford moved up to chief executive. Ford nominated Nelson A. Rockefeller for Vice President; he was confirmed in December.

"It is easy to find fault with the 25th Amendment," says Bayh. "It is more difficult to envision an alternative solution that does not present further faults."

At the hearings, Bayh's subcommittee will deal with the entire amendment but it seems unlikely that sections dealing with a disabled President will come under serious question. And this was the initial focus of the amendment.

The second section, relating to how the office of Vice President should be filled, is still subject to considerable debate. The section specifies that in the event of a vacancy the President shall nominate someone to fill the post "who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both houses of Congress."

With two vacancies being filled under the 25th Amendment, Congress seems divided on whether it is a good procedure or not. There are demands for repeal of the amendment, in part or in its entirety.

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) has called for repeal of Section 2, saying that it was prompted by "an undue concern with the consequences of a vacancy in the office . . . To allow the 25th Amendment to stand as it is leaves the electorate of this nation open to the possibility of being governed by persons who have never been publicly elected . . . a precedent inconsistent with the fundamentals of our democratic society."

Bayh said that in approving the amendment special elections were discarded in consideration "because of concern about delay, the departure from our system of quadrennial presidential elections, the cost involved, the divisive partisan effect it would have . . . and, most important, the possibility of a Vice President of a different party or basic philosophy who would be unable to work effectively with the President."

URGING THE ELECTION route, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) has expressed concern "whether two more years . . . under appointed and not elected leaders is consistent with our democracy and the principle of government by the people."

Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) would limit the circumstances under which an election would take place. He has proposed that Congress provide that once a vice president appointed under the amendment succeeded to the presidency—and more than 12 months remain in the term—a special election be held to fill both the presidency and vice presidency.

A new election would unquestionably be the most democratic approach but no one denies that there will be some difficulties in working out the steps leading to the election, including a nominating convention. Possibly election campaigns could be telescoped, something that political scientists have urged for all elections.

It may well be that we will not have a situation comparable to the disasters of 1974 when both the President and Vice President were forced to resign but the question of succession, throughout U.S. history, has never been resolved to national satisfaction.

The Bayh subcommittee may not come up with any better answers but it is expected to consider a number of possibilities.

PLANS TO OBSERVE International Women's Year during 1975 are discussed by members of the Women's Performing Arts Coalition at a New York meeting in Actors' Equity offices. Joan M. Goodin, a national board member for the U.S. observance and a staff official of the Railway & Airline Clerks, is shown addressing the group. Union women are actively involved in the program.

FCC Urged to Curb Spate of TV Reruns

A "rerun epidemic" afflicting network television has resulted in an annual payroll loss of nearly $320 million, the Federal Commuications Commission was told in a union brief supporting a call for the reduction of reruns to 25 percent of prime-time programs.

The brief notes that over the year, the monthly rerun rate averages 41 percent of prime-time programming, excluding newscasts.

And in five months of the year, the Hollywood Film Council, the Screen Actors and the Writers Guild pointed out, there are more reruns aired than original material.

Reruns take up more than 80 percent of prime-time programming during June and July, more than 75 percent in May and August, and about 67 percent in April, the brief stresses.

The extensive use of reruns has resulted in a severe loss of jobs and earnings among members of the film industry's production workforce, the unions noted. They said the average rate of unemployment in the Hollywood Film Council unions is 39.3 percent.

The brief further charges that reruns are a disservice to the public interest, because they "restrict the viewing choices for millions of American families who rely on television broadcasts as their principal source of entertainment."

While there is overwhelming public support for the limitation of reruns, the brief points out that opposition has come almost exclusively from broadcasters.

If the FCC adopts the 25 percent restriction on prime-time reruns, the unions said, payroll losses could be trimmed from $320 million to $194 million and still leave reasonable network profits.

Noting that combined network profits were $184.9 million in 1973, the unions said that under the proposed 25 percent limitation profits still would have exceeded $38 million, well above the $30.1 million annual average in the 1959-61 period—the last three years before the "rerun epidemic" broke out.

The brief urges the FCC to exercise its statutory authority to regulate chain broadcasting "by dealing directly with such network practices affecting programming which are inimical to the public interest."

The brief also refutes the network contention that viewers must like reruns, since the shows command a substantial share of viewers. It charges that because the networks have a "stranglehold" over prime time programming, television audiences must watch the reruns or nothing at all.

Shanker Invites Marchenko to U.S.

New York — Anatoly Marchenko, the Soviet dissident who has been threatened with rearrest, has been invited to the United States by Teachers President Albert Shanker.

Shanker announced at a press conference that he had extended the invitation through the Soviet Embassy and had also written directly to Marchenko himself. He said Marchenko's only chance to avoid imprisonment for the third time would be emigration to the United States.

The author of "My Testimony," an account of prison life in post-Stalin Russia, Marchenko is a self-educated worker who was imprisoned for the "treason" of asking for the right to emigrate. His book was smuggled to the West and published in 1968. His second arrest followed protests against the mounting Soviet pressure against Czechoslovakia several weeks before Russia invaded that country. In all, he spent nine years in Soviet prisons.

Unionists Join Women's Year Observance

Women in the trade union movement are taking part in the United States observance of International Women's Year, a world program under United Nations sponsorship keyed to promoting equal opportunity for women in all fields.

Joan M. Goodin, assistant international affairs director of the Railway & Airline Clerks, is the labor member of the advisory board on U.S. participation.

A number of unions have endorsed the International Women's Year concept—in convention resolutions and in proclamations. The Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees is participating through its new Union Committee for Salaried & Professional Women. Other cooperating union groups include the Coalition of Labor Union Women and the Women's Performing Arts Coalition.

In addition to special programs at the local, state and national levels during 1975, the U.S. participants are pressing for completion of the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution. Five more states are needed to reach the required three-fourths approval.

Pilots Ratify Contract With United Air Lines

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots' master executive council for United Air Lines approved a new 31-month agreement providing substantial wage gains and fringe-benefit improvements for some 5,400 pilots and flight instructors.

Meanwhile, in an effort to resolve a nine-week contract dispute with Texas International Airlines, ALPA urged leaders in affected states and cities to demand that the carrier resume negotiations.

The United pact, ratified by the council on Jan. 18, averted the possibility of a strike called for Feb. 3. The council is an executive body, empowered by United's pilots to approve or reject an agreement.

The settlement is retroactive to June 1, 1974, when the old contract expired. It increases the pay of senior pilots and second officers by 21.5 percent over the life of the contract. First officers over the same period will receive a 24 percent boost in pay, while flight instructors will receive a 32.2 percent increase.

In December, the council rejected an original tentative agreement because of pilot objections to certain work-rule changes whose effect would have been to cut back 100 jobs. The revised pact will produce "no significantly measurable impact on the airline's manpower requirements," the council noted.

The union also successfully turned back a company attempt to remove the third man from the Boeing 747 cockpit crew.

On the dispute with Texas International Airlines — grounded since Dec. 1 by 2,000 striking employes —ALPA President J. J. O'Donnell charged that the carrier "has no incentive to reach an agreement since it stands to profit from Mutual Aid Pact funds made available by competitors during this normally low-traffic period."

The two sides were near agreement on Jan. 15, but the company suddenly reversed its position and refused the National Mediation Board's suggestion of arbitration. The Air Line Employees Association, an ALPA affiliate representing the striking workers, accepted the board's offer.

To Overcome Wage Lag:

Bargaining Rights Awaken Hopes of Hospital Workers

Hospital workers have paid with inferior wages and benefits for their 27-year exclusion from the National Labor Relations Act.

This exclusion, dating from the 1947 Taft-Hartley law, ended last summer when Congress extended bargaining rights to nearly 1.5 million employes of private, non-profit hospitals. Previously, only workers in the substantially smaller group of hospitals operated for profit were protected by federal labor law.

Rudy Oswald, research director of the Service Employees, explores the potential impact of the new coverage in an article in the January issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

The health care field has been one of the big expansion areas of the economy, Oswald notes, and among the least organized in the absence of collective bargaining legislation. While some union contracts date back 30 years or more, only in recent years has collective bargaining in health institutions become significant.

Also a factor in subpar wage scales has been the high percentage of hospital workers from traditionally underpaid groups—women, blacks and the Spanish-speaking.

Even when non-supervisory professionals such as nurses and doctors are included, the average hospital wage is substantially less than the average factory wage. A survey more than two years ago found nurses' aides in typical cities earning from $1.03 to $1.85 an hour less than laborers and the gap has widened since then.

Over the past three years, Oswald says, hospital workers' wages have advanced only 19 percent, while food prices have soared 43 percent and the overall price level is 25 percent higher. Hospitals and nursing homes have had to pay the higher market prices for food and fuel, Oswald notes. They have economized by underpaying their workers, he points out.

A number of unions have won collective bargaining rights at hospitals and nursing homes. Oswald cites election wins for the Hospital & Nursing Home Division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Laborers, Communications Workers, Retail Clerks, Firemen & Oilers, State, County & Municipal Employees, and the Service Employees. Even associations of doctors have been certified as bargaining agents.

A legislative compromise that brought coverage of non-profit hospital workers also amended the basic federal labor law as it applies to all employes of health care institutions, including those in profit-making hospitals and nursing homes.

Thus, Oswald notes, notice of contract termination which generally marks the start of bargaining must be given 90 days in advance as compared with the 60-day requirement in other industries.

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service may impose mandatory mediation in the health care sectors. Likewise, the FMCS must be given a 30-day notice in negotiations for a first contract in the health area.

Under the new law, there must be 10 days notice before a union can strike or picket a health care institution. If the deadline is postponed, at least 12 hours new notice must be given, and if more than 72 hours have elapsed, a new 10-day strike notice must be served. As an additional move, the FMCS may convene an impartial Board of Inquiry to help settle the dispute.

All of these are time-delaying, cooling-off mechanisms designed to lessen the likelihood of strikes at health care institutions. Actually, one of the big steps to avoid strikes was to enable workers to choose union representation through the traditional NLRB recognition procedure. As union witnesses had pointed out in congressional testimony, a high proportion of strikes in the health care field have been for the right to organize and bargain collectively. Only a handful of states had collective bargaining laws that covered health care workers excluded from federal labor law.

Illinois Congressman John Kluczynski Dies

Chicago—Rep. John C. Kluczynski (D-Ill.) died at his home here of a heart attack at the age of 79.

Kluczynski was elected last November to his 13th term in the House from the 5th Congressional District, in Chicago. He was chairman of the transportation subcommittee of the House Public Works Committee and the most recent COPE tally showed him with a career total of 127 "right" and only five "wrong" votes by AFL-CIO standards.

HUMAN RIGHTS AWARD of the Jewish Labor Committee is presented to President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers by New York Gov. Hugh L. Carey and AFL-CIO President George Meany. ACWA Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman is at right. The award was presented at a dinner sponsored by the JLC's National Trade Union Council for Human Rights.

Emil Rieve Dies at 82, First TWUA President

Lauderhill, Fla.—Emil Rieve, founding president of the Textile Workers Union of America and a former vice president of the AFL-CIO, died of a heart ailment at his home here. He was 82.

Rieve, who had been active in the trade union movement since the early 1900s, served as an official of the United Textile Workers, the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, and the TWUA. He was a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council for 10 years.

In a message to his wife Wanda, a former area director of the TWUA, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that Rieve served his fellow workers with honor and distinction.

"All of his colleagues on the Executive Council who shared his friendship and knew of his great contribution to democracy and unionism join with you in mourning his death," Meany and Kirkland said.

The union's executive council in a resolution adopted at its winter meeting in Atlanta cited Rieve's extensive contributions to the welfare of textile workers and the development of the TWUA.

"We pledge to carry on in the tradition that he and the other TWUA pioneers established when they founded our organization four decades ago," the council said.

Rieve was born in Poland in 1892 and came to the United States as a teenager. He went to work in a Pennsylvania hosiery mill for $2.50 a week. He joined the United Textile Workers in 1907 and went on to become a vice president of the Hosiery Workers in 1915 and president of the union in 1929.

He led the Hosiery Workers into the CIO in 1937 and concentrated on building wider representation for textile workers as the executive director of an organizing committee.

With the financial support of the Clothing Workers and ACWA President Sidney Hillman, Rieve's efforts led to the formation of the TWUA as a permanent union in 1939. He was elected the union's first president and continued to serve in that position until 1956 when he became chairman of the union's executive council. He also was a vice president of the CIO, and following merger with the AFL, he became a member of the federation's Executive Council in 1955, retiring in 1965.

Besides his wife, survivors include one son, Harold.

Sheet Metal Settlement Ends 177-Day Strike

St. Louis—Sheet Metal Workers here were pulling down their picket signs and returning to work after negotiators reached agreement on a new contract to end a 177-day strike.

The 31-month contract, retroactive to last Aug. 1, provides for a total hourly wage increase of $2.67 in five steps and an optional program of supplemental unemployment benefits.

A ratification vote was scheduled for Feb. 1 on the agreement covering 1,400 members of Sheet Metal Workers Local 36 here. The local had been on strike against the St. Louis Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors Association since July 31.

A key element in the settlement is the program for payment of additional jobless benefits through an employers' fund as provided in the union's Stabilization Agreement for the Sheet Metal Industry (SASMI).

At the international's convention last year, SASMI was made a top-priority bargaining item for all local contracts. It provides employer contributions of 3 percent of payroll into the supplemental unemployment benefits fund.

Under the St. Louis agreement, Local 36 members will vote on whether to adopt the pattern SASMI formula or take the 3 percent contribution as wages.

The local wage package calls for an increase of 70 cents an hour effective last Aug. 1; 32 cents Jan. 1; 50 cents next July 1; 35 cents Jan. 1, 1976, and 80 cents July 1, 1976. The contract would expire Apr. 30, 1977.

Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough reported that the stabilization agreement has now been negotiated by about 50 bargaining units and is currently in effect in 40 locations.

Issue Put to Congress:

Buying Power Need Keys Tax Cut Plan

1975 taxes that are currently withheld from workers' pay. The rebate proposed by Ullman would earmark 94 percent of tax cuts for those earning less than $20,000 a year, with a maximum rebate of $300.

Ford's proposal would give 57 percent of rebates to persons making more than $20,000 with the top of $1,000 going to persons in the over-$40,000 income brackets.

Under the labor-management panel's plan, a tax cut of up to $375 a year would be accomplished through lowered withholding. A family of four with a $7,500 income would have its tax bill of $484 reduced to $194 under this plan.

In addition, the AFL-CIO General Board pledged labor's support for "a program to give relief to those working poor who pay no income taxes because their earnings are too low."

Goldfinger suggested that one way to accomplish this would be to reduce the social securtiy tax paid by low-wage employes—"with the revenue loss to the social security trust fund to be offset by an equivalent contribution from general revenue."

He stressed that "a program to give relief to the working poor . . . would help to stimulate the economy by giving added purchasing power to those who need it most."

He expressed the AFL-CIO's support for the rise in the investment tax credit for business proposed by the labor-management panel, but not for the additional cut in corporate taxes sought by the President.

Goldfinger termed Ford's tax rebate plan "upside down in terms of economic logic and human needs." Further, he said, the Administration plans for higher fuel taxes would leave most families with less buying power, paying out more in price increases than they would receive from a tax cut.

While stressing the emergency need for a tax cut, Goldfinger strongly urged the Ways & Means Committee to follow through with permanent legislation to close "loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and corporations."

Conway Appointed To AFSCME Post

Jack T. Conway has been appointed executive director of the State, County & Municipal Employes, President Jerry Wurf announced.

Conway, who will join the AFSCME staff in February, has been president of Common Cause, the non-partisan lobbying group, for the past four years.

He served as director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. from 1963-65 after having been deputy director of the Office of Economic Opportunity under President Johnson and deputy administrator of the Housing & Home Finance Agency under President Kennedy. For 15 years, Conway was administrative assistant to the late Auto Workers President Walter Reuther.

Labor Dept. Proposes Arsenic Restrictions

Labor safety experts are examining a proposed federal standard that would reduce worker exposure to inorganic arsenic, but not to the lowest detectable level sought by unions and the government's occupational health agency.

Government and industry studies have linked arsenic to cancer even at extremely low concentrations of the chemical.

The Labor Dept. proposal calls for limiting the concentrations in workplaces to .004 milligrams of inorganic arsenic per cubic meter of air over an eight-hour period from the current limit of .5 milligrams.

Organized labor had petitioned for a non-detectable level, which with current monitoring devices would be no more than .002 milligrams. The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health also had called for the lower level.

The Labor Dept. proposal, which was developed by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, would also permit a surge in the arsenic level to .01 milligrams for any 15-minute period during a work shift.

However, the OSHA recommendation sets an "action level" of .002 milligrams at which workers must be provided with protective clothing and given regular medical examinations. Workers with 10 years on jobs involving the use of arsenic would be examined every six months, while workers with less service would get annual examinations.

NIOSH has estimated that about 1.5 million American workers are exposed directly or indirectly to inorganic arsenic. The chemical is used in a number of industries, including agricultural chemicals, glassware, paints and some medicines.

The OSHA proposal would prohibit any direct skin contact with liquid arsenic trichloride and repeated skin contact with other liquid or solid forms of inorganic arsenic compounds that cause skin irritation.

The proposal would establish regulated areas where inorganic arsenic exceeds the action level. Access to these areas would be limited and records would be kept on all persons entering the areas.

A final standard is still several months away, since hearings on the proposal will not open until Apr. 8. A Mar. 3 deadline was set for comments on the standard.

EXCLUSION OF ISRAEL from UNESCO programs is protested at a New York rally of trade union representatives from entertainment and theatrical fields. President Theodore Bikel of Actors' Equity, center, is the focus of a television interview after the rally was forced out of Shubert Theater by a bomb threat. Bikel was chairman of the protest rally.

New York Theater Unions Assail UNESCO's Exclusion of Israel

New York—Representatives of 120,000 union members—including actors, musicians, stage hands, publicists, costumers and theatrical house personnel—rallied here to condemn the recent action of UNESCO excluding Israel from all facets of its work.

An anonymous bomb threat telephoned to WCBS-TV and relayed to New York police failed to halt the rally, which began at the Shubert Theater. The protesters filed from the theater at the request of police—who searched the building and did not find a bomb—into Shubert Alley and contined the lunch-hour meeting there in biting cold.

UNESCO—the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization—was warned by Actors' Equity President Theodore Bikel, chairman of the rally, that it must: Clean your own house—until you do, you'll have to do without the American theater.

Actress Julie Harris read a declaration of protest, adopted unanimously by the rally, which said:

"In response to purely political pressure UNESCO has seen fit to exclude Israel, a member state, for all practical purposes from its work. As a result of politically inspired maneuvers, she is now the only state which has been excluded from any regional grouping. Geographical considerations could have played no part in this move, for Canada is part of UNESCO's Europe and Australia is part of UNESCO's Asia.

"An arm of the United Nations which by its very charter is devoted solely to scientific, educational and cultural advancement has no right to play politics no matter what pressure some of its constituents may bring to bear. This perverts the very essence of UNESCO's existence; it serves neither the promotion and spread of knowledge nor the quest for scientific truth nor the flowering of culture and the arts. Indeed, it makes a mockery of scholarship, science and artistry.

"We of the American theater—actors and technicians, dramatists, producers, managers, musicians, singers, dancers, publicists, stage hands, scenic designers, directors and choreographers — add our voices, some 120,000 of them, to those which have already been raised in protest against the capricious actions of UNESCO's General Conference.

"We call upon all our colleagues the world over to join us in this protest action and challenge UNESCO to rescind its November resolutions regarding the State of Israel. This declaration is not a political act on our part. On the contrary, it protests the politicizing by pressure groups of a body hitherto confined to the non-political arena of culture, education and science.

"We pledge—individually and collectively—to withhold our services and our cooperation from any event sponsored by or connected with UNESCO until that body recognizes Israel's right to be included in the family of nations once more."

Endorsing the resolution in addition to Equity were the New York locals of the Musicians, Theatrical Press Agents & Managers, the Directors Guild, Theatrical Stage Employes, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Legitimate Theatre Employes, Make-Up Artists & Hair Stylists, the Theatrical Costumers Local 38, Treasurers & Ticket Sellers, Scenic Artists and the United Hebrew Trades.

Meany to Appear On 'Face the Nation'

AFL-CIO President George Meany will be interviewed on the CBS television program "Face the Nation" on Sunday, Feb. 9.

While the program is aired by the network at 11:30 a.m. EST, individual stations may schedule it at different times and local listings should be checked.

Senate Panel to Count New Hampshire Ballots

New Hampshire will be represented by only one senator until the Senate Rules Committee completes a tally of disputed ballots cast in last November's election and the Senate acts on its findings.

An official recount gave a 10-vote victory to Democrat John A. Dirkin, but a review of challenged ballots by a State Ballot Commission switched enough votes to declare Wyman a two-vote winner.

The Senate defeated a Republican motion to seat Wyman temporarily and then rejected another GOP proposal to have the seat filled by a new election. Both votes closely followed party lines.

It then voted 58-34 for the motion by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield to send the dispute to the Rules Committee. Mansfield took the position that the Senate has a constitutional obligation to determine the winner of the election since it is the final judge of its own membership.

On the House side of the Capitol, a battle over committee chairmanship that erupted in the Democratic caucus carried over into the selection of two subcommittee chairmen.

In both cases, liberal Democrats were chosen to replace other liberal Democrats by close votes that apparently reflected a mixture of motives, including a contention that no person should have more than one key post.

Thus, Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), who became chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee this year, was dropped from the chairmanship of a consumer affairs subcommittee of the House Banking Committee which she had held for 12 years. She was replaced by Rep. Frank Annunzio (D-Ill.).

And in the House Commerce Committee, after a five-ballot deadlock, Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.) was replaced as chairman of the Investigations subcommittee by Rep. John E. Moss (D-Calif.).

Staggers is chairman of the full Commerce Committee and had earlier been confirmed in that post by the Democratic caucus.

Congress Blocks Ford on Food Stamps

House Acts To Suspend Oil Tariff

Congress blocked the Ford Administration's attempt to make the poor pay more for food stamps in order to hold down the budget deficit.

The vote was overwhelming—378-38 in the House and 76-8 in the Senate.

If Congress hadn't acted, persons eligible for food stamps would have to pay 30 percent of their net income instead of the present 23 percent or less. This would have "saved" $215 million during the balance of this fiscal year. And the President's budget proposals for fiscal 1976 include it as a $615 million savings.

In human terms, an elderly person with a net income of $146 a month would have had to pay out $13 more for food. Under present rules, such a person's cost for $46 worth of food stamps is $30. Under the new Agriculture Dept. rules that Congress blocked, the cost would have risen to $43 and the total benefit would be only $3 a month.

Rep. Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.), the new chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, charged that raising the price of food stamps would hit hardest the group that has already suffered most from inflation and recession.

So strong was the congressional feeling that it was hard to find anyone to defend the Administration on the issue. Rep. Steven D. Symms (R-Ida.) made an argument that the food stamp program was "inflationary" and suggested that the availability of food stamps might be deterring people from looking for work. But he was almost alone, and other conservative Republicans were content to urge future "reform" of the food stamp program—such as disqualifying needy families of strikers.

Congress, meanwhile, moved towards another challenge to the President's economic and budget policies.

The House voted 309-114 to suspend for 90 days the President's power to impose a higher tariff on imported oil. The legislation, drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee, would nullify the $1 a barrel special tariff Ford already has imposed and block his plan to add an additional $2 charge.

Ford's actions, whether or not Congress went along for his call for a comparable tax on domestic oil,

Grim Report on Economy Projects Long Recession

8% Jobless Outlook for Two Years

By James M. Shevis

At least another year of recession, replete with high unemployment plus double-digit inflation, faces the American people, President Ford warned in the annual Economic Report to Congress.

The unusually grim report, gloomier than any issued in the past 30 years, noted "unemployment is too high and will rise higher."

The nation's jobless rate will average 8 percent this year and next, and won't drop below 7 percent before 1978, the Administration said.

The President's report also forecast that real gross national product this year will fall about 3 percent and prices will soar over 11 percent.

If the President's forecast is correct, the decline in the growth rate this year would be the second consecutive annual fall-off in the country's total output of goods and services since the end of World War II. Real GNP in 1974 slid 2.2 percent.

In a set of "economic assumptions" which are the underpinnings of both the Economic Report and the President's 1976 budget, the exact real GNP decline for 1975 is pegged at 3.3 percent. A modest growth rate of 4.8 percent is seen for 1976.

"The economy is in a severe re-

Recession Deficit:

'Bad News' Budget Keyed To Less for Poor, Aged, Ill

By David L. Perlman

President Ford's "bad news" budget calls for sacrifices by the poor, sick and aged but bars new or expanded federal programs to pull the nation out of recession.

The President projected a $52 billion federal deficit for the fiscal year starting July 1—the largest peacetime shortage in the nation's history—and warned that it would be higher if Congress did not make the cutbacks and changes the Administration is asking.

But Ford acknowledged that the deficit would disappear if unemployment could be significantly reduced, and the red ink could turn into a multi-billion dollar surplus if full employment were achieved.

Just going back to the 1973-1974 unemployment rate of about 5 percent, Ford noted, would add some $40 billion to the anticipated tax revenues and reduce spending for federal benefits to the unemployed by $12.7 billion.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger cited this evidence that Ford's budget totals amount to a "recession deficit" and not an "expenditure deficit."

In program terms, Goldfinger said, it combines "austerity for the poor, the retired, veterans and the disadvantaged" with "vast amounts of tax relief for corporations."

Thus the President proposed to limit the automatic cost-of-living increases in social security, civil service and railroad retirement benefits to 5 percent—even though his budget assumes that the consumer price index will rise more than double that figure this year.

But it won't happen unless Congress votes to change existing law.

Ford asked Congress also to suspend the "comparability" pay adjustment for the government's white collar workers and the prevailing wage pattern for blue-collar workers. He wants both groups held to a 5 percent pay ceiling, and the President called on workers in the private sector to "follow this example." He also asked Congress to economize by repealing a section of the prevailing wage law that widens the area of a wage survey when there are insufficient private industry jobs in the immediate locality of a government installation.

The President was insistent that national health insurance legislation should wait until "our current economic problems are behind us." At that time, he said,

Labor Backs Bill to Ease Money, Allocate Credit for Priority Needs

A House bill to lower interest rates by increasing the growth rate of the nation's money supply and to assure credit for high priority needs was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO which described it as "one of the most significant bills of recent years."

Among its provisions, the measure would direct the Federal Reserve Board and the Fed's Open Market Committee to maintain in the first half of 1975 an annual money supply growth rate of no less than 6 percent. Any deviation from this target would have to be reported to the House and Senate banking committees.

Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the federation's Dept. of Legislation, told a House Banking subcommittee on domestic monetary policy that the bill's objectives are in line with policies adopted two weeks earlier at the AFL-CIO General Board's emergency meeting on the economy.

"In fact, we believe a more rapid rate of growth in the money supply and a speedier decline in long-term interest rates is needed," Biemiller declared. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

Biemiller recommended stronger language in the measure mandating, rather than requesting, the Federal Reserve Board to pursue the stipulated monetary growth policy.

"General tight money and high interest rates have brought America into several economic recessions and have now trapped the nation in the current recession, the worst economic mess since the Great Depression," he observed.

The House bill, introduced by

State Bodies Urged to Spur Jobs Program

AFL-CIO central bodies in every state have been urged by Federation President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to hold emergency conferences on economic problems at the state level.

In a letter to the state officials, Meany and Kirkland transmitted copies of the "Action Program to Put America Back to Work" adopted by the General Board and said:

"We are asking you to arrange a similar conference of all affiliates in your state as soon as possible within the next few weeks. Such a conference can mobilize the labor movement in support of the AFL-CIO's program to get jobs for

MACHINISTS PRESIDENT Floyd Smith, keynoting the 1975 IAM Legislative Conference in Washington, told some 900 delegates "our most crucial objective" is full employment. Outlining other top legislative goals for 1975, Smith listed a fair taxation system, national health insurance, protection against the export of American jobs and technology and the outlawing of the airline industry's so-called mutual aid pact.

Jobless Unionists Share Worries Along with Trimmed Budgets, Diets

Los Angeles—Mike Palmer, 30, a plumber 6½ years, hasn't worked at his trade for three months.

He reports to his union's hiring hall every morning—Local 545 in Santa Monica—but there hasn't been any work.

Is he discouraged? Profoundly no.

Weldon Greenlee, 36, a truck driver 15 years, hasn't worked at his job since mid-November. He'll draw his first unemployment check this week. He's already applied for food stamps and Medi-Cal —California health insurance program for the needy.

Is he discouraged? Another profound no.

Michael Basaric, 34, a native Yugoslavian, has been here 15 years and a journeyman Plumber six years.

He's been out of work four months, since he last plied his trade on a condominium job along California's "golden coastline" near Malibu.

He checks in every day at his hiring hall—also Local 545.

How's he feel? He's "hanging tight" with the union.

If there's a common denominator here, it's that they share in America's growing problems —unemployment, inflation.

But they share another element —while they have never crossed paths—a modicum, ever so slight perhaps, of optimism.

And there's another, more important bond among this trio. Although they've never had dialogue on the subject, it's union affiliation.

Mike Palmer:

"The union's been good to me. I'm going to be good to the union. I'd never think about taking a fink (under union scale) job.

"Sure, it's been tough, and I'm looking for something worth more than unemployment pay ($90 a week maximum) I can do at nights so I can go on checking for work every morning at the union hall.

"The union gave me my chance to build a future. I have that now, no matter how bleak things look. My wife just got out of the hospital, since she had surgery on Dec. 23.

"Without the union benefits we couldn't have made it. I've got no real complaints."

Mike, his wife and three children—ages 10, 9 and 7—live in an attractive section of Redondo Beach. Their two-story, three-bedroom house has a monthly mortgage payment of $268.

How're they making it?

"We've cut down. You name it. We've cut down everywhere."

"We're on sort of a bean diet. We mix in some hamburger and that other 'junk' they call helper. But the kids get their milk and other things important for their diet.

"Instead of all of us spreading out in the house to do things like we used to, now we all get together in the front room, turn off the rest of the lights and heat, play some games with the kids, watch TV or read.

"My wife and I haven't been going out—especially with her being in the hospital—so we've saved on car and other expenses, which we couldn't afford anyway."

Mike hedged against this eventuality. He saved up three months' expenses. That's about run out.

When he worked he brought home about $250 net pay a week.

Weldon Greenlee carried home $350 a week until just before Thanksgiving.

He and his wife, Connie and sons, 7 and 4, live in a comfortable three-bedroom and den ranch house, endemic to Southern California's San Fernando Valley—an area called Canoga Park. The mortgage is $380 a month.

Until now they've managed to live off savings and income from a few 2-3 days a week jobs Weldon got and Connie brought in from a bookkeeping job.

Savings are now down to $900, and $300 of that will come out this month for various expenses.

Aunt Grace in Bakersfield came up with a large food freezer, and Weldon struck a deal for a hind quarter of beef.

"That's what we been living on. The food stamps will go for staples and milk."

"The one thing we really have going is faith."

Mike Palmer too expressed faith. He said he thought things would "continue to be slow" but he feels that things will pick up, even if it takes the next year."

Michael Basaric, his wife and daughter, 4, have been living off unemployment compensation and what's left of their two-bedroom and den home in West Los Angeles.

The mortgage payment is $368 a month.

With still a trace of his eastern European accent he tells of "a good six years" as a journeyman Plumber which has helped him "get this far."

"How do the Basarics manage?

"We buy less meat, eggs and milk for my wife and me. The child still gets the best."

Plea to Ford: 'To Thine Own Actors Be True'

President Ford has been asked to look into the use of federal funds to finance a tour of a British theatrical group in the United States.

The Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees in a message to Ford condemned the spending of $250,000 to pay for the appearances of a foreign company at a time when "unemployment among American musicians, actors and other artists is disastrous."

The council is questioning a grant announced by the National Endowment for the Humanities to the Royal Shakespeare Co. It said there is no objection to the British troupe appearing in the United States since "it is a fine organization, rich in talent and tradition."

But the council said that while the Humanities Endowment is giving $250,000 to the British group, the National Endowment for the Arts limits its annual expenditure to any American theater company to $200,000.

The council's acting president, George Gill, and Hal C. Davis, chairman of its Entertainment & Media Industries Committee, suggested that if such funds are available for foreign groups, then some of the money should be shifted to aid beleaguered American cultural groups.

Ford's Forecast:

8% Unemployment To Hold for 2 Years

cession," Ford declared at the very start of his economic message.

In a lengthy analysis of economic conditions accompanying the President's message, the Council of Economic Advisers said "the economy is likely to continue its downward course in the first half of 1975 and to move onto the road to recovery in the second half."

The Economic Report also said inflation will be very high through June but will subside in the second half of the year.

The Administration forecasts prices this year will rise at an average rate of 11.3 percent, even more than the 11 percent rate estimated for 1974.

The thrust of the report indicated the President and his advisers still view inflation as the main economic ill afflicting the nation. This view was reinforced by Treasury Sec. William E. Simon who told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress a day after the report was released that the long-range problem is not recession but achieving greater price stability.

Simon, the Administration's chief economic spokesman, suggested that the nation should be prepared to put up with high rates of unemployment for years to come. He said that "some margin of economic slack must remain for a period of years to ensure that inflation can be squeezed out gradually."

The nation's jobless rate will average 8.1 percent in 1975, dropping slightly in 1976 to an average 7.9 percent, the Administration predicted. The report of the President and his advisers indicate the December unemployment rate, originally announced as 7.1 percent, actually reached 7.2 percent, a rise of six-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month.

Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, noted the Administration's assumptions are for "a prolonged recession with the highest level of unemployment since the Great Depression of the 1930s."

"This is a very clear indication from the White House that the AFL-CIO action program is an utter necessity" if the economy is to be turned around, he said.

At a news briefing on the details of the 359-page Economic Report, CEA Chairman Alan Greenspan said he does not believe the jobless rate will rise as high as 9 percent at any time during 1975, but he acknowledged "we're dealing with an inexact science" in econometric forecasting.

Last October, when the rate reached 5.5 percent, Greenspan told reporters joblessness would rise to 6.25 or 6.5 percent by late this spring and that the rate of inflation would drop to about 8 percent by early spring.

Both in the report and at the briefing, the three-member economic advisory council somewhat qualified its predictions for the economy's performance.

"The uncertainties are so great at the present time that the projections cited above, although presented as specific numbers, are subject to an unusually wide margin of error," the CEA noted in one caveat in the report.

"The past several months have witnessed a progressive scaling-down of output projections and a scaling-up of unemployment projections."

The long-range outlook for the economy is as dreary as the short-term. Although the President and his advisers see slight and gradual improvement after 1976, their forecast is for hard times through the remainder of the decade.

The Administration's economic assumptions show the jobless rate hanging high at an average 7.5 percent rate in 1977, falling off to an average 6.9 percent in 1978, to 6.2 percent in 1979 and dropping to 5.5 percent in 1980. By comparison, the unemployment rate averaged 5.6 percent in 1974 and 4.9 percent in 1973.

The inflation rate, as measured by the consumer price index, is expected to average 7.8 percent in 1976. In 1977, the CPI rise is forecast at a still-high 6.6 percent. Increases of 5.2, 4.1 and 4 percent are seen for 1978, 1979 and 1980, respectively.

Real GNP — total output after removal of the effects of inflation— would rise to 5.6 percent in 1977 and to 6.5 percent in each of the next three years, if the Administration's projections are on target.

Again qualifying his predictions, Greenspan told newsmen "it's quite possible that, if we proceed in a very circumspect and prudent way . . . and restore public confidence, we can arrive at more acceptable levels of unemployment and inflation than are suggested" in the assumptions.

But restoring confidence was something for which Greenspan would offer no remedy, aside from pushing the President's economic and energy proposals which face rough sledding in Congress.

The Economic Report, which is required by the Employment Act of 1946 to indicate what progress the Executive Branch is making to assure growth and stable unemployment, observed:

"The most pressing concern of policy is to halt the decline in production and employment so that growth of output can resume and unemployment can be reduced."

The report acknowledged that the Administration's complicated energy program "will raise prices at a time when inflation is serious," but it argued that the program would provide important benefits, chiefly independence from foreign countries for oil.

The President said his proposed one-year $16-billion tax cut was "an essential first move" in restoring the nation's economic health, and that without it the year-to-year decline in real output in 1975 would be one-half of 1 percent to 1 percent steeper than the predicted 3.3 percent slide.

In his message, Ford cautioned against an over-reliance on fiscal and monetary policies to support the economy. While such policies might increase business activity, they may also "allow victory in the battle against inflation to slip beyond our grasp," he said.

Yet, his advisers stressed, "the uncertainties that underlie the outlook for 1975 add to the importance of a flexible monetary policy. . . ."

"Toward this end, reasonable growth in money and credit will be required—growth which, one hopes, will encourage a freer flow of credit and lower interest rates in private credit markets."

The CEA's economic analysis also observed that "the prospect of a sharp (housing) upturn appears small at this time," predicted real consumer spending in 1975 may fall for the second year in a row, and forecast a sharp contraction in new plant and equipment investment.

Recession Deficit:

'Bad News' Budget Keyed To Less for Poor, Aged, Ill

a "high national priority" should be given to devising "a system that we will be able to afford."

His budget "economizes" on federal payments for health care through two devices: elderly persons on Medicare would be required to pay a larger share of their hospital and doctor bills, and 13 so-called "high income states" that have 70 percent of the low-income persons eligible for Medicaid would be required to pay a larger portion of the cost, with the federal share decreased. New York, California, Illinois, Michigan and New Jersey are among the states on the supposedly "affluent" list.

Another Medicaid "savings" proposed by Ford is elimination of federal matching funds for adult dental care.

The budget savings on the Medicare program would come through requiring the elderly to pay an additional $1.3 billion a year in hospital and doctor costs.

Under present law, a hospitalized person over 65 pays for the first day of hospital care but then has no further payment through the 60th day. Ford wants Congress to require the patient to pay 10 percent of the cost after the first day up to an annual ceiling of $750. He also asked that persons with the supplemental doctor bill insurance of Medicare be required to pay 30 percent of their physician fees, up to $750, instead of the present 20 percent.

Most government programs are budgeted for higher funds, although in most cases the rise is less than the projected inflation rate. Overall federal employment would be almost identical with current levels, with increases and cutbacks balancing out.

There will be a pickup in funds for housing and water treatment funds over the reduced level of recent years, although the President still wants Congress to rescind part of the money already appropriated. And the Administration has fought the type of expanded public works programs used during past recessions to create employment while assisting communities.

The President made a strong appeal to Congress to go along with his proposed $8 billion increase in military spending—to $92.8 billion during fiscal 1976.

In line with the Administration's dismal economic forecast, the budget tickets an additional $3.5 billion for federal unemployment compensation payments—on top of the hefty increase in the current year's spending.

The budget assumes that Congress will enact Ford's proposed fuel tax and will not rescind his authority to raise the tariff on oil imports.

Both assumptions are certainly open to challenge. Yet the fuel tax is a key factor in a wide array of budget assumptions, including both the rate of inflation and the projected deficit.

Also questionable is the budget's premise that a heavily Democratic Congress will make the cuts in social programs demanded by a conservative Republican President.

The same week the budget was delivered to Capitol Hill, Congress voted overwhelmingly to prohibit the Administration from making the poor pay more for food stamps, thus throwing out of kilter a $650 million "saving" in the President's budget.

Most school children would pay more for their lunches under a budget proposal that would limit federal subsidies to the neediest children.

The only new programs that received the President's budget endorsement were in the energy field. A total of $2.1 billion was budgeted for research into such matters as conversion of coal into liquid fuel and gas; new methods of extracting oil from shale; solar energy development and nuclear power research.

One government agency took the almost unprecedented step of defying the President and looking openly to Congress for more funds.

The chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission, Richard Simpson, wrote Ford that failure to give the relatively new agency the added money it had sought amounts to "a devastating blow . . . to the cause of consumer health and safety." Without more funds, he complained, the agency would be reduced to marking time.

Despite the vastness of the overall budget figures, there has been relatively little change in total outlays as a percentage of the nation's gross national product—the value of goods and services produced. Over the past decade, it has hovered just over the 20 percent mark and is estimated at about 22 percent for fiscal 1976.

The breakdown of the budget totals can be misleading. Thus social security payments—budgeted at $74.4 billion for the 1976 fiscal year—are second only to national defense in terms of federal spending. But the money comes from payroll taxes paid by workers and their employers, and currently brings in more "income" than the government pays out in benefits.

It is the custom of presidents to speak of budget figures as if they were cast in iron. Yet just two weeks before the 1976 fiscal year budget was made public, the Administration said its deficit would be $5 billion less than was ultimately projected. The director of the Office of Management & Budget, Roy L. Ash, was asked about the discrepancy.

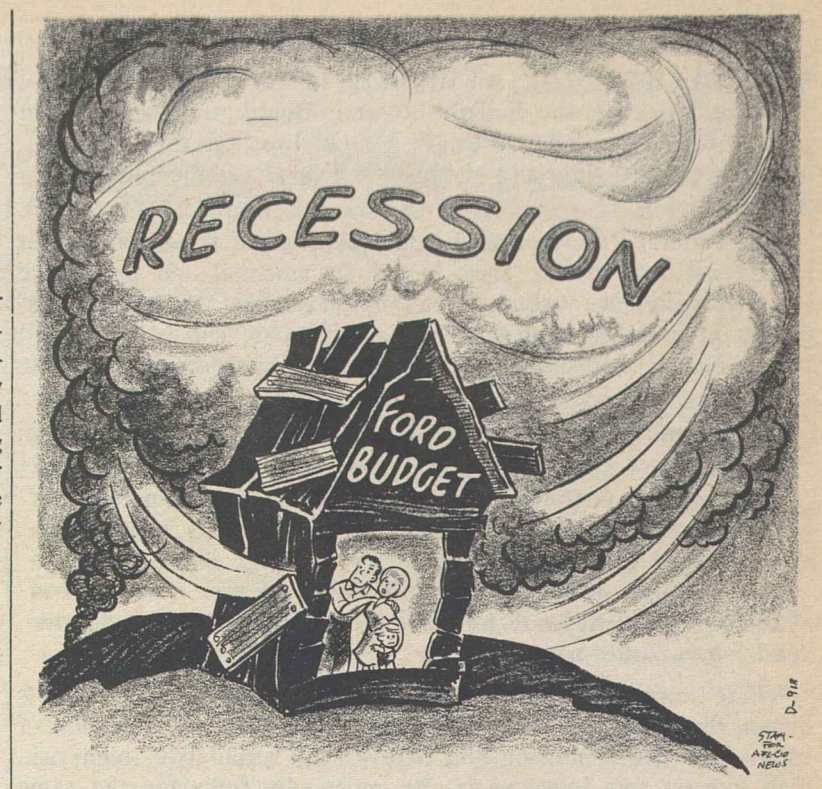
He told newsmen that last-minute changes in the economic projection —for a year that would not begin until July—indicated $4 billion less in income tax receipts and $1 billion additional in jobless payments.

Last year's budget projected a deficit of $9.4 billion. But the economic tailspin makes the current estimated deficit $34.7 billion.

For the 1976 fiscal year, the proposed budget shows the federal government taking in $297.5 billion and paying out $349.4 billion.

Thirty percent of the income would come from individual income taxes, 26 percent from the social security payroll taxes, 14 percent from corporation income taxes, 15 percent from borrowing, 9 percent from excise taxes and 6 percent from other sources.

The payouts would go 39 percent to individuals—mostly through social security—and 27 percent to national defense, 11 percent in grants to states and cities, 11 percent for other federal expenditures, 5 percent in individual grants and 7 percent in net interest payments.



Adams Named as Head Of House Budget Panel

The House Democratic Caucus picked Rep. Brock Adams (D-Wash.) to be chairman of the House Budget Committee—a post that could become one of the most influential in Congress if the budget reform law passed last year lives up to expectations.

Two liberals—Adams and Neal Smith of Iowa—contended for the post. The committee was established last summer with Rep. Al Ullman (D-Wash.) as chairman. But Ullman had to give it up to succeed Wilbur Mills as head of the Ways & Means Committee.

Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.), one of the original sponsors of budget reform, is head of the counterpart Senate committee.

The Democratic caucus also named the party's 17 members on the 25-member House Budget Committee, of whom three were required to be members of the Ways & Means Committee and three drawn from the Appropriations Committee. The others came from various legislative committees and nominations of party leaders.

The committee, including its Republican members, is considered somewhat more conservative than the House as a whole. But fears that the conservative coalition might end up with a majority were largely allayed when Jamie L. Whitten, a Mississippi conservative, withdrew as a nominee from the Appropriations Committee and was replaced by Louis Stokes, a liberal from Ohio and a leader of the black caucus.

One of the first jobs of the House and Senate panels—and particularly of their chairmen—will be to pick a director for a new congressional budget office that is supposed to give Congress a professional staff comparable to the expertise available to the Executive Branch through the President's budget office.

The budget reform law sets out a detailed procedure and timetable, but it won't apply until next year.

This is a transitional year for the federal budget, the last time it will be keyed to a fiscal year that starts July 1.

Starting next year, Congress will have three additional months to act on the budget requests. The President's budget will still be due in late January. But it will be drawn up for a fiscal year to start the following Oct. 1.

The budget submitted this year includes a separate estimate of the additional money needed to cover the gap between the June 30, 1976, end of one fiscal year and the Oct. 1, 1976 start of the new one The funding estimate, however, merely assumes continuation of ongoing programs unchanged and is almost certain to be modified closer to its effective date.

After the President's budget for fiscal 1977 is submitted next January, these are the major steps outlined in the budget reform law:

With input from the congressional budget office and recommendations from legislative committees, the House and Senate budget committees would prepare an overall target dealing with levels of spending, taxation, anticipated surplus or deficit and including breakdowns of appropriation goals by major functions, such as national defense, health or housing. Congress would have to adopt such a resolution by May 15 of each year.

There would be timetables for appropriations bills and by Sept. 15, Congress would be required to adopt a second budget resolution making any desired changes in the targets established the previous spring.

And finally, before the new fiscal year began, there would be a reconciliation bill in which the appropriations already enacted would be modified as needed to stay within the framework of the final budget resolution.

Both Muskie and Adams have indicated that their committees will try a "dry run" of some of the procedures to be more rigidly applied next year, including adoption of overall budget goals in resolutions to be brought before the House and Senate.

Adams noted that until the congressional budget office is in full operation, any spending targets would have to be "very crude." He gave the new budget process an even chance of succeeding, cautioning that it conflicts with "all the established ways of doing business" in Congress.

Meany Stresses Unity With UAW on Job Needs

About 10,000 jobless Auto Workers converged on Washington Feb. 5 for a rally dramatizing the unemployment situation, particularly in their industry which is in a state of collapse.

UAW President Leonard Woodcock noted that about 300,000 Auto Workers currently are out of work at the nation's four major auto manufacturing companies, General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors.

"There is vast human suffering and frightening insecurity behind the cold statistics of massive, still-rising layoffs," he said.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in a message to the rally, said "it is a national disgrace that so many in leadership positions in this country have so forgotten the human misery of unemployment that workers must hold rallies to focus attention on the need to get America back to work and spare the nation another depression."

The AFL-CIO and the UAW "are fully united in this battle to put America back to work," Meany wrote Woodcock.

"We share not only a common concern about the problem, but a common economic and tax program, and we will be lobbying side by side in Congress for the jobs this country must have to avoid certain economic collapse.

"Our joint efforts can insure a congressional program, conceived in compassion and common sense, that will give America what it needs—a stable, healthy economy with full employment, restored purchasing power and confidence in the future."

The emergency rally, held at the D.C. Armory, drew auto workers from all over the country, but mostly from Detroit.

A six-inch snowstorm on the eve of the rally did not deter them from going ahead with their plans.

The union members carried placards and buttons reading, "We want jobs" and "We want work, not words." They drew up a program calling upon Congress for substantial tax cuts for low- and middle-income workers, more public jobs and federal standards for unemployment insurance, among other forms of assistance.

Josephine Piccolo Dies, D.C. United Way Aide

Josephine R. Piccolo, labor consultant to the United Way of the Washington, D.C., area, died of cancer Feb. 1. Mrs. Piccolo, 48, who had been active in trade union and community affairs more than 20 years, also was an executive board member of the Virginia AFL-CIO.

She was a former official of Communications Workers Local 2300 and served as its president in 1952-54. She also had been COPE women's activities director for the Greater Washington Central Labor Council since 1971.

Survivors include her husband, Tony, and a daughter. Services were held in Alexandria, Va., Feb. 5 and burial was in Arlington National Cemetery.

Priorities for Credit

WE BELIEVE THE AMENDMENTS to the Credit Control Act, directing the Federal Reserve Board to allocate credit toward national priority uses, is a new direction that has been needed for some time and is urgently needed for the present and the future.

The Federal Reserve Board would be directed to allocate credit toward national priority uses, including: essential and productive capital investment, normal operations of established business customers in order to overcome lack of adequate capital, low- and middle-income housing, small business and agriculture, and state and local governments.

Such allocation, according to priority uses and away from non-productive speculative investments, would have avoided the discriminatory method of credit allocation that America has experienced in the last 20 years. That method has been to rely upon a tight general monetary policy and high interest rates to allocate funds when they were in short supply. The Federal Reserve tight money policies made the credit funds supply shorter and interest rates rose.

There have been five repetitions of this sequence of events during the past two decades. The result has been an allocation of funds away from housing and in favor of speculative, high risk, high interest rate investments. By repeatedly following the same policies, the Executive and Legislative Branches have permitted, and the Federal Reserve has mandated, an allocation of credit that has caused deep declines in residential construction, curtailments in state and local construction and in utility plant construction. Every time, marked declines in construction have been followed by economic recession.

Over the past two years, with some brief interruptions, money has been tighter, interest rates higher and the housing decline steeper than in earlier performances of the scenario. From the peak seasonally adjusted rate of 2.5 million housing starts in October 1972, there was a 65 percent decline to a rate of 868,000 unit starts in December 1974.

The concentrated adverse effect has led to high unemployment in the directly affected industries, such as 15 percent among construction workers, and as their purchasing power was decreased, overall unemployment snowballed above 7 percent—and will probably approach 8 percent.

It is primarily the high interest rates which choke off housing demand. Although more than $10 billion was committed by the government under special programs for purchases of home mortgages bearing interest rates of 7¾ to 8¾ percent during 1974, only about one-fifth of the funds had been used by the end of the year. Most families cannot afford to buy homes financed at such high interest rates, let alone at 9 to 10 percent rates prevalent in the private market.

More and effective selective measures for the allocation of credit and the achievement of lower interest rates are needed to avoid the severe depressions in construction activity that have resulted from reliance on tight money and high interest rates to combat inflationary pressures.

A Word Edgewise:

Reneging on Ziegler Invitation Compounds Original Inanity

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE TIMES when I really wonder at the human capacity for autohypnosis. If in 1970 the student body at Boston University had invited a pro-Hanoi speaker and a dean had chastised the choice, the whole place would have gone up in smoke. The American Civil Liberties Union would have issued a press release condemning this repressive act and, in the Times, Anthony Lewis would have had one of his bouts of hysterics.

For my part, I would have taken a dim view of the speaker's position, but defended the right of the students to invite anyone they damn please. Indeed, I was recently asked how I felt about an invitation by a nearby university to a spokesman for the Palestine Liberation Organization: There was some feeling that his talk might constitute a "provocation." My reply was that I consider the PLO to be a bunch of ideological gangsters, but that if its speaker appeared (unarmed) he deserved to be heard. And anybody who tried to break up the meeting or shout him down should be tucked in the slammer.

Recently, however, Ronald Ziegler has been put through the mill at Boston University's School of Public Communication. Originally the students unanimously voted to invite him to lecture on the "Use and Abuse of Power" at a $2,700 fee. The dean then intervened, protesting the fee. In fairness, he did add that he would defend Ziegler's right to speak—for nothing. The faculty unanimously supported this suggestion and, when the matter returned to the student government, the latter disinvited Ziegler.

The nub of the attack was that by paying Ziegler, the school was endorsing the whole "immoral" Watergate sequence. (Presumably paying a pro-Hanoi speaker in 1970 did not involve any endorsement of the North Vietnamese dictatorship—to have that would have been to engage in guilt by association.)

What is raised by this assault on Ziegler is the whole question of double-moral bookkeeping. Let me say, for starters, that I think the student assembly was out of its mind to invite Ziegler to talk at a School of Public Communication. It is comparable to inviting a color-blind individual to lecture on the French Impressionists. Ziegler's specialty was non-communication. Second, the $2,700 fee is mind-boggling. (By the way, if Ziegler has a good agent, I suspect he will get his money whether he speaks or not: high moralism does not void the law of contract.) In short, I believe the original offer was inane.

However, once the invitation was out, it seems to me that the dean and his faculty behaved in a quite outrageous fashion. One can make a case—a number of conservatives do—that the faculty and administration of a school should act ideologically in loco parentis to the students, effectively straightening the children out when the little dears go astray. But the liberal view, as I understand it, is that the students are not to be treated as non compos infants, that they have wide areas of free choice, and that customarily in a liberal institution one of these areas is who they want to listen to on issues of the day.

BETWEEN 1968 AND 1971 it was hard to turn around without finding some left-wing militant whooping up the campus revolution. In my personal judgment a number of them were taking "immoral" positions and collecting substantial sums in the process. One of the prize kooks, who was incapable of uttering an English sentence without five "you knows" tucked into it, was picking up $2,000 a shot. (I once did a computation and figured he got $10 for each "you know" and $5 for each "like, man, it . . .") If anyone asked me what I thought of the performance, I was delighted to unload. But—and this is the vital point—I could never in conscience demand prior censorship on moral or any other grounds (short of the likelihood he might shoot up the audience).

To this, a conservative (like, I presume, the dean of Boston University's School of Public Communication) will reply, "Why don't you take your morals seriously?" I do, but I also have a haunting sense of fallibility and deep suspicion of obsequious piety.

One of the students at the school, commenting on the decision, said, "We have a chance to tell the entire country that we don't want a deceitful person to speak from a public platform. No one in America had a say in the pardon of Nixon, but this is our opportunity not to pardon Ziegler." I suppose it's uplifting to have students with such a prophetic afflatus, but this sinner's reaction is simply to gag.

Drive for Ratification:

1975 Viewed as Crucial Year For Equal Rights Amendment

The following is excerpted from "ERA: Ratifying Equality," by Carolyn J. Jacobson, in the January 1975 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

EQUALITY OF RIGHTS under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

This is the fundamental statement of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment, passed by an overwhelming vote in both houses of Congress in March 1972, but needing ratification from five more states before it becomes the 27th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Although the proposed amendment has until 1979 to be ratified, 1975 may be the crucial year. Historically, when the ratification of an amendment takes too long, its chances of success dwindle.

The pro-ERA groups have gained organizationally in recent months and as a result of the November elections, the political climate for ratification has brightened. All 17 state legislatures that have still not ratified the ERA will be meeting in 1975.

ERA supporters number more than 75 national organizations, including the AFL-CIO, the American Bar Association, the League of Women Voters, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Democratic and Republican Parties and every President of the United States since Eisenhower.

When the AFL-CIO endorsed the amendment at its 1973 convention, it urged all state federations in states that had not ratified the ERA to lobby their legislature to support it. The AFL-CIO came out in support of the ERA after court decisions made it clear that protective laws for women workers were being removed when tested against the equal employment section, Title VII, of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Thus labor's historic support of the protective laws—which it was instrumental in enacting in many states—had been rendered moot, and the federation endorsed ERA as a replacement for its previous case-by-case fight against discrimination.

Under the English common law, on which the U.S. legal system is based, women have had few rights and have undergone a long and hard struggle over the years to secure an equal legal status with men. It was not until 1920 that women won the right to vote. Although the 14th Amendment to the Constitution states a guarantee of "equal protection of the law," courts did not apply this protection universally to women.

Not until 1971 did the Supreme Court knock down a law which discriminated against women. In Reed v. Reed, the court nullified an Idaho law which favored men over women as administrators of estates, but it did not invalidate earlier decisions upholding sex discrimination cases under other laws. The court left to every woman plaintiff the burden of proving that government actions perpetuating discrimination are "unreasonable."

In May 1973, in Frontiero v. Richardson, relating to spouse's benefits in the armed services, the Supreme Court came closer to applying a constitutional basis for outlawing sex discrimination. Four justices held the opinion that sex, like race, was a "suspect classification" and should be subject to strict judicial review. But three justices held that categorizing sex as a suspect classification was unnecessary and premature since the state legislatures were currently considering the ERA.

Since the ERA's jurisdiction is restricted to government action, it is not applicaple to private employment. It would prohibit discrimination by the government as an employer, as in federal, state, county or city jobs. It would require equal pay for equal work for all government employes.

In finding that various state protective laws for women are discriminatory—incompatible with the 1964 Civil Rights Act's Title VII prohibition against sex discrimination in employment where sex is not a "bona fide occupational qualification"—the courts have ruled that these laws, originally enacted to prevent women from being exploited, actually were working against women. They were restricting employment opportunities by keeping women out of jobs which offered higher pay or advancement. In addition, to the extent that these laws provided actual protections, men have been arbitrarily denied benefits they need and deserve.

ALTHOUGH 33 STATES have ratified the ERA, two of them, Nebraska and Tennessee, rescinded their votes the following year. Debate continues as to whether this can be done legally. The Constitution empowers states only to ratify constitutional amendments; it says nothing about rescinding. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, refused to make a final decision on the question, calling it a "political" issue and referring it to Congress. (Note: Since this article was written North Dakota became the 34th state to ratify the amendment.)

Proponents of the Equal Rights Amendment are hoping that when four more states ratify, the momentum will grow and many more states than the required 38 will ratify, making the question of rescinding moot.

Passage of the ERA would represent political realism. It would acknowledge that equal rights for all is long overdue, for until now such equality has only been symbolic. The ERA will finally guarantee both men and women equal protection under one uniform legal system. The present dual system of justice is no justice at all.

As the AFL-CIO said in its 1973 convention resolution, the Equal Rights Amendment is "precisely the kind of clear statement of national commitment to the principle of equality of the sexes under the law that working women and their unions can use to advantage in their efforts to eliminate employment discrimination against women."

Influx of New Members:

Prospects for Consumer Bills Brighter in 94th Congress

CONSUMER BILLS that took a back seat to other issues in the last Congress will move faster this year with the influx of more "consumer-minded" members as a result of the 1974 elections, a union lobbyist predicted on Labor News Conference.

Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers said creation of an independent Consumer Protection Agency to ride herd on the various regulatory agencies charged with consumer area responsibilities is likely to win approval in the new Congress. She said that while there might be some risk of a veto as part of the White House budget-cutting effort, the cost argument just doesn't stand up and has never been a serious obstacle to the measure in Congress.

President Ford would be hard-pressed to "stand on a decision" that the Consumer Protection Agency would increase the federal deficit by very much, Miss Dubrow declared. She said the actual cost would be no more than "a drop in the bucket compared with other sections of the federal budget"—but the benefits to consumers would be great.

No-fault auto insurance is another long-sought consumer-protection measure that should move well in the new Congress, Miss Dubrow said. She noted the sharpest controversy over the issue has centered in the question of whether no-fault insurance should be a federal or state program, an issue that has to be "resolved by Congress."

Miss Dubrow scored the Administration for singling out for harsh budget-cutting those programs that are aimed at helping fixed-income citizens, low-wage workers and disadvantaged Americans, such as the now-aborted attempt to hike food stamp prices.

"They don't look with the same kind of eagle eye on the other agencies in the government as they do at teh agencies that service the poor, the low-income families, the minority groups," she declared.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OTHER DAY President Ford signed an order for a $1 increase in the import fee on a barrel of crude oil which is certain to be immensely costly to the American people.

He signed the document, acknowledging almost universal opposition to the move by noting that no one was asking for extra pens used for his signature.

Ford's attitude on this issue and on a number of other Administration policies may have reached the point of diminishing returns.

Take the President's record on vetoes. He has vetoed 10 bills, an astounding number for a President in office only since last August when Nixon resigned. Of the 10 vetoes, four were overridden by Congress. They involved better benefits for veterans, extension of the Rehabilitation of the Handicapped Act, Freedom of Information Act, and important improvements in the Railroad Retirement Act.

Of the vetoes that stuck, all six were pocket vetoes after the 93rd Congress died. The six involved tighter regulations on strip mining, a program for extension of nurse training, a flood control bill, a number of health program improvements, an effort by the Tennessee Valley Authority to hold down prices through deferring or offsetting pollution control costs, and a major maritime bill that would have countered the runaway ship problem by compelling the use of a percentage of American-flag ships to transport oil.

In virtually all cases, the President used the argument that the programs would cost more money.

Although Congress has overridden his vetoes every time it has had the opportunity, Ford is talking about more vetoes of bills that he doesn't like. He is doing this despite the fact that his vetoes are likely to face tougher fights in the new Congress.

In a recent press conference he was asked about his relations with Congress. He replied that he would have to be "pragmatic" and work with the Democratic leadership, yet he later said that he "would not hesitate to veto any additional spending programs or new programs that would cause new spending."

A PRESIDENT WHO TAKES such a position for the future is placed in a bind. Before the current session of Congress is out, there are certain to be "spending programs" that are new if only to combat unemployment. Is the President going to veto them all? Is he going to veto blindly without examining the needs for the "new spending programs?" Is he going to engage in a perpetual fight with a Congress that is trying to find solutions to mounting unemployment and a threatening full-blown depression?

Many of the Nixon vetoes were of the same stripe as the Ford vetoes. Nixon, for example, in 1973 vetoed disaster relief funds, continuation of Public Health hospitals, an increase in the minimum wage, the Older Americans Act, rural water and sewage grants and the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. Nixon even vetoed an Energy Emergency bill in March of 1974 and was sustained by the Senate 58 to 40. It was a veto that was prophetically described as meaning that oil prices would "go up, up and up," as they have.

Ford may be striving to reassert the power image of the presidency after the shattering it received during the Watergate scandal that drove Nixon to disgrace and resignation. It may also be that Congress, especially this new one, is determined to reassert its own power after a long period of the "imperial presidency." Nevertheless, vetoes as a technique of governing are self-defeating when they are used carelessly or as displays of stubborn power.

NO-FAULT INSURANCE and a Consumer Protection Agency are issues likely to get high billing in the "more consumer-minded Congress" that resulted from the 1974 elections, Ladies' Garment Workers Washington Rep. Evelyn Dubrow, center, said on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by John Reistrup, left, of the Washington Post and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

LATINO POLITICAL WORK is reviewed by the administrative committee of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, which undertook its first voter activities in the 1974 elections. The committee also mapped plans for LCLAA's first convention in April.

Latino Labor Council Maps Program for '75

Efforts to help labor's political activities and to solve the problem of illegal aliens were pledged by the administrative committee of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

The 14-member committee met in Washington, D.C., to finish mapping plans for its first national convention—to be held in Albuquerque, Apr. 10-13 — and adopt a 1975 program to be submitted to the convention.

Founded in November 1973, the LCLAA is designed to coordinate trade union activities in the Latin community in much the same fashion as the A. Philip Randolph Institute does among blacks.

The administrative committee heard a membership report indicating a growth from 50 members from 10 unions at its founding convention to 551 members in 25 chapters now organized in 12 states.

Voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives were conducted in the 1974 elections in 13 states with large concentrations of Latin-Americans. Communications Workers President Glenn Watts and COPE Director Al Barkan addressed the two-way committee meeting. Both praised the LCLAA's role in the 1974 elections as outstanding for a newly formed organization.

Kenneth Young, the AFL-CIO assistant legislative director, briefed the gathering on labor's overall legislative goals for 1975. The group appointed a special committee to draft a resolution for the April convention calling for legislation to strengthen curbs on illegal aliens who fill U.S. jobs at the expense of jobless citizens.

Manuel Fierro, executive director of the National Congress of Hispanic American Citizens (RASSO), also worked with the group on legislative proposals. The committee heard a presentation from the National Council of La Raza, which has already started a statistical profile of the Latino community similar to the one the LCLAA committee judged essential for future political activity.

Ray Mendoza of the Laborers, J. F. Otero of the Railway & Airline Clerks, Maria Portalatino of the Teachers, Franklin Gracia of the Clothing Workers and Maclovio Barraza of the Steelworkers make up the LCLAA executive board, with Mendoza serving as chairman and Paul Montemayor of the Steelworkers as executive director.

The administrative committee meeting included the board plus Aris Gonzalez of the Texas AFL-CIO, Chano Merino of the COPE field staff, Al Rodriguez of the Carpenters, Julius Ramirez of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Hank Lacayo of the Auto Workers.

Church Body, IUD Launch Safety Drive

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the United Church of Christ have begun work on a joint program aimed at reducing occupational health and safety hazards.

As a first step, some 40 representatives of church groups attended a joint conference at Airlie House in Warrenton, Va., where they received details of a proposed program and agreed to seek support from their various religious denominations.

The program, on which staff members of the IUD and the United Church Board for Homeland Ministries are working, includes alerting the religious community to occupational health problems, reaching unorganized workers, arranging demonstration projects, and legislative action.

IUD Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman told the conference that collaboration between labor and church organizations could help reverse a rising trend of deaths from occupationally related causes.

Among medical experts taking part in the discussions were Dr. Irving Selikoff, Mount Sinai School of Medicine; Dr. Samuel Epstein, Case-Western Reserve University; Dr. Norton Nelson, New York University; and Dr. David Rall, director of the National Institute for Environmental Health Sciences.

Labor representatives, besides Clayman, included Jack Sheehan of the Steelworkers, Anthony Mazzochi of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Angelo Cefalo of the Machinists, Louis Beliczky of the Rubber Workers, and Sheldon Samuels and Howard Hague of IUD.

Mrs. Murphy Confirmed For Labor Board Seat

The Senate has confirmed the appointment of Betty Southard Murphy to a five-year term on the National Labor Relations Board, and President Ford has already announced his intention to designate her as the NLRB chairman.

Mrs. Murphy, who once worked as an NLRB attorney, has been the Labor Dept.'s wage-hour administrator. She is a Republican and succeeds Edward B. Miller, the previous chairman, whose term expired in December.

Unions Send Drought Aid Via CARE

Labor contributions channelled through CARE are helping to drill desperately needed wells in drought-stricken areas of the world, AFL-CIO Vice President Lee W. Minton reports.

The complete cost of one water well is $1,500, including pipes, pumps, labor and machinery. Three international unions have each contributed a well while other labor contributions have been pooled to drill a total of seven wells, Minton said.

Minton, president emeritus of the Glass Bottle Blowers who also serves on the board of CARE, said that so far the wells have all been drilled in Africa, mainly in Niger.

In all, CARE's contributions in the past 12 months have been $109 million, with most of the emphasis on the famine-stricken areas of Africa and Asia.

CARE gifts are multiplied, Minton pointed out, by food and other commodities from the U.S. government and private U.S. food processors and by the involvement of local labor, suppliers and government contributions.

In addition to the drilling in drought areas, Minton also reported on labor involvement in such projects as housing construction in Bangladesh, hurricane relief in Honduras and children's nutritional programs in India, Colombia, Niger and other countries.

Goals Unmet:

Housing Hardest Hit By Economic Crisis

Housing construction—battered by inflation, recession, tight money and the industry's up-and-down cycles—is at its lowest ebb of the current decade.

The downswing of 1973-74 was the fifth and sharpest in the last 20 years, Henry B. Schechter writes in the January issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine. Housing starts dropped from 2.4 million in 1972 to an estimated 1.4 million last year.

The floor fell out, Schechter notes, as the Nixon Administration's suspension of subsidized housing programs coincided with a periodic cyclical downturn in the housing market.

Coupled with a decline in shipments of mobile homes, Schechter points out, the number of housing units produced in 1974 is well below basic national housing requirements. With the resulting shortages of housing in many localities, the upward pressures on home prices and rents are contributing to inflation.

Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, also points out that fewer American families can afford to buy homes at inflated prices and execessive interest rates because of the cost-to-income relationship.

In 1972, about one-third of the families were able to buy homes at the median price of $27,600, but in 1974 only one-fifth were able to buy a similar home selling from $35,500 to $36,900.

Using the rule of thumb that a family can afford to buy a home when the total housing expenses don't exceed 25 percent of its income, Schechter calculates that a family needed an annual income of $12,960 to buy a house at the median price of $27,600 in 1972. This is based on an FHA insured 30-year mortgage loan of $25,600 at 7 percent interest.

However by late 1974 when the median price had increased to $36,900 calling for a 30-year mortgage loan of $34,800 at 9 percent, the necessary annual income was up to $20,419, Schechter points out.

A major cause of more families being shut out of the housing market is the higher monthly principal and interest payment, which increased $102.50 from 1972 to 1974 for homes selling at the median price.

"If the interest rate had remained at 7 percent and only the house price and mortgage amount increased, the increase in the monthly principal and interest payment would have been only $51.55," he observes.

"The required annual income would then be $17,455, and an additional 7.5 percent of all families, or over 4 million additional families, could qualify to buy a median priced home."

During the first half of 1974, only 4 percent of the new homes on the housing market sold for under $20,000, while 71 percent sold for $30,000 and above, the article notes.

Opportunities for purchasing older homes for middle- and lower-income families are not good either.

"To buy a moderate priced existing home, with a $23,500 mortgage loan of 30 year maturity at an 8.5 or 9.5 percent interest rate would require an estimated income of roughly $13,000 to $14,000. About 55 to 60 percent of all families would not be able to afford such a house," Schechter asserts.

Because homes are beyond the economic reach of most American families, and the availability of rental units is limited, they are being forced to pay high rents.

Schechter notes that vacancies are limited because of a steep drop in rental housing production. In the first nine months of 1974, multi-family housing starts totaled 389,000, a 48 percent drop from the comparable 1973 period.

Shipments of mobile homes also have declined significantly in recent months, he observes. But here, too, financing costs are exorbitant —running from 12 to 14 percent.

"For a typical $8,000 mobile home loan with a 10-year maturity, the monthly loan payment would be $113 at 12 percent and $122 at 14 percent," Schechter points out.

"In addition, site rental in a mobile home park costs about $60 per month, utilities about $25 and insurance, maintenance and repair add an additional $15 per month in expenses. Total monthly payments, therefore will be in a range of $213 to $222 per month."

There is still a basic national need for the production of 2.6 million housing units annually, Schechter declares in citing goals established by Congress in 1968 that called for the production of 26 million units over a 10-year period.

But during periods of tight credit like the one that is now gripping the nation, he notes that housing bears a disproportionate share of the burden. What money is available flows largely to other sectors of the economy because of the present unregulated allocation of credit. A reordering of national priorities to assure an adequate supply of mortgage credit could ease the crisis, Schechter observes.

Stanley Ballard Retires, AFM Elects Emerson

Palm Beach, Fla.—Musicians Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard has retired after serving as an international officer of the union for 25 years, AFM President Hal C. Davis announced at the union's mid-winter executive board meeting here.

Ballard, who is leaving his post for health reasons, will be succeeded by J. Martin Emerson, secretary of the union's Washington, D.C., local. Emerson, a 45-year member of the AFM, was named to fill the secretary-treasurer's post by the board.

A number of other shifts in union officers and executives were announced by Davis, including the retirement of President-Emeritus James C. Petrillo as head of the union's civil rights department.

Petrillo, who will be 83 on Mar. 16, came out of retirement as president of the union in 1964 to direct AFM's civil rights department.

Ballard will continue to serve the union as a consultant in matters of foreign secretariats and civil rights and as a hearing officer in cases requiring hearings east of the Mississippi, Davis said.

Emerson was elected to the board of the Washington local in 1944 and became secretary in 1950. He has been a member of the AFM executive board since 1966.

Eugene Frey, president of the union's Cincinnati local and chairman of its law committee, was named to fill the vacancy on the executive board created by Ballard's resignation and Emerson's appointment to succeed him.

Ballard became secretary-treasurer in 1965. He had also served as editor of the Union's official journal. Before becoming secretary-treasurer, he served as secretary for six years. He had been a member of the executive board since 1950.

Drozak also is a vice president of the Texas AFL-CIO.

At Consumer Assembly:

Oil, Food Monopoly Called Key Factor in Price Surge

Overconcentration in such basic industries as food and energy is cheating Americans out of billions of dollars, two trade union officials told a national gathering of consumer leaders.

Speaking at the annual assembly of the Consumer Federation of America in Washington, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger decried the monopolistic practices of the giant oil companies which have pushed up the price of petroleum products.

James Wishart, research director for the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen, noted that similar monopolization in the food industry has driven prices to their highest levels on record.

Both joined other speakers in calling for more vigorous enforcement of federal antitrust laws.

Goldfinger charged that the seven biggest international petroleum firms control and manipulate the world's oil supply at the expense of the consumer.

"We are prisoners of the OPEC (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) cartel dominated by the Arabs, and these companies are their agents," Goldfinger declared. He identified the firms as Gulf, Mobil, British Petroleum, Royal Dutch Shell, Texaco, Standard of California and Exxon.

Besides controlling the world's oil supply, these same companies have become dominant in other energy areas, such as shale oil and nuclear power, and their controlling influence there is increasing, Goldfinger warned.

Earlier, Federal Energy Administrator Frank Zarb outlined the Ford Administration's energy program, which Goldfinger termed "a monstrous rip-off of the American people."

Goldfinger said the President's plan would deepen the current recession, increase unemployment and add to inflationary pressures in the economy.

He said Zarb tried to "put the best face on" Ford's energy proposals, but the truth is the Administration program would cost American consumers more money for everything produced from or related to oil—fertilizers, food, transportation and a host of other goods and services.

Describing the President's plan as a "Rube Goldberg monstrosity" so complicated it is impossible to calculate its exact cost, Goldfinger noted that a study by the economics department of the Library of Congress nonetheless gave it a price tag of $50.3 billion.

"We in the AFL-CIO estimate it's going to cost $55 billion, and that's before the ripple effects spread through the economy," he said.

Goldfinger urged the assembly delegates to contact members of Congress and press for defeat of the Ford plan. In its stead, a consumer-oriented energy program based on proposals adopted last month by the AFL-CIO's General Board should be advanced, he said.

On the same panel with Zarb and Goldfinger, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) observed that "evidence of inadequate competition in the gas and oil industries is plentiful." He cited studies by the Federal Trade Commission showing vertical integration in the energy field among the 14 top producers.

"Monopoly exists in the oil industry," he said. "And the trend toward concentration of energy holdings among a few companies is increasing."

The Democratic congressman said he favors a comprehensive divestiture plan for the oil and related industries where overconcentration exists.

Members of the panel on energy were introduced by Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

In his remarks on inadequate competition in the food industry, Wishart noted that 17 major food chains reported a 94 percent rise in profits over the first nine months of 1974. The profits climb followed gains in 1973 that were "by no means minimal" and came even as farm prices were falling, Wishart said.

Wishart and other speakers accused the middlemen — the big food chains and processing companies—of failing to pass on to consumers the decline in farm prices. Instead, they racked up huge profits, he charged.

"Economists say that when four companies control over 50 percent of a market, an oligopoly exists," Sen. Jim Abourezk (D-S.D.) told the assembly. "In the food industry, four firms control 90 percent of the breakfast cereals, 75 percent of the bread and prepared flour, 56 percent of processed meats, 65 percent of sugar, 80 percent of canned goods and 90 percent of soups."

Abourezk called for a coalition of consumers and farmers to stop the growth of monopolies and oligopolies "whose only interest in our two most basic resources—people and food—is filling corporate coffers with ever more inflated profits."

The two-day meeting was the first time consumer activists and farm leaders had formally met at a national forum to explore mutual problems.

Carole Tucker Foreman, CFA's executive director, noted that the two groups, though not in agreement on all issues, shared an identity on many consumer interests. One area of agreement, she said, was the need for strong antitrust action to break the stranglehold large corporations have on farmer and consumer alike.

The need for greater communication between farmers and consumers was stressed by several speakers, starting with keynoter Gov. Patrick J. Lucey of Wisconsin.

"I have always been puzzled when I hear people say that the farmer and consumer are natural enemies," Lucey noted. "It has always seemed to me that in fact both have suffered much greater harm from large corporate and government interests."

Others addressing the gathering were consumer advocate Ralph Nader, Rep. Morris Udall (D-Ariz.) and Vice President Pat Greathouse of the Auto Workers. Gordon Cole, editor of the Machinist, the IAM's weekly newspaper, was chairman of the two-day meeting.

Ellen Hoats, executive director of the New York Consumer Assembly, was elected president of CFA. She succeeds George Myers of the Credit Union National Association.

Consumer Federation of America is the largest national organization of consumer-oriented groups, and includes many state, local and national unions and central labor bodies.

Abel Cites Job Dividend From Basic Steel Pact

The historic 1973 agreement in basic steel is an "unchallenged success" that has saved jobs, buying power and communities, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel told a Washington press conference.

Pointing out that steel production has held up during the current recession, Abel said the United States is importing about 4 million fewer tons "than we used to and we are exporting about 3½ million tons more than we used to."

All in all, he said "it's a record we can be proud of."

Abel's comments came in response to questions and in remarks broadly surveying his 10 years as president of the USWA. Looking back to 1965 he noted that the union was a "dispirited organization" with a membership that had dropped nearly 200,000 in the previous 10 years and a union treasury that "was leaking badly."

Today, he stressed, there is a membership of more than 1.3 million members, an increase in general treasury funds of 50 percent to nearly $30 million and a fivefold growth in net worth.

Detailing changes in the union's structure to broaden decision-making powers, Abel said that the most important factor, perhaps, was the union's collective bargaining record in leading the way in wage and benefit gains.

The 1973 Experimental Negotiating Agreement in basic steel reduced the need for tremendous stockpiling of inventory and of accelerated imports in anticipation of possible strikes and justified "our faith in the fact and the feeling that we have found a 'better way,'" Abel said.

And the USWA has not given up the right to strike, he emphasized. "Where conditions warrant, we strike."

Other factors contributing to the stable conditions in the industry, Abel said, were the support for a system of "fair trade" international voluntary quotas for steel and joint productivity efforts that have eliminated waste and unnecessary costs.

Abel made the point also that democracy is "alive and well" in the union with a "lot of turnover of officers" at the district and local levels. About one-third of local officers are replaced at each election, he said, and in the last 10 years, covering a span of three elections, there have been contests in 19 of the 24 districts.

Pilots Name Pike As General Manager

President J. J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots announced appointment of Howard W. Pike as general manager of the union. Pike will be responsible for ALPA's financial operation as well as its headquarters staff support in Washington. He joined the Air Line Pilots in 1971.

AMERICAN WORKERS were represented at an International Labor Organization conference in Geneva by Bricklayers President Thomas F. Murphy, left, and Woodworkers President Keith Johnson. It dealt with technological and social problems in woodworking industries.

Meeting Spurs ILO Role In Woodworking Trades

Geneva—Trade union leaders won the support of employers and governments at the International Labor Organization for stepped-up ILO activities to meet the social and technological problems of the woodworking industries.

The call was sounded by President Keith Johnson of the Woodworkers when he told a 21-nation ILO conference that it was a "matter of utmost urgency" that the United Nations agency give "priority consideration" to establishing a permanent committee on the woodworking industries.

Johnson and President Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers formed the AFL-CIO team that spoke for American labor at the two-week technical meeting on these industries.

The worker delegates elected Johnson as their chairman and designated Murphy to represent them on the key steering committee that charted the conference's program and meetings.

In response to the workers' demands the conference unanimously adopted a resolution urging the ILO executive council to establish a standing industrial committee for the woodworking industries.

Such a committee is needed, the resolution said, because of the "steadily increasing" importance of these industries the world over. It urged that the proposed committee meet at "sufficiently short" intervals to be able to keep pace with developments and deal with "new technological and social problems." Specifically, it said the committee should address itself to on-the-job protection of the safety and health of workers and policies designed to secure full employment.

The emphasis on employment was on the creation of jobs in the woodworking industries of the developing countries. Although these industries should seek to keep down production costs, wages "should be fair and not fall short of those in manufacturing generally," it was stressed.

The conference saw no reason why the development of exports by the woodworking industries of the developing countries should hurt employment in the already industrialized nations.

However, it was agreed that the situation should be kept under ILO review because it would be "undesirable for the creation of employment in some parts of the world to lead to the creation of unemployment in others."

On training, the worker delegates urged that the ILO give more attention to research on education problems and make maximum use of modern training technology through the employment of audio visual aids and similar techniques.

Unions Warned On Extremists' 'Press' Ploy

All AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies have been warned against issuing press credentials to the so-called U.S. Labor Party, whose representatives gain entry to disrupt labor gatherings.

AFL-CIO Public Relations Director Albert J. Zack wrote to all affiliates recounting the group's tactics and pseudonyms. While the AFL-CIO continues to admit legitimate press, Zack said, it was forced to ban U.S. Labor Party representatives from the recent General Board meeting.

Several of the names the group uses to gain press credentials are deliberately designed to be confused with legitimate organizations, Zack said. The Auto Workers have filed suit to stop the group from using the name "New Solidarity" for its newspaper in an attempt to confuse it with the UAW publication.

Similarly, Zack said the legitimate International Press Service of Washington, D.C., has been embarrassed by the group's use of the same name. Members of the extremist group have also been known to use the names of bona fide reporters in telephone calls seeking information from union officials.

In addition to "New Solidarity" and "International Press Service," the group has been known to use such names as "Campaigner Publications," the "National Caucus of Labor Committees," the "New Solidarity International Press Service," "National Unemployed and Welfare Rights Organization," and "North American Labor Party."

Van Arsdale Appointed To Bicentennial Panel

Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York City AFL-CIO, was appointed by President Ford to the American Revolution Bicentennial Advisory Council.

The 25-member council will advise the administrator of the American Revolution Bicentennial Administration on matters relating to the observance of the nation's 200th anniversary.

Orders Enforcement:

Court Rejects Delay In Vinyl Standards

New York—A three-member federal appeals court panel has turned down an industry attempt to stop enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's rules on workers' exposure to vinyl chloride.

The court's consideration of the case has already amounted to an effective 90-day delay in the enforcement of the new standards. The decision, handed down Feb. 1, gave employers 60 days to comply. The OSHA standard was supposed to be effective Jan. 1.

Spokesmen for the Society of the Plastics Industry were uncertain whether the decision would be appealed to the full U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

The OSHA standard calls for reduction of vinyl chloride exposure to 1 part per million parts of air (1 ppm). That standard was issued by OSHA in October 1974, with an immediate reduction to 50 ppm ordered at that time. As recently as April 1974, exposures of 500 ppm were allowed.

The judges noted that "we are dealing here with human lives and the record reveals that 11 manufacturing plant workers and two fabrication plant workers have already died from the effects of this potent chemical."

Those deaths, from a rare liver cancer called angiosarcoma, touched off the reduction in exposure levels enacted in 1974.

In response to the company contention that it was "infeasible" to meet the Jan. 1 effective date, the court said the companies "need more faith in their own technological potentialities," noting that it took plastics companies only a matter of weeks to conform to the intermediate stanrard of 50 ppm.

The industry had also argued that the order on the new standard was "too vague" to be complied with, but the court said it found the "directions are clear, definite and certain and they are also entirely feasible, since the goal of the lowest detectable level can definitely be attained through the combination of technological means and respirators."

The use of respirators is currently optional for workers exposed in excess of 25 ppm, but would be mandatory at any exposure level after Jan. 1, 1976, under current OSHA requirements.

After the requirements were posted last October, the companies filed suit to stop their enforcement almost immediately. The AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. filed as intervenors in November, and in December the judges issued a temporary stay on enforcement until they could study the case.

Retired Supreme Court Justice Tom Clark wrote the unanimous decision. Frederick van Pelt Bryan and Kevin T. Duffy were the other two judges.

The new OSHA rules affect an estimated 6,500 workers in vinyl chloride production and 350,000 others in plastics fabricating.

State Jobs Conferences Urged to Spur Program

American workers and, at the same time, make elected officials and the general public even more aware of the crisis facing the unemployed."

The AFL-CIO General Board meeting, which was open to the press, began with factual reports on the economic situation in each industry. The state meetings are expected to follow a similar format.

The federation's eight regional directors will assist the state central bodies in organizing their conferences. The Action Program, which is national policy, has several aspects that require state implementation.

For example, statewide emergency conferences are designed to:

- Draw attention to the millions of dollars in federal funds for highway, housing, water and waste-treatment facilities and other state and local projects that are impounded by presidential order.
- Persuade governors and mayors to work with labor in demanding the immediate release of such impounded funds.
- Insure that state and local officials fully implement public-service jobs programs for the unemployed.

As part of its program, the General Board called on local central labor bodies to enlist, through their community services programs, the aid of government, voluntary and private agencies to help speed the handling of applications, complaints and special needs of the unemployed.

State federations were urged to expand efforts to inform newly-covered jobless workers of unemployment insurance benefits available to them and to prod state employment security offices to provide better services for the jobless. Local central bodies have been urged to use union halls as emergency centers for processing claims to reduce the long lines at overloaded employment service offices.

The General Board also urged central bodies to work with the Human Resources Development Institute in developing jobs and providing counseling.

In their letter urging the state emergency conferences, Meany and Kirkland concluded:

"There is only one real solution to unemployment and that is jobs —real jobs at decent rates of pay —and these can only be provided in a healthy economy. Statewide AFL-CIO conferences will be an excellent forum to bring that message to our members, the general public and elected officials all across America."

Food Stamp Cost Boost Knocked Out

would increase consumer costs, particularly in the Northeast where oil imports are important for heating requirements.

The House Rules Committee had separated the measure from a "must" bill to raise the debt limit ceiling. Originally, the Ways & Means Committee had tied the two together in an effort to avoid a veto.

Republican leaders had sought to keep the margin of passage below the two-thirds needed to override a veto. But the House vote was 27 above the two-thirds mark.

After a Lincoln's Birthday recess, the House is expected later this month to act on a tax cut bill that the Ways & Means Committee was putting in final shape.

Its initial decisions pointed to a permanent tax cut for low-income individuals and families, with some benefits for middle-income taxpayers who take the standard deduction. A one-time tax rebate plan, in contrast with Ford's proposal, would phase out at the higher income levels instead of increasing.

There was less uniformity among Democrats on the details of the tax legislation and the committee rejected a proposal to repeal the oil depletion tax allowance as part of the tax cut bill.

The Senate decided not to take a recess during the traditional mid-February period of political speeches and fund-raisers.

It still has before it a decision on the biennial attempt to change the Senate rules so as to make it earier to halt a filibuster.

34th State Ratifies Equal Rights Plank

Bismarck, N.D. — North Dakota became the 34th state to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution, which would nullify laws that deal unequally with men and women.

The labor-supported amendment will become part of the Constitution when it is ratified by three-fourths of the states, or 38.

North Dakota's House of Representatives voted 52-49 for ratification. Earlier, the state Senate had approved ratification, 28-22.

Labor Endorses Move To Ease Credit Supply

Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), chairman of the full Banking & Currency Committee, would also direct the Fed to allocate credit toward national priority uses, including low- and middle-income housing, state and local governments, farms and small businesses.

"Such allocation, according to priority uses and away from non-productive speculative investments, would have avoided the discriminatory method of credit allocation that America has experienced in the last 20 years," Biemiller noted.

"That method has been to rely upon a tight general monetary policy and high interest rates to allocate funds when they were in short supply," he said. The result has been an allocation of funds away from housing and in favor of speculative, high-risk, high-interest rate investments.

By repeatedly following this policy, Biemiller said, the Executive and Legislative Branches have permitted, and the Fed has mandated, an allocation of credit that has caused deep declines in home-building and curtailments in state, local and utility plant construction.

"And every time, marked declines in construction have been followed by economic recession," he noted.

Recognizing that the Federal Reserve Board would face "technical difficulties" in achieving an exact target percentage rate of growth in the money supply—"especially after they have brought the economy to the brink of disaster" —Biemiller called upon Congress to exercise more influence over monetary policies.

He urged enactment of measures to make the Fed more responsive to the people and their representatives. To this end, the AFL-CIO statement proposed amendments to the Reuss bill that would:

- Allow for representation of consumers, farmers and labor, as well as banking and industry, on the Federal Reserve Board.
- Make the board chairman's term four years and concurrent with that of the President who appoints him.
- Subject the board's operations to auditing by the General Accounting Office, an arm of Congress.

With several other lanuage-strengthening recommendations, Biemiller said the amended bill would greatly help in furthering stable economic growth.

TWUA Seeks 'Stamp Plan' For Clothing

Atlanta — The Textile Workers Union of America has called on the Ford Administration and Congress to expand the federal stamp program to make clothing available at low prices to the unemployed and the working poor.

A resolution adopted by the TWUA executive council pointed out that the federal stamp program already enables the nation's poor to purchase food products at significant discounts.

"Clothing also is a major necessity of life," the TWUA statement declared. "In our view the federal stamp program should be expanded as soon as possible to make apparel, as well as food, available to poverty-stricken people at low prices.

"With unemployment compensation benefits proving grossly inadequate in this period of runaway inflation, misery and hardship are on the rise. This critical situation calls for supplementary measures," the council said.

TWUA President Sol Stetin said a clothing stamp program would serve another valuable purpose.

"The textile-apparel industry is in the doldrums. The result is general layoffs and a constantly increasing number of plant closings and liquidations which are contributing to the national recession. A clothing program would help to move surplus products to market and start looms and sewing machines humming once more in textile and garment factories," Stetin said.

Driscoll to Head Construction Panel

New York City contractor Fred Driscoll, Jr., has been named chairman of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board for the construction industry.

Driscoll, 45, succeeds William J. Cour, who died last August. The panel is made up of four members each from labor and management.

He has served as chairman of several contractors' groups in his native New York and previously served on the national disputes panel in 1969 and 1970.

New Jump in Jobessness Deepens Economic Crisis

Fast Action On Tax Cut Called Vital

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President George Meany called for quick passage of a $20 billion tax cut and asked the House not to encumber the anti-recession bill with controversial amendments.

Even though labor wants the oil depletion allowance repealed, Meany said, it would be "a serious mistake" to try to close that loophole through an amendment to the emergency tax cut bill approved by the Ways & Means Committee.

If the House adopted such an amendment, Meany warned, it would "almost certainly lead to a filibuster in the Senate" and "delay getting the tax cut into the hands of consumers."

He stressed that the tax rebate and cut "must be passed as quickly as possible" to stimulate the economy and generate jobs. But "as soon as the emergency tax package is passed, the Ways & Means Committee should begin work on comprehensive tax reform, with repeal of the oil depletion allowance a 'must' item."

Meany's letter, sent to all House members, termed the Ways & Means tax package "a substantial improvement" upon President Ford's proposal.

While Ford's plan would have given the biggest tax rebates to the affluent, Meany noted that the committee bill would increase the buying power of low- and middle-income families, "thus greatly stimulating the economy." He termed such a stimulus "of overriding importance."

The Ways & Means Committee agreed on a two-part tax cut package before the House took a 10-day recess, but held up formal approval of the bill until the staff could work out the technicalities.

The first step would be an $8 billion tax rebate this spring, with most persons entitled to 10 percent of their 1974 tax payment up to a maximum of $200. Persons with incomes over $20,000 would receive a smaller rebate, dropping to a minimum of about $100 at the $30,000 level. At the bottom of the scale the minimum tax rebate would be $100 or the total amount of taxes paid on 1974 income, whichever was smaller.

By contrast, Ford's rebate plan would have given the bulk of refunds to those with higher incomes, with the top of $1,000 going to persons with incomes over about $41,000.

An additional $8.4 billion in tax cuts on 1975 income would be

Aerospace Holdout Hit By Strike

St. Louis—About 12,000 Machinists at the McDonnell Douglas Corp. plant here and another 7,000 at the aerospace firm's facilities in California struck after negotiations for a new contract broke down. A unit of 200 others has struck the firm's Cape Canaveral, Fla., facility.

The workers here are represented by District 837. Those in California are members of IAM District 720. Each district is negotiating separately.

Cosimo (Gus) Troia, president and business manager for District 837, charged that the walkout was provoked by the company's refusal to bargain. He described McDonnell Douglas's latest offer as a "takeaway proposal."

The union is asking for a 5.5 percent wage increase and total cost-of-living protection immediately, plus 3 percent in each of the next two years. That is in line with settlements reached last fall with other major aerospace companies, including Boeing, Lockheed and United Aircraft.

McDonnell Douglas's first offer amounted to nothing the first year, a 2 percent increase the second year and 2 percent the third year, plus a cut in the cost of living setup, the union reported.

Facing a strike threat, the company came up with a revised proposal that included increases of 16 cents the first year, 3 percent the second year and 3 percent the third year.

Troia said the union's bargaining committee voted unanimously to reject that proposal. The negotia-

NATION'S ECONOMIC WOES and organized labor's programs for recovery are detailed by AFL-CIO President George Meany in response to questions from reporters on the CBS network TV program, "Face the Nation."

Meany Sees 8.2% Rate As Tragedy

By James M. Shevis

The United States is sliding into a depression, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned as the January jobless rate soared a full percentage point over the previous month to 8.2 percent, the highest unemployment level the nation has seen since 1941.

"We're past the recession stage," Meany declared, adding that "the problem is getting worse every day.

Meany's reaction to the latest surge in joblessness came in a nationwide television interview (CBS's "Face the Nation") in which he predicted that unemployment may go as high as 10 percent by July.

In a statement earlier, Meany declared the January increase and the new unemployment level "spell tragedy for American families and disaster for the American economy."

"Nothing the President or the Congress has done to date will put America back to work and ensure economic stability," he charged.

Unemployment last month totaled 7,529,000, an increase of 928,000 from December. Not since December 1953, when the country was in another economic downturn, has the jobless rate increased in a single month by as much as it did in January.

Last month's 8.2 percent unemployment level was three full percentage points above the year-earlier rate, and even Administration economists acknowledge that it will climb even higher. Alan Greenspan, chairman of President Ford's Council of Economic Advisers, told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress recently

'Way of Life' at Stake:

Congress, Ford Hit For Lack of Urgency

The country is fighting "a war to preserve our way of life," AFL-CIO President George Meany told a nationwide television audience, yet neither the White House nor Congress understands the gravity of the situation.

Meany said he sees no hope in the programs or philosophy of either President Ford or Chairman Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve Board to end the inflationary recession gripping the economy.

And "what's happening over in Congress is disappointing," he noted. "The problem is much worse now than when Congress met six weeks ago, and it's getting worse all the time."

Meany told a panel of interviewers on CBS's "Face the Nation" that the country's economic afflictions require more action and initiative by the federal government than has been shown to date.

He called for 1 million public service jobs, a $2 billion accelerated public works program, a reduction in home mortgage interest rates, and release of $19 billion of presidentially impounded funds, among other proposals, to get the economy moving again.

Meany chastised Congress for its delay in enacting a tax reduction bill.

"We're in an emergency," he said, "and I don't think the members of Congress realize the dimensions of the problem we have." He said he is worried that "it'll be months before we get this relief that we need."

The federation president said the housing construction industry could be revived if Congress were to enact a measure making 6 percent mortgage loans available to prospective homebuyers, and he assailed Burns for pursuing a tight-money, high-interest policy in the past.

"What we've been through here in the last five years is Arthur Burns's plan," Meany said. "It's his blueprint. He's the architect, and he is still running the show. He doesn't understand people.

"All he understands is his economic theories, and they are completely out of date." Burns, he said, is "a national disaster."

Social Security Held 'Sound and Durable'

A bipartisan group that includes five former Cabinet members defended the social security system against a new wave of "destructive" criticism.

It issued a "white paper," affirming that the system remains "sound and durable." Signers included all three former social security commissioners.

The group emphasized the desirability of continued public debate on methods of financing the program and the equity and adequacy of its benefit and tax structures. In fact, some differences on future financing emerged during a news conference held by the authors of the statement.

But the "white paper" sharply contradicted some recent newspaper and magazine articles that have portrayed the social security system as "bankrupt" or "a deception foisted on the American people."

Joining in defense of the system were these former Secretaries of Health, Education & Welfare: Arthur Flemming, who served in the Eisenhower Administration; Wilbur J. Cohen and John W. Gardner, who held office under President Johnson, and Robert Finch and Elliot L. Richardson from the Nixon Administration. The former social security commissioners who

Crafts Slate Conference To Spur Jobs Programs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A "crisis" conference to deal with "massive unemployment" in the construction industry has been called by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. for Apr. 14 in Washington.

Department President Robert A. Georgine said that about 3,000 representatives of building and construction tradesmen from across the nation will attend to:

- Develop an action program and bring directly to the attention of Congress and the Executive Branch the severity of the unemployment crisis.
- Advise building tradesmen of immediate steps they can take to improve their own situation in terms of unemployment compensation, food stamps and other methods of aiding the unemployed.

At a press conference announcing the action of the BCTD executive council in authorizing the conference, Georgine cited the severe impact of unemployment in a tors considered it so inadequate that they would not submit it to the membership.

Picket lines went up at the giant aerospace firm about shortly after midnight Feb 10. Strike preparations began seven days earlier when Troia notified the company of the union's intention to walk out unless management made a sincere effort at collective bargaining. The seven day notice of intention to strike was required under the union's previous contract.

Among fringe benefits being sought are fully paid health and welfare services, including dental care and a vision care setup that follows the National Vision Institute program.

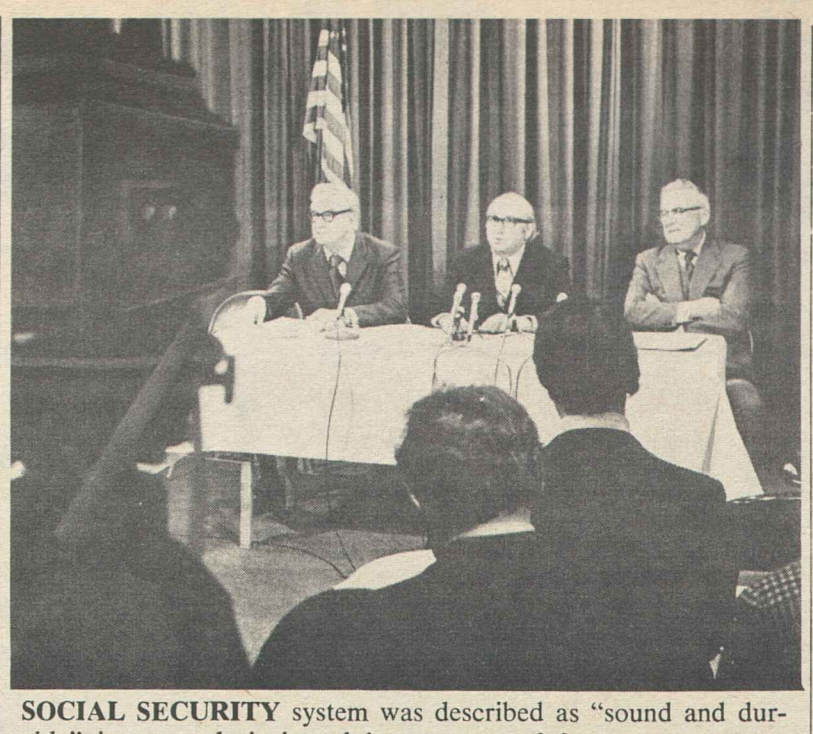
The company's request for cost of living cutbacks included a proposal to change the base. The current cost of living package is based on 1957-59 equals 100 and provides a one-cent hourly increase for every increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in the cost of living.

The company wants to change the base period to 1967 with no immediate increase until May. It also proposes a cut in the second and third shift bonuses and no improvement in the number of holidays and other fringes.

Troia said there would be no problem in negotiating any part of the contract if the company meets with the union and bargains in good faith.

The machinists said its members at West Coast installations of the company voted by a 77 percent margin to strike. Auto Workers' contracts at other California plants of McDonnell Douglas expired last September.

Eighteen F-4 Phantoms and three F-15 Eagles, military jet aircraft, are manufactured here monthly. Troia predicted a shut down in production of the fighter planes would occur swiftly.



SOCIAL SECURITY system was described as "sound and durable" in an analysis issued by a group of former government officials. Answering questions at a Capitol Hill news conference are, from left, former Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball, former Health, Education & Welfare Secretary Wilbur Cohen, and former Social Security Commissioner William Mitchell.

Appeals Court Upholds Contract Seniority Rules

Philadelphia—A three-judge federal appeals court here ruled that a company can't violate seniority provisions of its union contract in order to keep the percentage of women and minority group workers from dropping below targets established in an agreement with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

It was the latest in a series of appellate court rulings that have generally refused to tamper with the basic seniority principle that the worker with the longest service will be the last put on layoff. In general, steps to overcome the effects of past discrimination have been limited to hiring and promotion opportunities.

All aspects of the controversy have not been firmly settled, however, and at least one case is awaiting review by the Supreme Court.

In the most recent case, the three-judge panel from the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals overturned an order issued by a federal district judge in New Jersey.

The Jersey Central Power & Light Co., professing neutrality on the issue but seeking to avoid costly lawsuits, asked the federal court last fall to determine its legal obligations in carrying out a reduction in its workforce.

Locals of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers argued the layoffs should be in reverse order of seniority, with the usual bumping rights when higher-level jobs are eliminated.

But the lower court ruled that an affirmative action agreement signed by the company and the unions, although it didn't deal with seniority after hiring, barred any regression in the effort to increase the minority ratio in employment. It said the seniority principle in layoffs had to be modified so that the percentage of women and minorities would not be reduced.

The unanimous appellate court rejected this conclusion.

It held that there was no conflict between the affirmative action hiring and promotion agreement and the contract provisions dealing with layoffs. The EEOC agreement, in fact, specified that the collective bargaining agreement was to cover "wages, benefits, other conditions of employment and seniority date" of the minority workers hired.

The opinion, written by Judge Leonard Garth, stressed that the agreement with the EEOC "sought an increase in the proportion of female and minority group workers by 'hires' and not by 'fires.' "

System 'Sound, Durable':

Panel Hits Critics Of Social Security

signed the report are Robert M. Ball, William L. Mitchell and Charles I. Schottland.

They described as "most vicious" the efforts of some critics to raise doubt as to whether the worker who pays a social security tax on his current wage will ever receive benefits when he retires many years from now.

The document stressed that payment of earned social security benefits is required by law and enforceable in court. It found it "inconceivable" that some future Congress would vote to repudiate this compact between the people and their government.

Complaints that social security is not truly "insurance" because the funds come from a payroll tax and not a premium deal with semantics, not substance, the paper suggested. While social insurance differs from private insurance, "it embodies the central element of financial protection against defined hazards, through a pooling of contributions and a sharing of risks, with benefits payable as a matter of legal right."

As for the adequacy of the social security trust funds, the paper notes that currently the amount the program takes in and the amount it pays out in benefits is approximately equal. Unlike a private program, there is no danger that the government will go out of business and not be able to tap a future workforce for continued funding of the program.

The document does acknowledge the need to deal with short-term financing problems resulting from the current inflation and the future impact on the system of lowered birth rates which will in time result in fewer persons of working age financing the retirement of a larger group of older persons.

The report notes that the funding problem over the next 25 years is "easily manageable." And while additional financing will be needed, there will be offsetting factors in the future. Thus, if the burden of supporting older people is increased, the burden of supporting and educating children will be reduced. And with smaller families, more women will be able to work.

A repeated charge that a worker could do better by privately investing the amount of his social security payroll tax just isn't so. the document contends, unless the proposal is made that the money should be invested in speculative investments such as stocks whose value can go down as well as up.

It concludes that "the individual under the social security system receives better value from the government than he could obtain elsewhere."

The report explores also legitimate questions that have been raised dealing with the retirement test and whether the tax and benefit structure is sufficiently "progressive."

While the authors of the report do not advocate such measures as paying full benefits to persons who continue to work beyond 65 because of the substantial additional cost, they point out that the social security system is flexible enough to accommodate change.

"Abolition of the retirement test would aggravate somewhat the problem of financing," but it would "have no bearing on the soundness or durability of the social security system," the report notes.

But the authors were insistent that benefits under social security must continue to be paid as an earned right and not as a form of charity for the needy.

The social security system is designed "to prevent poverty from occurring," the report stressed.

Biemiller Appointed To Oil Advisory Body

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller is one of 22 new members added to the National Petroleum Council in what Interior Dept. officials termed an effort to bring consumer and environmental representation to the advisory body. The 155-member council in the past has been made up largely of oil industry representatives.

Paul Phillips Dies, Led Paperworkers' Merger

Flushing, N.Y.—Paul L. Phillips, a former vice president of the AFL-CIO and a long-time trade union official in the paper industry, died Feb. 6 at Leesburg, Fla.

Phillips, 70, had been president of the Papermakers, an AFL affiliate, when it merged with the CIO-affiliated Paperworkers in 1957. He continued to head the merged United Papermakers & Paperworkers until he resigned for health reasons in 1968. The UPP merged with the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers in 1972 to form the United Paperworkers.

Phillips served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council from 1957 until his retirement in 1969.

In a message to President Joseph P. Tonelli of the Paperworkers, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland cited Phillips's role as a trade union leader in the paper industry.

"His contributions as a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and as an architect of the unity that culminated in the merger of the paper unions will never be forgotten," Meany and Kirkland said.

Phillips helped organize a local of the Papermakers in 1932 in Camden, Ark. He served as president of the local until 1937 when he joined the union's staff as an international representative. He was elected second vice president in 1942, first vice president in 1944 and president of the union in 1948.

Phillips's efforts were instrumental in bringing together the Papermakers and Paperworkers that led to the 1957 merger, the first to take place between former AFL and CIO unions.

Tonelli said Phillips was a great labor statesman who "served the members of his union over 20 years as president with dedication and devotion that few could equal. His death leaves a void which can never be filled."

Phillips had served on a number of AFL-CIO committees and governmental panels. He also was a vice president of the Industrial Union Dept.

He was born in Strong, Ark., in 1904 and attended Arkansas A&M College and Louisiana Polytechnic Institute. He left college during the depression to work as a sawmill hand, an oil field worker and a railroad clerk before becoming a pulp mill operator in Camden.

He is survived by one son and a daughter. Memorial services were held in Camden and in Voorheesville, N.Y., where he had lived before moving to Florida recently.

JOHN T. DUNLOP

Ford Slates John Dunlop To Be Labor Secretary

President Ford has announced his intention to nominate John T. Dunlop to succeed Peter J. Brennan as Secretary of Labor.

Brennan's resignation, after two years in office, will be effective in mid-March. Brennan told reporters that he had declined an offer of appointment as ambassador to Ireland and planned to return to New York. He had been head of the city and state Building & Construction Trades councils when former President Nixon named him to the Cabinet.

Dunlop, a Harvard University economics professor, was director of the Cost of Living Council during the final period of wage-price controls and also served as chairman of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee. In the CISC post, he won plaudits from both labor and management for a practical approach based on knowledge of the industry.

Currently, Dunlop is impartial arbitrator to resolve any jurisdiction disputes that arise in the construction of the Alaska pipeline. He has in the past had major roles in settling disputes in industries as diverse as coal, railroads, atomic energy, missile sites, steel and airlines.

Dunlop, 60, has been on the Harvard faculty since 1938 and has been chairman of its economics department and dean of the faculty of arts and sciences.

AFL-CIO President George Meany noted in a television interview that he has known Dunlop for some 25 years "and I've never had any problem getting along with him." As for his appointment to the Cabinet, Meany doesn't consider Dunlop a political figure and doesn't anticipate any problems in their relationship.

The Labor Dept. will also be losing its Number 2 official, Under Sec. Richard F. Schubert, who announced that he will be returning to the Bethlehem Steel Corp. Schubert had formerly been the department's solicitor.

Reform Bill Next:

pumped into the economy through lowered withholding taxes. The bulk of the funds here would go to persons with lower incomes and to middle-income taxpayers who take the standard deduction rather than itemize their expenses. It could include cash payments of up to $200 for those with poverty-level earnings, too little to benefit from a tax reduction.

Business and industry would benefit from a $3.8 billion tax reduction, mostly through an increase in the investment tax credit from the present 7 percent to 10 percent and a modification in the corporate tax structure.

The committee bill would pump into the spending stream about $4 billion more than Ford had proposed in tax cuts and rebates for individuals. Business would get about $200 million less than the President had proposed.

Still to be fought out is whether the 1975 reductions will be swallowed up by higher fuel costs resulting from Ford's imposition of a stiff tariff on imported oil and his call for a comparable tax on domestic fuel. The Administration conceded that the cost of living would shoot up 2 percent under the President's plan.

The Senate Finance Committee voted 11-2 approval of a House-passed bill that would rescind the $1-a-barrel tax on imported oil that Ford imposed Feb. 1, and block for 90 days the President's declared intent to raise the special tariff to $2 on Mar. 1 and to $3 on Apr. 1.

The bill passed the House 309-114 on Feb. 5, a margin greater than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a threatened presidential veto. In a reversal of the usual coalition pattern, only 16 Democrats broke with their party to support the President's position, while 42 Republicans joined 267 Democrats in opposing the Administration.

There had been some concern that a Senate filibuster would block action while the President continued his efforts to drum up support in his battle against a supposedly "do-nothing" Congress. But later "readings" of Senate sentiment indicated that the bill was headed for early passage.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, are working to develop an alternative energy program to counter Ford's political attacks.

Despite the President's stepped-up criticism of Congress, most observers didn't think he would veto the bill barring the Agriculture Dept. from putting into effect a scheduled sharp rise in the price poor persons have to pay for food stamps. More than two-thirds of his own party, as well as nearly all Democrats, opposed the President on the 378-38 vote in the House and 76-8 vote in the Senate.

CONTRACT RATIFICATION VOTE is taken by Service Employees Local 399 in Los Angeles, whose 4,500 members won a new 26-month contract in a three-day strike against a chain of Kaiser Permanente hospitals and clinics. The contract was approved by a 10-to-1 margin.

State-County Revises Boost In Per Capita

A special one-day convention of the State, County & Municipal Employees approved an increase in per capita payments to the union after hearing a report on the impact inflation has had on AFSCME's budget.

Last June, the regular AFSCME convention had approved a two-step raise in per capita, then $1.50 a month. The first step, to $1.80, went into effect last October. But the second step, to $2.15, was not scheduled to take effect until January 1976.

Under the new schedule adopted by a decisive voice vote of the 1,400 delegates, the $2.15 rate will take effect this April, nine months earlier than scheduled. A further increase, to $2.40 a month, will be effective next January.

AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy said the increase was needed to maintain services to the membership.

The convention was held in Washington, D.C., and delegates represented some 600 locals in 36 states.

Budget Scored On Education Fund Slashes

The Ford Administration's budget would shortchange education, the American Federation of Teachers charged.

AFT President Albert Shanker noted that less than 2 percent of the $349 billion in expenditures would go for education—a level he termed "absolutely unacceptable."

Shanker cited lack of funding for the program enacted by Congress last year for children from public housing projects, no budget recognition that the current recession will add to the number of poor children, and backward steps in "vital programs such as bilingual education and adult education."

The President's proposed "recissions" of spending authority, noted, includes an attempt to cut in half federal funds appropriated for handicapped children.

He cited also proposed budget cuts for aid to school systems trying to cope with desegregation problems.

Kaiser Hospital Pact Ends 3-Day Walkout

Los Angeles—Agreement was reached on a 26-month contract covering 4,500 Service Employees to end a three-day strike at six hospitals and 26 clinics operated by Kaiser Permanente in the Los Angeles area. The contract was approved by a 10-to-1 margin.

The settlement, worked out by negotiators for SEIU Local 399, provides for wage increases totaling 21 percent — 11 percent effective Feb. 1 and 10 percent Feb. 1, 1976.

SEIU members had set up their picket lines Feb. 3 after more than 75 percent of the membership voted 6 to 1 to strike. The strike vote came after 22 fruitless bargaining sessions with the Kaiser management, the union said.

The striking SEIU local encouraged members of other unions to cross its picket lines to get medical treatment or to demand comparable care to which they are entitled under their union contracts. Kaiser was forced to provide the services at other area hospitals unaffected by the dispute.

Meanwhile, nurses and other Kaiser medical technicians not covered by union contracts chose to honor the picket lines.

Kaiser issued dismissal notices to the nonunion personnel, but SEIU got the discharged employes reinstated as part of the settlement.

Agreement came after 40 hours of intense bargaining coordinated by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

In addition to the general percentage increase, the agreement guarantees that all SEIU members will receive a pay boost of at least 42 cents an hour in the first year.

Shift differential pay was increased by 5 cents in each year to 30 cents in 1975 and to 35 cents in 1976. Employes with 10 or more years of service also will get an additional 5 cents an hour each year, increasing the longevity differential to 15 cents this year and to 20 cents in 1976.

The agreement also provides for an additional floating holiday beginning in the second year of the contract. The contract expires Mar. 31, 1977.

In the opening days of the strike, the first ever called against the Kaiser health group, picket lines at some hospitals swelled to close to 1,000 persons but a court injunction later reduced the number of pickets.

A key issue in the dispute was the failure of Kaiser to bring wages of the hospital and clinic workers in southern California up to parity with those paid its employes in other parts of the state.

Three days before the Los Angeles agreement, Kaiser hospitals and clinics in Fontana, Calif., reached a settlement without a strike covering 850 members of Steelworkers Local 7600.

Furniture Workers Win 3 Elections

New York—The Furniture Workers were chosen as bargaining agent for a total of about 300 employes at three different furniture plants in National Labor Relations Board elections held last Dec. 20.

The organizing victories were scored at Green Mountain Industries in Burlington, Vt.; Heywood-Wakefield in Newport, Tenn., and Shawnee Cabinets in Shawneetown, Ill., and set a record for the union, UFWA President Carl Scarbrough said.

"Although they are widely separated geographically and working for different employers, the people in these plants have much in common," Scarbrough noted. "They all need union protection."

$2 Billion Released for Highways Only Fraction of Impounded Funds

President Ford's decision to release up to $2 billion in impounded federal highway construction funds is a start toward stimulating the depressed economy but the funds are only "a drop in the bucket," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. observed.

Georgine, at a news conference during the department's executive council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., said he is "hopeful that the Administration is finally coming to grips" with the problem of soaring unemployment in the construction industry.

However, he pointed out, the $2 billion represents but a fraction of the total $19 billion impounded by recent administrations, mostly former President Nixon's. In general, Georgine observed, neither the Ford Administration nor Congress has acted quickly enough.

Ford said the $2 billion would be allotted for various highway projects between now and June 30 and estimated it would create 125,000 jobs directly or indirectly.

A day after the President released the funds, a federal judge ruled the White House had no right to impound the money in the first place. The government is expected to appeal.

While Ford made his announcement, the Labor Dept. was issuing its weekly unemployment insurance claims report which showed nearly three-quarters of a million workers signed up for benefits for the first time during the week ended Feb. 1

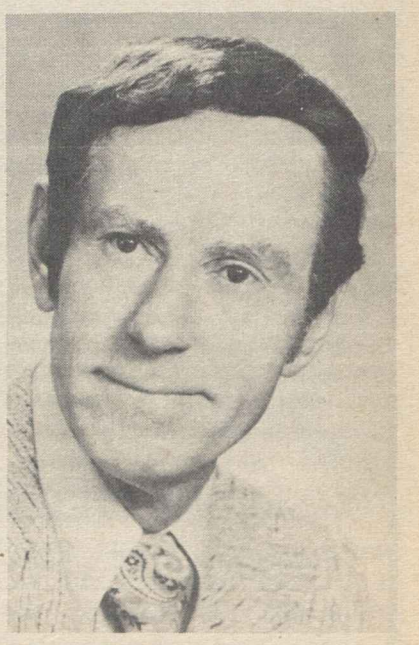
The 749,700 initial claims included 47,600 from persons who became eligible for benefits under new unemployment assistance programs enacted by Congress last December. These include newly discharged servicemen, federal employes, domestic and farm workers.

The Labor Dept. also reported 4,882,700 workers receiving jobless benefits in the week ended Jan. 25. The comparable figure a year earlier was 2,566,910. However, when recipients under the new programs are added — plus those under three others not previously included in the weekly figures — the overall number of people drawing benefits was 5,611,800.

Meanwhile, in testimony before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Chairman Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve Board continued to press the Administration's view that the dangers of inflation are overriding. He urged Congress to limit any anti-recession tax cut to the current year.

Among the new industrial layoffs was American Motors Corp.'s announcement that it will idle 8,500 workers for one week starting Feb. 17. AMC, the nation's fourth-largest auto maker, said the move was taken to lower its inventory of unsold cars.

Black & Decker Mfg. Co. said it will lay off about 450 workers indefinitely and furlough 5,000 others for two weeks starting Feb. 24. Carrier Corp. will close down its BDP division for six weeks beginning Feb. 17, putting some 1,200 workers out of jobs.



D. A. BOBO is the new secretary-treasurer of the Railway & Airline Clerks. He was named to fill the vacancy left by the death of Daniel Sullivan.

The Attack on Social Security

NEARLY EVERY AMERICAN has a personal stake in the social security system. Many millions rely on it to safeguard themselves and their families against economic catastrophe when earnings stop because of old age, disability, or death.

Attacks on the system designed to create doubts of its soundness and durability are a disservice to the nation.

Several elements of the system, to be sure—the level of benefits, for example, the test of retirement, the benefit rights accorded to women, the adequacy and equity of financing—are quite properly subjects of continuing public debate. Social security has not been and should not be a static structure, for it best serves its purpose if it is adapted to changing times and conditions. Public discussion addressed to improvement of the system is necessary and helpful.

But discussion of that kind is very different from assertions that the system is basically unsound, that it is bankrupt, or for some other reason doomed to collapse, or that it is a deception foisted on the American public. Charges similar to these have recurrently been made in the past, and as often have been found baseless. They have no more foundation now than they had when first made nearly 40 years ago.

Social security has been probably the most thoroughly and continuously studied, both within and outside government circles, of any program ever enacted by Congress.

On five occasions, from 1938 to 1971, the system has been exhaustively reviewed by advisory councils established under congressional auspices and composed of economists and other social scientists and leaders of labor and business, including distinguished actuaries and leaders of the insurance industry. In each instance, the integrity of the system has been vigorously reaffirmed. This history, if it does nothing more, should foster a healthy skepticism toward the current destructive attacks.

THE ULTIMATE QUESTION posed by current attacks on social security is whether the American people should continue to support contributory social insurance which is designed to prevent poverty from occurring, or should place basic reliance on measures to relieve poverty after it has become a fact. Necessary as relief programs are, most of us think them a poor second to prevention.

Critics who say that social security is nothing but a "welfare" program probably intend the remark to be pejorative. If so, in using this word they speak more truly than they know. Social security is indeed "welfare" in the true sense of the word, which is the sense also in which the Constitution uses it.

The system was created by an exercise of the power of Congress to raise and spend money to "provide for the . . . general welfare of the United States"—the welfare of all the millions of people who, though now self-supporting, would without social security quickly face destitution if or when earnings cease because of old age or disability, or support ceases because of death of a family breadwinner; as well, of course, as the welfare of the other millions who have already suffered one of these deprivations.

"The hope behind this statute," said Mr. Justice Cardozo in 1937, "is to save men and women from the rigors of the poorhouse as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when journey's end is near." That hope has been too largely fulfilled to make for tolerance of those who would now destroy it.

A Word Edgewise:

Soviet Rejection of Trade Pact Described as a Break for U.S.

By John P. Roche

I HAVE WATCHED WITH INTEREST the orchestration of the "Jackson Ruined Detente" symphony. At the moment it is in three movements:

First, Secretary of State Kissinger—and sources close to the secretary's thinking, and sources close to his views—are bemoaning Congress's unstatesmanlike intervention in the delicate game of statecraft.

Second, the anti-Jackson activists in the Democratic Party, who believe in detente mainly because Jackson can't be right, have broken out their somber saxophones.

And third, the Soviet press is merrily intervening in American domestic politics by drumrolls against Jackson and implied praise of President Ford and Secretary Kissinger for their transcendent vision of a peaceful future. (This mix of drums and saxophones is a bit polytonal — Stalin shot composers for less.)

The first thing that has to be understood about the Soviet repudiation of the trade agreement is that, in cold economic terms, it is a break for us. What Moscow obtained was an arrangement whereby we would loan them the money at low-interest rates to hire our technology to develop their resources. In return they had agreed to make token repayments on the $18 billion we sent them in Lend-Lease during World War II. (The figure has been scaled down to about $800 million.)

Now the Soviet press has been making the point that we really didn't contribute much to the war effort and, besides, it is "blood money" we are demanding. Before one breaks into tears, he should recall that Stalin was peacefully allied to Hitler until the latter double-crossed the Soviet dictator.

What were we to get in return? An end to the Cold War through detente. There has been a great deal of wishful thinking about detente, but what evidence do we have that there has been any "linkage" (to use Secretary Kissinger's favorite concept); that is, since the agreement was made with Moscow in 1972 have the Soviets turned off the tap on their militant clients in Southeast Asia and the Middle East? If they had, the situation in Vietnam would be very different and the Israelis would not be grimly referring to military cemeteries as "youth hostels."

Secretary Kissinger admitted there would be little economic payoff in the agreement. He told Business Week: "The Soviet Union was much more interested in credits than it was in trade because, for the next four or five years, it will have very little to give in reciprocal trade." In other words, only after American credits and technology had gotten into action would the Soviets have anything for export—except persecuted minorities. (And, of course, weapons for its Arab and Indo-Chinese clients.) Why then did Moscow suddenly reject the trade agreement?

TO ANSWER THIS, one must engage in some speculation about the attitudes of the Politburo. General Secretary Brezhnev had apparently sold his colleagues a package in which the key factor was credits. In return for the cash he was willing to make "assurances" that the USSR would permit the exodus of persecuted minorities.

At the Senate Finance Committee hearing on Dec. 3, 1974, Kissinger said flatly that these "assurances" had been made by Brezhnev, Gromyko and Dobrynin, not only to him but to President Ford. (This was after he had, on Oct. 26, received a secret letter from Foreign Minister Gromyko saying all bets were off. When Tass later published the letter, the State Dept. noted that it "does not in our view change the understandings" on emigration.) The trade bill was passed on Dec. 20; the Senate vote was 88-0.

Also passed by Congress was a limit on loans to the Soviets by the Export-Import Bank to a total of $300 million over the next few years. The amount could always be increased by Congress, but the feeling was that in dealing with Moscow it was wise to keep the gun behind the door. If the "assurances" were not fulfilled, the funds could be cut off. If they were fulfilled, increases could be authorized.

Doubtless it was this combination that infuriated the Politburo. A number of hardliners probably had reservations about the "assurances"—the minority problem in the Soviet Union is dynamite—and when the Congress proceeded to indicate it was not playing games by putting the credits on a short leash, the sponsors of the package found themselves accused of submitting to blackmail.

So now, for their own reasons, the Administration, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and the Soviet press are jumping on Jackson for ending the honeymoon. Yet, given the record, how could any sane American object to "blackmail?" Sending valentines to Moscow is hardly a viable means of enforcement.

Muddled Criticism:

Labor's Role Badly Distorted In View From the Ivory Tower

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

A SURPRISING NUMBER of liberal and self-styled radical economists and social reformers have become completely disenchanted with the American labor movement. To hear them tell it, you would think that organized labor has sold its soul for a mess of pottage—or, if you will, "in return for a junior partnership with big business in shaping the national consensus."

That's the way that economists Richard J. Barnet and Ronald E. Muller put it, rather condescendingly, in a recent book titled Global Reach: The Power of the Multinational Corporations. "Since World War II," they casually assert, "the labor agitator has been replaced by the labor statesman who hopes for more from White House dinners than from the picket line. Big labor, represented by the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO, has worked hard over the last generation to integrate the unions into American life in return for a junior partnership with big business in shaping the national consensus."

As one who has spent the past 30 years studying the American labor movement at rather close range, I am bewildered by this kind of exaggerated ivory tower rhetoric. It doesn't make sense to me at all. I realize, of course, that the labor movement is far from being a perfect institution, but to accuse its leadership of playing footsie with the White House and with big business in return for a junior partnership in the political and economic establishment is a rather supercilious distortion of the record.

The record speaks for itself. It clearly shows that organized labor, far from currying favor with the establishment, is currently engaged in a very direct confrontation with the Administration, with big business, and with the leadership of both political parties on ways and means of solving the depression. This was made abundantly clear at the emergency meeting of the General Board of the AFL-CIO on the economic state of the nation. I have never attended a meeting of any organization which was more brutally critical of the political and economic establishment.

Rightly or wrongly, the delegates (the presidents of all AFL-CIO affiliated unions, plus the officers of state federations of labor) tore the Administration's economic program to smithereens. The action program unanimously adopted by the delegates is a very progressive document by any reasonable set of standards. It clearly gives the lie to those who say that organized labor is willing to make a deal with the White House and with big business in return for a junior partnership in the establishment.

For the life of me I can't understand why so many liberals and self-styled radicals in the intellectual community persist in peddling this particular line or why they think it's fashionable or chic to ridicule the movement and its leadership or to underplay its effectiveness as a force for constructive economic change at a time when the nation is faced with a serious depression.

Many of them, I suspect, are unwitting victims of their own ideology and will never be completely satisfied until the labor movement opts for their particular form of national economic planning, call it what you will. I myself would be happy to support a viable program of long-range planning.

In the short run, however, the labor movement, so far as I am concerned, is the nation's most effective force for progressive economic change. For this reason, among others, I don't know whether to laugh or cry when I hear sophisticated economists like Barnet and Muller belittling the importance of organized labor and condescendingly talking down to its leadership. My instinctive reaction is to cry, but my better judgment tells me to laugh at them for taking themselves and their own beleaguered profession so seriously.

IN REFRESHING CONTRAST to their particular brand of academic elitism—which, frankly, gives me the willies—is the more balanced and more realistic judgment of another young economist, Andrew Levison, who has this to say about the labor movement in his recent book, The Working Class Majority.

"One can be sharply critical of the failings of American unions and fault them for falling short of their own ideals, while at the same time totally rejecting the idea that they are objectively conservative or reactionary. Granted, anyone seeking an American counterpart of the Chinese Red Guard will be deeply disappointed, but in a realistic and practical perspective the role of unions is basically positive both in national politics and in workers' daily lives.

"In fact, in more than a few important areas, it can be demonstrated that unions are one of the most progressive forces in American society. . . . There is simply no way to avoid the conclusion that unions . . . play an essentially progressive role . . . in American politics, and in American society itself."

I am confident that they will continue to play this role effectively in the critical months that lie ahead—with or without the endorsement and support of Barnet and Muller and other learned scholars in the liberal and self-styled radical intellectual community.

Unemployment Mounts:

Reckless Nixon-Ford Policies Depress Construction Industry

THE NEAR-DEPRESSION state of the nation's construction industry is the direct result of reckless policies fostered by the Nixon Administration and continued by President Ford, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. charged.

Refusal to relax the tight money, high interest rate game plan laid out by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns has brought housing starts, highway and utility expansion to a near standstill, Georgine said. He deplored the "vise" that has forced "cutbacks in the construction of utility plants . . . at a time when the nation is facing an extreme crisis in energy."

Georgine stressed that unemployment among construction workers is now nearly double the national rate, and that in some big city areas has soared to 35 and 40 percent, "far beyond what unemployment was in the Great Depression."

He said that even if the Administration reversed its tight-economy policies tomorrow, and cut loose the $19 billion appropriated by Congress but impounded by the White House immediately, several months would pass from the time the money "hit the streets" until it was "realized in actual jobs." He pointed out that the White House has kept some of these appropriated funds locked up since 1973.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Georgine said the Administration's argument that tight money, high interest rates and impoundments, even if they led to more unemployment, were needed to fight inflation, just doesn't stand up. The situation got "all out of hand," and while "unemployment has grown by leaps and bounds," it has not had any "great impact on the inflationary spiral," he asserted.

Georgine renewed the call for credit allocation for essential construction, such as housing, utilities, sewage facilities, streets and highways, and reduction of interest to rates that people can afford. He was questioned by John Fialka of the Washington Star-News and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced interview was broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOT TOO MANY months ago economists were chiding President Ford and his advisers for refusing to admit that we were in a deep recession.

Now, with the 1976 Budget Message and the Economic Report of the President, Ford has presented a picture of such suffocating bleakness that it has produced a pall over the nation that few, if any, budgets have equaled.

"This is a budget that shows no faith in this country," said one top trade union leader.

The new budget, writes one knowledgeable columnist, "is unusually honest, but not very bright . . . Mr. Ford goes the total hangout route. He announces to the world that his program means inflation at a high rate for a long time and recession for almost ever."

The President calls for sacrifice—but fundamentally the sacrifice must come from the worker, the poor, the elderly and the needy. And with cuts projected for most of the programs designed to assist these very groups, the forecast of things to come gives them little incentive to make that sacrifice.

Even if these groups do sacrifice, as he asks, we can expect dubious improvement in the near future in either inflation or recession. For 1975 he expects the Consumer Price Index will rise 11.3 percent, compared to 11 percent in 1974. The unemployment picture is even worse. It averaged 5.6 percent in 1974 but Ford forecasts an average of 8.1 percent in 1975, 7.9 percent in 1976, dropping to a still-high 5.5 percent in 1980.

Listen to the President's own words in his Budget Message:

"I am proposing no new spending initiatives in this budget other than those for energy. I am also proposing that the allowable increase in federal pay and in benefits to individuals that currently are linked by law to increases in consumer price levels be limited to 5 percent through June 30 of next year."

"I urge Congress to accept this recommendation. I especially urge the private sector—labor and management alike—to follow this example and minimize price and wage increases.

"I have proposed a similar temporary limit on the automatic increases in benefit programs linked to changes in consumer prices. These programs include social security, railroad retirement, federal employe retirement and disability systems, military retirement pay, supplemental security income and the food stamp and child nutrition programs."

The President says to the most needy in our society that prices will go up more than 11 percent this year but he will let you have only a 5 percent increase.

ANYONE WHO TRIES to plow through the 1,092 pages of the 1976 budget will not find it easy to perceive the cuts. In the food stamp program, for example, the total value of coupons issued was $4.7 billion in 1974, rising to an estimated $6.1 billion in 1975 with $7 billion estimated for 1976.

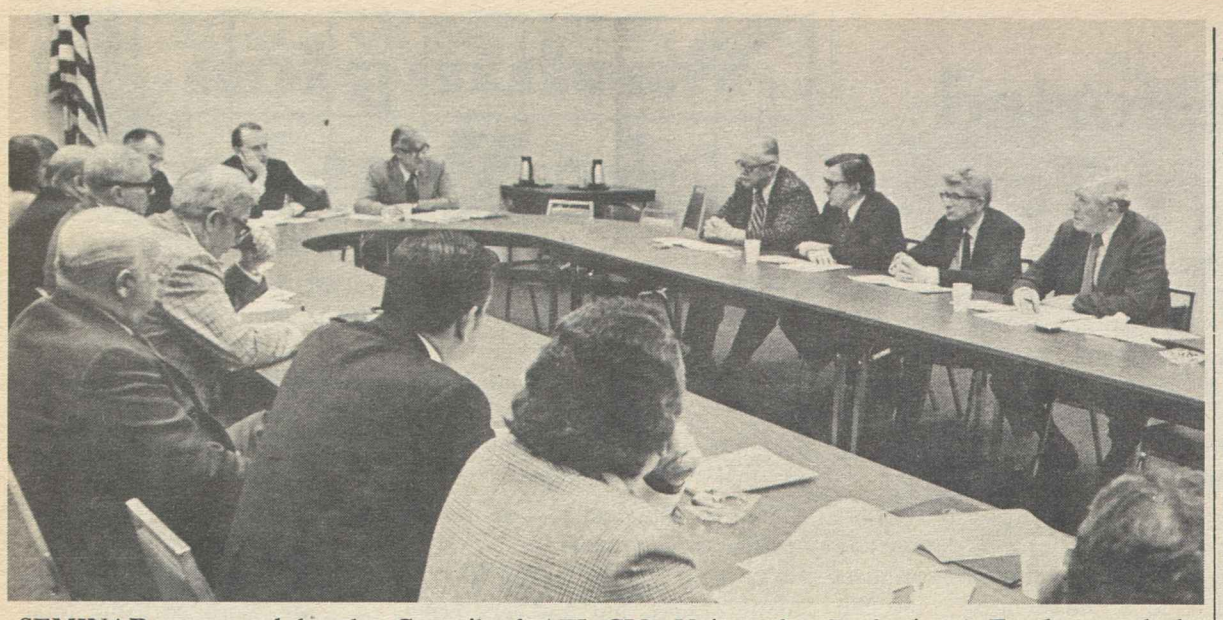
The amount paid by participants, however, rose from $1.9 billion in 1974 to an estimated $2.6 billion in 1975 and an estimated $3.4 billion in 1976. These figures would include both the cost of food and the cost of the stamps.

The citizenry is willing to sacrifice to counter the recession and inflation and to meet the energy crisis, but in the Budget and the Economic Report Ford's own advisers seem to have little confidence that his programs will do it.

Throughout the budget there is a determined tilt to those who have money—whether it is to buy fuel or in paying taxes. We hear no call for tax reform or tax justice.

When the nation's chief executive demonstrates that he wants equality of sacrifice, most believe that the country will respond.

RECKLESS ECONOMIC POLICIES fostered during the Nixon Administration and held over by President Ford have thrown the U.S. construction industry into a near-depression state, President Robert Georgine, center, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by John Fialka, left, of the Washington Star-News and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.



SEMINAR sponsored by the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees dealt with occupational safety and health standards and enforcement. George Gill, an executive vice president of the Communications Workers, is acting chairman of the council. The setting is the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

Meany Warns Against Exploitation Of Retirees, Affirms NCSC Support

AFL-CIO President George Meany reaffirmed organized labor's support for the National Council of Senior Citizens as he sounded a warning that older and retired workers are being exploited by some other organizations that purport to work in their behalf.

In a letter to federation affiliates, Meany urged that union members be alerted to the questionable and anti-union policies of these groups.

He noted that some of these groups have a long record of opposing organized labor's social and legislative goals, but nevertheless attempt to recruit older union members for their programs.

Citing a study conducted by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, Meany called attention particularly to the anti-labor policies of the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP) and the National Retired Teachers Association (NRTA).

He pointed out that the National Council of Senior Citizens is the only organization for older and retired workers that has the endorsement of the AFL-CIO, and called on affiliated unions to give it their full support.

In a memorandum accompanying Meany's letter, Seidman noted that while the NCSC has worked consistently with organized labor to improve the quality of life for all Americans, "other senior citizens groups have often exploited the elderly, subjected them to subtle anti-labor propaganda and actively opposed labor's legislative programs."

He said older Americans are easy targets of so-called non-profit organizations like the AARP and NRTA which are heavily financed by commercial interests.

"These organizations are spending millions of dollars on television, radio, newspaper and direct-mail advertising, promoting themselves and commercial insurance company policies," Seidman said.

The exploitation stems from the carefully nurtured "nonprofit" image of the AARP and NRTA, he noted, as retirees are led to believe they are getting objective advice in the publications of the organizations about purchasing insurance.

However, the retirees are not made aware of the exclusive access insurance companies have to the membership rolls of the organizations, "nor the heavy financial stakes the organizations have in maintaining the profitable operations of the insurance carriers."

Seidman warned that the AARP and NRTA have made extensive efforts to enroll union retirees even though "they offer inferior insurance at high cost and provide slick publications featuring subtle anti-labor articles."

He pointed out that the two groups are opposing labor's program for National Health Security just as they fought the original plan for Medicare.

On the state level, Seidman said, AARP groups have been actively supporting "right-to-work" legislation that outlaws union shop agreements.

The "honorary president" of the AARP and NRTA is Leonard Davis, who with his family hold the controlling interest in Colonial Penn Group, an insurance firm that specializes in writing health, auto and life insurance for persons age 55 and over.

Most of the policies written by Colonial Penn are among members of AARP and NRTA, Seidman pointed out.

He cited a Colonial Penn report to stockholders disclosing that the company's premium income rose to $250 million in 1974 from $183 million in 1973.

"The report seeks to encourage investors by claiming that 1975 growth in AARP-NRTA memberships should again stimulate premium volume, but expresses concern over the possibility of enactment of national health insurance legislation," Seidman observed.

"When you learn that the AARP-NRTA organizations list in their own financial statements for last year receipts from the Colonial Penn Group of $5.8 million for 'administrative allowances' and that they receive additional amounts for advertising space in their publications," Seidman said, "it is easy to comprehend why they favor the commercial insurance approach to national health care."

To better combat the opposition of the AARP, NRTA and other similar organizations to social legislation, Seidman stressed the need for AFL-CIO affiliates to familiarize their members with the objectives and programs of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

He pointed out that the NCSC is closely aligned with the goals of organized labor and that two-thirds of its executive board members come out of the labor movement.

"NCSC is labor's kind of retiree organization," he stressed, urging that older union members should be given the opportunity to learn about NCSC programs before they get lured into organizations that do not serve their best interests.

Carlough Sees Threat In UN's 'New Majority'

The "new majority" emerging in the United Nations carries some ominous overtones for workers around the world, an AFL-CIO representative told the convention of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI).

Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough said that free trade unions are accustomed to problems with totalitarian governments and with the exploitation of multinational cartels.

"What's new is that capitalistic multinationals and the international Communist political machine appear to be in objective agreement, for the moment at least," Carlough told DOMEI's 10th anniversary convention.

Carlough said the so-called Third World nations were lending their support to the Soviet military might and the designs of the oil-producing nations in recent votes in the United Nations and its member agencies.

"It is a 'new majority' that should make free people everywhere very uncomfortable," he said. "Together we must make this 'new majority' understand that free trade unions are not in the habit of contributing to their own destruction."

Carlough cited impressive advances for Japanese workers in the years since he last visited in 1963, but said that oil boycotts, runaway inflation and rising unemployment were problems shared by the United States and Japan.

He also noted the increased strength of the Japanese labor federation since AFL-CIO President George Meany, whom Carlough was representing, took part in its founding convention 10 years ago.

Congressional Report:

Family Costs Soar 15 Percent in Year

Higher prices for nearly everything cost the average American family about 15 percent more in 1974 just to maintain the same modest standard of living it enjoyed the year before, a new congressional study disclosed.

The dramatic rise in the cost of living meant a family with an intermediate income of $12,626 in 1973 required an additional $1,840 last year to maintain its living standards, a report of the Joint Economic Committee points out.

For such a family, higher taxes outstripped all other price increases in the budget. While food prices rose 11.9 percent, housing 13.5 percent, and transportation 14.3 percent, personal income and social security taxes went up twice as fast.

The study found that personal income taxes jumped by 26.5 percent—from $647 in 1973 to $787 in 1974—while social security taxes increased by 21.6 percent.

"Because of our graduated tax rate system, taxes are rising faster than any other consumer expenditure in this period of rapid inflation," Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Wis.), the committee's chairman noted.

"Not only must workers cope with declining real incomes and the prospect of unemployment, but the percent of their incomes being collected by government is also rising," Humphrey said.

As usual, those families with the lowest incomes were hurt most by last year's spiraling rate of inflation, the study observed.

The committee's study noted that food prices in 1974 rose faster for low-income families than for others, for example. For a family on a low-cost diet, food prices rose 12.7 percent while increasing only 10.5 percent for families on a liberal diet.

Taxes also hit the lower-income families hardest. A family of four with an income of $9,320 last year paid an average 31 percent more for federal, state and local taxes than in 1973. The comparable increase for families with intermediate and higher incomes of $14,466 and $20,883 was 26.5 percent.

"The poor clearly have borne a greater burden," the study reported. "In a year such as 1974 when taxes, transportation and housing costs rose more rapidly than food, families whose incomes did not keep up with inflation had to substitute down to less expensive foods."

The Agriculture Dept., meanwhile, reported separately the government's food-stamp allotment for needy families failed to cover the cost of even a basic economy diet last December.

The economy diet plan for a family of two adults and two school-age children for the month of December was estimated by the government to cost $159.90. The food-stamp allotment was only $150.

The Joint Economic Committee report also noted that a family's total real disposable income declined by 3 percent last year. This is the broadest measure of purchasing power. The 1974 decline was the sharpest of any experienced in a post-World War II recession, the study said.

The drop in buying power is creating a drag on the economy that "may well dampen a recovery," the committee reported.

Ford Okays New Rules On Federal Bargaining

President Ford approved a set of amendments to the Executive Order dealing with labor-management relations within the federal government, but unions representing federal workers indicated it will not blunt their drive for a labor relations law.

The modifications, some of which had been sought by the unions, were recommended by the Federal Labor Relations Council which is an all-management group consisting of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the director of the Office of Management & Budget, and the Secretary of Labor.

A report on the changes noted that about 1.1 million employes, or 56 percent of the total non-postal federal workforce, are in exclusive bargaining units and 86 percent of them are working under a negotiated agreement.

Changes incorporated into the Executive Order include the following:

- The definition of supervisor was tightened so that fewer persons will be excluded from bargaining units.
- Guards at federal installations will hereafter be allowed to belong to the same bargaining unit as other workers at the agency or installation. The council noted that federal workers don't have the right to strike so there is no potential conflict of interest.
- A bargaining unit may be expanded through consolidation of separate units represented by the same union, and the council endorsed "the policy of promoting more comprehensive bargaining units." But if portions of the larger unit sought are currently unrepresented or represented by other unions, elections would be held to determine the wishes of the employes affected.
- Agencies can refuse to bargain over internal regulations that affect employes only when they can demonstrate a "compelling need" for the disputed regulation under criteria to be established by the Federal Labor Council. Refusal to bargain over regulations has been a major union grievance against management, but the significance of the changed language depends on the interpretation given to it.

In some other areas, no change was made in the requirement for an election — rather than a card check — to determine union recognition. Lawyers will continue to be considered on the same basis as all other professionals. Professional employes as a group can vote to be included in a bargaining unit. A number of other areas of controversy are left intact because the council found that the parties have learned to live with the situations and should be able to work out remaining differences in direct negotiations.

The council report did not deal with any issue that would require legislation rather than a presidential directive.

Despite Dispute Over Rules:

Group Legal Plans Show Steady Growth

While several factions are continuing to compete vigorously over the rules under which prepaid group legal plans will be set up, there seems to be unanimity from all sides that such plans will continue to grow.

Labor and consumer groups have been trying for a year to stop the American Bar Association from putting restrictions on the operation of prepaid legal plans, and the outcome of that battle is far from clear, Dave Stack writes in the January issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

Still, the number of plans in the nation has grown to an estimated 3,000, Stack says, with unions, consumer cooperatives and student groups participating. Stack is an editor of Trends in Legal Services, a Washington, D.C., newsletter dealing with group legal services.

Unions are heavily represented among the existing plans, but not solely with plans that have been bargained into contracts with their employers. The AFL-CIO has endorsed such plans and urged their inclusion in collective bargaining, Stack points out.

Earl Warren, Jr., a California municipal judge who heads the labor-supported National Consumer Center for Legal Services, has urged unions not to wait to sell an employer on the idea, but to start them on their own with a dues checkoff system, Stack notes.

The recent economic climate has not been conducive to "new, exotic fringe benefits in collective bargaining," but Stack says union experts in the field still foresee prepaid group legal plans as becoming as common a fringe benefit as prepaid medical insurance.

The major battle over how the plans will develop stems from the American Bar Association's attempt in February 1974 to legislate against "closed panel" plans. The bar attempted to place restrictions on lawyers working exclusively for a group plan while making it easier to set up "open panel" plans where group participants choose any lawyer they want.

The National Consumer Center for Legal Services has filed a suit against the ABA rules in Tennessee, Stack notes, after condemning the ABA rules as "unnecessary, restrictive, chilling in effect, unconstitutional, in violation of antitrust law and the doctrine of federal preemption."

Meanwhile, Stack reports, the ABA has appeared to back away from its position by forming a committee later in 1974 to restudy the ABA's rules on open vs. closed panel plans.

Other developments in the four years since the Laborers set up a pioneering plan in Shreveport, La., are also traced by Stack:

- Inclusion in the 1974 pension reform law of a clause that reserves to the federal government the right to regulate the employer-employe relationship. Stack notes that Robert S. Connerton, general counsel of the Laborers and an officer of NCCLS, has predicted prepaid legal plans among union groups "will flourish like mushrooms in a spring rain" if the federal preemption interpretation holds.

- Attempts in Congress by Rep. Joseph Karth (D-Minn.) to give a tax exemption to benefits received under group plans.

Stack reports that there is little pattern in the cost, benefits or structuring of the plans that are proliferating across the country. He quotes Sandy DeMent, NCCLS executive director, that the variety of needs among various groups has meant that "no easy, one-size-fits-all model is available."

Stack reports that among the most innovative of recent plans are a plan in Columbus, Ohio, which is the nation's first municipally-funded open panel plan; an Arizona plan that provides seminars for participants in an attempt to practice "preventive law" and cut costs by reducing the number of cases that get to litigation; and a Maine plan with a "circuit rider" concept in which lawyers travel to various areas of the state to better serve the members of the plan.

IUE Charges Age Bias In Layoff of Engineers

Great Neck, N.Y.—Company defiance of a court order restraining the layoff of 62 senior engineers has magnified union charges of age discrimination against Sperry Rand Corp. here.

The company, claiming it failed to receive the order, refused the engineers—all over age 40—entry to the Long Island facility.

The order was issued by a state supreme court judge at the request of the New York State Human Rights Commission, which was investigating charges brought against the company by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The commission sought the restraining order to halt the layoffs pending a full investigation of the IUE charges that Sperry Rand violated the seniority clause of the union's contract.

In appealing to the court, Human Rights Commissioner Jack M. Sable said that "the stigma and permanent career impact caused by the discriminatory layoff of professionals over 40 years of age cannot be overemphasized."

"No back-pay remedy could ever make these engineers whole for the damage they will sustain if Sperry is permitted to proceed with their layoffs," Sable added.

The company issued layoff notices to a total of 107 engineers, IUE Local 444 noted, but failed to comply with the layoff provisions of the contract.

Under the IUE-Sperry agreement, two separate seniority lists are maintained, one for senior engineers and the other for junior-level engineers. If a layoff situation occurs, the company is required to follow a one-to-one ratio in discharges from both lists. The clause also provides that only 50 percent of those laid off may be discharged out of seniority.

The IUE said Sperry has admitted that by laying off engineers with greater seniority it could lop $35,000 from monthly costs.

FEDERAL PROGRAMS dealing with health, social insurance and welfare were reviewed at a meeting of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Social Security, with discussions led by Committee Chairman Floyd E. Smith, top right. He was joined by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, left, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Social Security Director Bert Seidman.

8.2% Rate Called 'Tragedy':

New Surge in Joblessness Deepens Economic Crisis

that joblessness would reach at least 8.5 percent some time this year.

The AFL-CIO is "much more realistic" about the outlook, Meany observed. He noted that Greenspan had predicted seven weeks ago unemployment would peak at 8 percent in July.

"Well, we're already at 8.2 percent," Meany said. "So I'm just taking his projections with an add-on, and I say by July we'll most likely have 10 percent."

Until last month, the highest jobless rates since World War II were 7.5 percent in July 1958 and 7.9 percent in October 1949. The rate had not exceeded 8 percent since 1941 when the average annual rate was 9.9 percent as the nation was pulling out of the Depression.

Joblessness was pervasive in January, affecting every major occupational group. Hardest hit, however, were blue-collar workers. Their rate of unemployment shot up from 9.3 percent in December to 11 percent. The rate for white-collar workers rose from 4.1 to 4.6 percent.

Among the major industries, BLS reported, manufacturing workers were socked with a jobless rate of 10.5 percent, up from 8.9 percent in December and more than double the year-ago figure of 4.8 percent.

Most of the 928,000 increase in joblessness last month was due to layoffs rather than voluntary quits. The number of those who lost their job to production cutbacks rose by 640,000, BLS said.

The deteriorating job situation starkly outlined the precipitous nature of the nation's economic decline.

"Since last August, joblessness rose by 2.6 million," BLS noted in its report, "more rapidly than in any five-month span since the initiation of the monthly survey in 1940. This surge in unemployment stands in sharp contrast to the picture just 15 months earlier when the unemployment rate had fallen to a three and one-half year low of 4.6 percent."

It will take much more than a tax cut to prop up the economy, Meany said in his statement. He also noted the Administration's energy proposals are "certain to create more inflation" and that putting priority on them is "absolutely wrong."

"The President must put first things first, and that means jobs," Meany declared. "Nothing else is more important to America now."

There are many things President Ford can do to create jobs starting "tomorrow morning," he said.

"Just one action would be to release a substantial portion of the $19 billion he has impounded that could be building sewage projects, hospitals and highways which America desperately needs," he said.

The other side of the jobless coin is the employment situation. The number of persons holding jobs in January fell by 640,000 to 84,562,000, the fourth consecutive monthly decline, BLS said. Three-fourths of the decrease occurred among adult men, the key family wage earners.

Since last September, total employment has dropped more than 1.8 million. The number of nonfarm payroll jobs in January declined by 440,000 from the December level and, at 77.3 million, was 1.6 million below last October.

Among the various labor-force categories, joblessness among adult men last month rose to 6 percent from 5.3 percent in December. Other over-the month increases:

Adult women, from 7.2 to 8.1 percent; teenagers, from 18.1 to 20.8 percent; whites, from 6.4 to 7.5 percent; non-whites, from 12.5 to 13.4 percent; household heads, from 4.6 to 5.2 percent; married men, from 3.8 to 4.5 percent; full-time workers, from 6.8 to 7.7 percent, and workers covered by state unemployment insurance, from 4.8 to 5.5 percent.

The January report also disclosed:

- For the youngest Vietnam-era veterans, those between the ages of 20 and 24, the unemployment rate rose over the month from 15.6 to 19.7 percent. For non-veterans of the same age, the rate went from 10.4 to 11.6 percent.
- The average length of unemployment moved up to 10.7 weeks from 10 the month before, a substantial increase indicating the difficulty workers are having finding jobs.
- Besides an increase in joblessness, there was a continued rise in the number of persons working part-time because they were unable to find full-time employment. The number of partially unemployed persons rose by 462,000 to 3,837,000 last month.
- All of the January rise in the workforce was among adult women and teenagers as the male labor force declined for the third straight month.
- The average workweek dropped three-tenths of an hour to 36.4 hours, and was six-tenths of an hour under the year-earlier level. Average hourly earnings, on a seasonally adjusted basis, rose one cent from December to $4.40.

The report noted that job cutbacks were posted in 78 percent of all industries in January and in 86 percent of all industries over the October-January period.

"I think things will get worse before the recovery gets under way," BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin told the Joint Economic Committee the day the new statistics were released.

Shiskin also noted that while joblessness is rising throughout the economy some industries, such as housing and construction, have unemployment rates close to those of the Great Depression.

Crafts Slate Conference To Spur Jobs Programs

number of major areas and said that unless action is taken joblessness in the industry will continue to move up and at double the national rate—a characteristic of the past year or so.

Georgine announced also a joint appeal by the 3.5 million member department and the American Institute of Architects to the President and Congress for enactment of a seven-point program for the "immediate economic relief of the industry and the nation." The appeal is the first joint action by the building trades unions and the architects on a national problem. The unemployment rate for architects is currently estimated at 26 percent.

In announcing the Washington conference, Georgine stressed that in the view of the department's executive council and the 17 general presidents of the unions affiliated with the department "the true impact of the situation in the construction industry has not been generally recognized." The 15 percent unemployment figure generally used, indicating more than 600,000 persons out of work, is only an average, he said, and in many cities individual crafts have up to 65 percent of their members not working.

In Detroit construction unemployment averages 30 percent, Cleveland 30 percent, Boston 23 percent, Chicago 22 percent, New York 24 percent, San Diego 25 percent, New Orleans 27 percent, Georgine told reporters.

He described it as "a crisis such as we have not faced since the 1930s and it has to be treated as such." He added, "We want to be sure that the Congress and the federal Executive Branch understands what is going on in this country."

The joint statement of the trades and the architects said, "We believe that the key to the nation's economic prosperity rests with the construction industry in which we work together as architects and craftsmen." Expressing confidence that the industry can lead the nation out of the recession and bring lasting public improvements, the joint appeal called for prompt implementation of a seven-point program as a "vital first step." The program:

- Immediate release of impounded funds by the Administration covering a wide range of public facilities and improvements.
- Special emphasis on reviving and strengthening the housing industry especially for families with low and moderate incomes.
- A broad new national public works program to improve living environments of local communities.
- Use of revenue sharing and community development block grants by state and local governments for direct construction activities in local communities.
- Revision of federal monetary policies to increase the availability of mortgage funds to the construction industry.
- Provision for tax incentives to owners of new and existing buildings to design and redesign their structures to make them more energy efficient.
- Similar incentives for renovation and remodeling of existing unused or under-used buildings to enable their adaptation for new or additional purposes, thus conserving energy and resources.

"It is time to take positive, creative action to revive our economic system," the statement stressed, "not only to rebuild our economy but to rebuild as well the human environments of our towns and cities."

Meany Hits Slow Pace Of War on Recession

Six percent loans are made to the Soviet Union through the Export-Import Bank, Meany noted. "Well, let the American homeowner get 6 percent money," he said.

On other topics during the wide-ranging interview, Meany made the following points:

- The AFL-CIO does not favor "a new WPA," such as that installed during the Great Depression. "We want to turn the economy around," Meany said. "We're not talking about a dole."
- President Ford's chances for being elected in 1976 would be "pretty slim" if the economy is as bad then as it is now.
- While acknowledging the nation's Vietnam policies were wrong in light of new information, he said the U.S. should live up to its obligations to give financial aid to that Southeast Asian country. Otherwise, "we are put in the position of walking out on someone that we've considered an ally."
- The AFL-CIO received "not a penny" from the Central Intelligence Agency and never acted as a conduit for CIA funds to anti-Communist groups in Europe, Asia or South America.
- The United States should not give presents to its "economic enemies" — the Arab oil-producing countries — but should impose an embargo on Middle East nations that are blackmailing American consumers. A nuclear power plant to Syria, airplanes to Saudi Arabia —these should not be given away at taxpayers' expense, he said.
- The AFL-CIO does not exercise control over Democratic Party delegates who also happen to hold union cards. Internal party affairs are not the federation's business, and any withdrawal of such members from the party is up to them. "We didn't put them in there, and we won't pull them out."
- Seniority clauses in union contracts requiring that the last persons hired shall be the first laid off when the workforce is cut "should be lived up to" without regard to minority standing. "I stand by the contracts," Meany said.

Council Spurs Steps to Aid Victims of Economic Crisis

REPORTERS COVERING the AFL-CIO Executive Council question Federation President George Meany at a news conference between sessions of the council's mid-winter meeting.

Meany Calls Jobs Key to Recovery

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has called for immediate steps to aid the victims of the deepening recession—the poor, the unemployed, the low-wage worker.

With unemployment exceeding 7.5 million persons, the federation's Executive Council at its mid-winter sessions here urged substantially strengthened unemployment compensation benefits, mortgage relief payments to guard against foreclosures, continuing health insurance coverage for the jobless, a higher minimum wage and an overhaul of the welfare system.

The council was scheduled to adopt policy positions on the Administration's economic program, tax reform, monetary policy, energy, and trade as it planned to spell out alternative courses of action.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told news conferences dominated by a long line of television cameras that he was very "pessimistic about the whole situation" of the direction of the nation's economy and that "we are getting to the point where unemployment is feeding on unemployment."

To turn the economy around, he said, will require a tax cut "as high as $30 billion" to provide the necessary incentive and put purchasing power in the hands of consumers.

What the country needs is jobs, he told reporters, and an Administration dedicated to that goal. He held out the hope that once Congress gets to know the "extent of the problem" of unemployment, of what "it means for a man with a house full of kids to be out of work and reaching the end of his unemployment compensation," there will be action.

The council concentrated in its opening days on domestic problems although it adopted statements denouncing meetings between Western Europe trade unions and the so-called labor movements of Communist and totalitarian regimes, calling for a truce with justice for all sides in Northern Ireland and warning the International Labor Organization that its usefulness would be threatened if it grants observer status to the Palestine Liberation Organization.

It also adopted unanimously a statement reaffirming the federation's long-standing policy of complete independence of the internal affairs of the nation's major political parties.

A statement on social security called for a series of specific steps to update and improve the system and defended it against irresponsible attacks from alarmist critics.

The council renewed its call for national health insurance legis-

Benefit Lines Lengthen As Output Skids

Unemployment, now at its highest level since World War II, mounted across the nation as the economic recession forced further production cutbacks in nearly every major industry.

The Federal Reserve Board reported industrial production fell 3.6 percent in January, the steepest one-month decline since December 1937.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported another 731,000 workers filed initial claims for unemployment insurance benefits during the week ended Feb. 8, including 43,600 newly eligible under emergency legislation passed late last year.

$9 Billion 'Shot in Arm':

Court Bars Freeze On Pollution Funds

Hundreds of thousands of jobs will be created over the next few years as the byproduct of a Supreme Court ruling that a President can't thwart Congress by refusing to allocate funds for clean water projects.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. estimated that the $9 billion in federal funds involved and an anticipated $3 billion in matching state and local funds could generate 485,000 jobs —"a shot in the arm that could turn the whole American economy around."

It said more than 250,000 of the jobs would be in the severely depressed construction industry, the others mostly in manufacturing.

A unanimous Supreme Court held that former President Nixon had acted illegally two years ago when he refused to allocate to cities and states $9 billion of the $18 billion Congress had authorized for a massive clean water program.

Nixon had initially vetoed the clean water bill. After Congress overrode his veto, he retaliated by refusing to allocate the funds so as to meet the congressional timetable of $5 billion in construction funds for 1973, $6 billion for 1974 and $7 billion in 1975.

Ford, last December, said his Administration would release only $4 billion of the $9 billion frozen by Nixon.

The case decided by the court was a suit brought by New York City, although other local and state governments also had litigation pending.

The court ruled in the context of the Water Pollution Act of 1972, which it said "was intended to provide a firm commitment of substantial sums within a relatively limited period of time in an effort to achieve an early solution to what was deemed an urgent problem."

Congress Rebuffs Ford On Oil Tariff Scheme

By David L. Perlman

Congress decisively won the preliminary bout with the Ford Administration over strategy to deal with the nation's economic crisis, setting the stage for the key votes on overriding a presidential veto.

At issue is whether President Ford's inflation-feeding plan to raise oil and fuel prices sharply enough to cut consumption will be allowed to go into effect.

The House voted 309-114 and the Senate 66-28 to suspend for a 90-day period the President's power to levy a special tariff on imported oil. This would nullify the $1-a-barrel tax Ford has already imposed and block his announced intent to raise the special tax to $3.

Before the 90-day period has run out, Congress expects to have completed action on an alternative plan.

Special committees named by House and Senate Democrats have been working to draft an alternative program of energy conservation that would seek to avoid both a new round of inflation and constraints on the efforts to achieve economic recovery.

$3 Wage Floor Pushed To Help Fight Poverty

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A $3-an-hour minimum wage is an "absolutely indispensable weapon against poverty," the AFL-CIO declared calling for legislation to make it effective Jan. 1, 1976.

The scheduled increase in the wage floor to $2.30 an hour next January is "already obviously outdated by the facts of inflation," the Executive Council said, and would mean continuing poverty for the low-wage worker and his family.

Tracing the development of the minimum wage from its enactment in 1938, the council pointed out that it is effective only if it provides a "minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being of workers." The wage-hour law as amended in 1974 "does not meet this goal today," the council asserted.

Pointing out that it took three years of hearings and lobbying to win the 1974 increases, the council said that what might have been considered appropriate in 1971 "is no guarantee against poverty today."

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL of the AFL-CIO acted on a broad range of policy resolutions at its mid-winter meeting. The result was a comprehensive program dealing with economic, legislative and social issues as well as trade union and world affairs.

Fast Action Pressed to Upgrade Unemployment Insurance System

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Immediate congressional enactment of federal minimum standards is essential to improve the nation's obsolete unemployment compensation program, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Governmental neglect—both state and federal—and employer opposition to reform of the system has left the country with an inadequate program to meet the present economic crisis, the council said in a statement.

"Today, without federalization or even federal standards, the unemployment insurance program is basically the same as it was at the time of adoption 40 years ago," the statement noted.

"Unemployment insurance has long been regarded as the first line of defense against the spread of poverty and recession, but because of long neglect it can't do that job effectively without immediate and substantial improvement.

"Adequate unemployment insurance for the millions of jobless workers is more desperately needed today than at any time since it was enacted, but fragmentation in separate state programs has stymied necessary changes."

With the nation's jobless rate last month at 8.2 percent and still rising, correction of the unemployment compensation system "is a matter of immediate national concern," the council said. It pointed to the following inadequacies of the present program:

• More than 12 million workers are not covered by the regular unemployment compensation program. Hastily enacted temporary coverage for these workers expires at the end of 1975.

• Under most state programs, the maximum weekly benefit available to jobless covered workers is below the Labor Dept. poverty level income for a nonfarm, four-member family.

• Unreasonable eligibility requirements deprive 20-25 percent of claimants benefit entitled in some states.

Benefit duration is determined under 50 different state formulas. In some states, every eligible worker is entitled to a 26-week regular benefit duration period if it is needed. In others, minimum benefit periods furnish protection for only 8, 10 or 12 weeks.

• The imposition of harsh disqualifications has, in recent years, annually denied more than 2.5 million jobless workers the protection of the program.

The economic plight of long-term jobless workers has been made more difficult by program failures, the council pointed out.

The extended unemployment compensation program enacted in 1970 has proved to be "unworkable and unsuited" to meet the nation's unemployment conditions, for one thing.

"Separate state and national triggers fixed at unrealistic levels of high unemployment have prevented operation of the program at the most critical times," the council noted. "Legislative amendments have been required repeatedly since this program was established.

"Each amendment represented an additional desperate effort to salvage an inefficient extended benefit program that should be drastically overhauled and established on a permanent basis."

The council called for both short-term and permanent improvements in the nation's unemployment insurance program. Immediate, short-term recommendations include:

• Extending unemployment compensation benefits to jobless workers recently covered by the Emergency Jobs & Unemployment Assistance Act of 1974. The stop-gap legislation expires at the end of this year. The council also said the duration of these benefits should be the same as the duration for jobless workers covered by the permanent program.

• Compensation for the waiting week required under the provision of most state laws. Benefits for this week currently are not paid.

• Improvement of the existing benefits structure to allow two-thirds of a worker's former weekly wage, up to a maximum weekly benefit amount equal to 75 percent of the state average weekly wage.

• Sufficient staffing of employment security offices in areas of substantial unemployment to process claims without undue delay and inconvenience to jobless workers.

The council reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for federalization of the unemployment insurance program with full protection of the job rights and employment conditions of all state employes who presently administer the jobless benefits program.

It made these recommendations for permanent improvement of the system:

• Universal coverage of all wage and salary workers.

• A weekly benefits standard providing at least two-thirds of a worker's former weekly earnings up to a maximum of at least 75 percent of the state average weekly wage.

• Uniform eligibility and duration standards. As a bare minimum, every jobless worker with a record of 20 weeks of work should be entitled to a benefit duration of at least 26 weeks.

• The existing triggered extended unemployment compensation program should be abolished and replaced with a 100 percent federally financed extended benefit program. The program would entitle all jobless workers to an additional 26-week federal benefits period when their regular state benefits are exhausted.

• Financing of the jobless insurance program should be on a firm and adequate tax base. As a first step, the taxable wage base should be fixed at a level equal to the state annual average wage in covered employment. Later it should be raised to a level equal to the taxable wage base used to finance the social security program.

• The adequacy of state unemployment insurance reserve funds should be assured by enactment of a minimum federal standard of reserve adequacy that each state would be required to meet and maintain.

• The protection of unemployment compensation should be extended to new entrants into the labor force and to former workers attempting to re-enter the labor force.

In December 1974 the government's poverty level was estimated at $5,302 a year for an urban family of four—or an hourly wage of $2.55 for a fulltime year-round worker. On Jan. 1, 1975, when the minimum went to $2.10 an hour this meant continuing poverty. The $2.30 figure for 1976 is therefore also hopelessly outdated, the council declared.

It also called on Congress to require doubletime for overtime work to help reduce unemployment. The need today, it said is for additional jobs rather than overtime work, and employers schedule regular overtime work while laying off workers because they find it less costly.

The council called also for vigorous enforcement of the wage-hour act, noting that it is an effective weapon "only if the legislative commitment is followed by effective administration and enforcement."

To Meet Future Needs:

New Funds Sought For Social Security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—New sources of social security financing have been proposed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to avoid a future deficit and to pay for improved benefits.

At the same time, the council firmly rejected "alarmist, distorted and inaccurate" charges that the system faces bankruptcy.

"Social security has served America well," the Executive Council declared. Proposals to strengthen the system should be considered "in an atmosphere of responsible, constructive debate."

As labor's contribution to such a debate, the AFL-CIO proposed that:

• The taxable wage base should be gradually increased until virtually all wages are covered in full, as was the case when the system began 40 years ago. The present $14,100 ceiling on wages subject to the social security payroll tax should be lifted over a period of years to $28,000.

• While workers would continue to be taxed on their wages up to the ceiling amount, employers should be required to pay a social security tax on their total payroll—including any salaries above the taxable wage base.

• While all workers should continue to have social security taxes deducted from their pay, there should be some relief from the burden of the payroll tax for low- and middle-income workers. They should receive a partial refund from the federal government out of general tax revenues.

• To keep the Social Security Trust Fund financially stable in the next century and to finance desirable additional improvements, contributions from general revenue should be injected into the social security system. The amount should gradually rise until it represents one-third of the total, with employer and worker contributions accounting for the balance.

In terms of benefits, the Executive Council suggested linking benefits to retired workers more closely to their wages in the years nearest retirement. Initially, social security retirement benefits might be linked to the average of a worker's 10 highest years of earnings, and eventually to the high five years, as is done in many private pension plans.

The council also urged more frequent adjustment of social security benefits to keep up with the rise in prices and development of a special Consumer Price Index for the elderly that would more fully reflect their proportionately greater spending for food, housing, medical care and transportation.

It proposed a more lenient definition of disability for workers age 55 and over and a lesser reduction in benefits for workers who choose early retirement at age 60.

The Executive Council statement urged expansion of Medicare benefits "pending enactment of National Health Security."

It asked the elimination of the monthly premium the elderly must now pay for the physician services portion of Medicare and urged reimbursements for the cost of prescription drugs. The statement also called for reduction of the present 29-month waiting period before disabled persons under 65 can be eligible for Medicare.

The council pledged to "vigorously oppose" Administration proposals to cut back the Medicare program and to limit social security beneficiaries to a 5 percent cost-of-living increase.

"The victims of the Administration's economic mismanagement must not be forced to make additional sacrifices," the AFL-CIO said.

Political Independence Reaffirmed by AFL-CIO

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously reaffirmed the federation's long-standing policy of complete independence from the internal affairs of the nation's major political parties.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told a press conference that "we came to a unanimous conclusion that the AFL-CIO has no desire to influence the internal structure of either the Republican or Democratic party and we have no desire to allow the Republican or Democratic party to interfere with our internal affairs."

He said "we are going to continue to improve" the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE), "strengthen it, maintain it in order to try and elect labor's friends to the House and to the Senate and to the state legislatures, irrespective of political party."

Asked if it was recommended that AFL-CIO officers withdraw from positions in political parties, Meany said "positively not." He added that "the officers of the AFL-CIO, the officers of our state federations, the officers of the central bodies are all American citizens and they are Democrats, some of them, Republicans, some of them, and independents, and they can do as they please.

"Those who are active in the Democratic National Committee secure their seats on the DNC as Democrats from local areas. They are not put there by the AFL-CIO. The AFL-CIO did not recommend that they go on there, and if they desire to stay on, they stay on; if they desire to get off, they get off without any regard to any influence from the AFL-CIO."

The federation takes no part in electing delegates to the Democratic or Republican national conventions, he said in reply to other questions. "When they name their candidates, then the federation's political machinery goes into action."

He said that some unions take part in electing delegates to national political party conventions, but they go as Democrats or Republicans "as American citizens, and that's their business and not the business of the AFL-CIO."

Meany said that he raised the issue in the council meeting and it was approved unanimously after detailed discussion.

lation, declaring that the health of the American people is too important for further delay. It reaffirmed also the federation's position on fair housing and its support for legislation to deal with the acute problem of illegal aliens.

Increased funds for higher education and maintenance of tuition within the reach of ordinary families as well as extension and more funds for vocational education also won council approval.

The council took special notice of the plight of the unemployed in terms of jobless benefits with the critical need of both short term and long term improvement, and the problem of employe health benefits running out after about a month of unemployment leaving many workers and their families vulnerable.

It pointed up also the problem of unemployed workers existing on limited jobless benefits who face the threat of losing their homes because of missed mortgage payments and urged a federal emergency program to plug the gap.

In a series of press conferences Meany made the following comments:

● The federation is strongly opposed to wage-price controls. "We got burned very badly. We had 32 months of wage and price controls that did not control prices but did very, very effectively control wages. It was grossly inequitable and we will not buy it."

● Many Americans are reaching the point where they are no longer consumers and unemployment is causing more unemployment and the "whole economy is going to suffer."

● The Administration should "get us back into the government housing business. Get us back to where we have FHA and VA mortgages at 5¾ and 6 percent. Six percent mortgage money would revive the housing industry."

● The AFL-CIO state federations are organizing action meetings on the program adopted recently by the federation's General Board on the economic emergency because that's where the greatest impact can be achieved.

● There will have to be serious consideration of a shorter workweek in order to make more jobs. Wage demands are going to be tied pretty much to inflation, but a possible depression has a tendency to moderate wage demands.

● Sec. of State Henry Kissinger deceived the American people on the trade bill and the arrangement with the Soviet Union on Jewish migration. "He deceived the Congress and if he deceived (Sen. Henry) Jackson, Jackson didn't say anything about it and Jackson wasn't the least bit upset about it."

● The minimum wage should be at least $3 an hour in terms of today's prices and to keep the wage floor above the poverty level. The argument that an increase in the wage floor would cause layoffs is false—it's an argument raised for 40 years and it has "just never happened."

● Kissinger's foreign policy "has got to lead us to eventual disaster. His policy is a give-away policy . . . to our economic enemies," the Arab oil states. His policy is "just plain ordinary appeasement, and appeasement is a form of blackmail and blackmail never works."

● Government programs for bailing-out ailing corporations "are behind us. . . . I would hesitate to approve a bailout for any corporation."

At a meeting of the COPE Administrative committee — the council plus the COPE Operating Committee—Meany said that the AFL-CIO's political arm continues to function well. The session heard reports on the effectiveness of COPE in the 1974 elections, the operation of the register-and-vote campaigns, the computerization of electoral information and the strong possibility of passage this year of the registration-by-mail legislation.

A delegation of leaders from the British Trades Union Congress met with the council and described their domestic problems—greatly similar to those in the U.S.

Stiff Law Asked to Curb Hiring of Illegal Aliens

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Legislation to deal with the "acute and growing problem" of seven million illegal aliens in the United States was urged by the AFL-CIO with emphasis on making it a crime for an employer to harbor them.

Congressional action has "long been an urgent objective of the AFL-CIO," the Executive Council said, but it has been blocked by Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Immigration Subcommittee.

Despite an increase in the number of illegal aliens deported annually, the net increase in the number of "illegals" continues to grow. This year, the council said, because of fewer immigration inspections the problem is expected to become increasingly aggravated in a period of rising unemployment.

In both 1972 and '73 the House passed legislation that would have established a three-stage enforcement procedure which was considered not strong enough by the AFL-CIO. But further action was stalemated by Eastland's refusal to allow his subcommittee to meet to consider the bill.

"His intransigence has blocked all efforts to erect barriers to importation and employment of low-paid foreign workers at the expense of American workers," the council said.

It demanded that "Eastland abandon his effort to impose a new 'bracero' program and urged Congress to strengthen the twice-passed House bill by placing responsibility for compliance clearly and directly on the employer—not on self-serving statements by employes — by strengthening the penalties for violations and giving the federal courts jurisdiction to restrain and enjoin violations. It added:

"We believe the illegal alien problem clearly calls for substantial increases in the funds needed by the Immigration and Naturalization Service to enforce the law and that these should be promptly provided by Congress."

The council pointed out that the only bill Eastland is willing to consider would provide for importation of foreign farm workers when domestic workers are not available at the low wages set by employers —a program killed by Congress in 1962.

Truce Talks Urged In Northern Ireland

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A negotiated settlement of the political and religious differences that have wracked Northern Ireland "is vital to the peace and security of the whole of Ireland," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

A council resolution urged as an essential prelude to negotiations "a truce guaranteed by all factions within Northern Ireland, participated in by the Republic of Ireland and Great Britain."

It warned, however, that "no truce can be achieved as long as political repression, religious and economic discrimination, press censorship and the detention of persons without trial by jury are practiced in the name of justice in Northern Ireland."

Regional Counsel Posts Filled by Labor Board

Appointment of four persons to regional posts of assistant general counsel was announced by the National Labor Relations Board.

Thomas R. Wilks will supervise NLRB field activities of six offices in the Northeast. William G. Stack will be responsible for operations of NLRB offices in the Far West.

John P. Falcone will observe NLRB operations in the southeastern quarter of the nation. Thomas M. Harvey will manage six NLRB offices in the Midwest.

Health Care Coverage Urged for Unemployed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for immediate passage of a bill to protect workers who lose their health insurance coverage when they become unemployed.

The federation's Executive Council specifically endorsed a bill introduced by Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) that would simply extend existing or prior coverage provided by the unemployed worker's health benefit plan.

The premium cost for continuation of this coverage would be paid from federal general revenues, and the program would be administered by existing unemployment insurance offices. The plan could be implemented almost immediately after passage.

A recent survey conducted by the Library of Congress for a number of congressmen disclosed that more than 80 percent of workers laid off during 1974 lost their health insurance coverage. About two-thirds of workers covered by health plans have no health insurance after being unemployed for a month or more, the council said. Jobless workers must pay the premium, usually at exorbitant individual rates, if they wish to continue the health coverage, with these costs coming at a time when they are least able to do so.

"This situation is intolerable," the council said, "and would not have existed had Congress enacted National Health Security which provides health benefits for all residents of the U.S. whether they are employed or unemployed."

For those workers who did not have health care coverage when they were working, the council proposed an amendment to the bipartisan legislation to provide for their coverage under the general provisions of Medicaid.

Mortgage Relief Sought for Jobless To Avert Widespread Foreclosures

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Legislation to provide mortgage relief payments to guard against widespread home foreclosures due to unemployment was called for by the AFL-CIO.

Foreclosures "are certain to increase as unemployment grows," the Executive Council said in a statement, and there is consequently an "urgent need" for Congress to act.

The council's statement reviewing the disastrous state of housing called also for Congress to enact a program "to make 6 percent mortgage loans available for middle-income home purchases, and to make all committed funds under special mortgage purchase programs available at 6 percent."

It called in addition for new authority for conventional public housing programs, HUD approval of new housing projects, extension of home ownership and rental assistance payments programs with directions to the Administration to reactivate these programs and for Congress to release an additional $700 million for housing for the elderly.

The severity of the housing depression was spelled out in the council's statement in terms of housing starts down more than one million units, or 43 percent, from the 1972 level. From October 1972 to December 1974 the decline in the annual rate of new housing starts was 65 percent.

Unemployment among construction workers is now close to one million, the council pointed out, and will continue to rise as the volume of construction work under way declines.

The Administration, the statement asserted, "has failed to counteract the two basic causes of the housing slump: high mortgage interest rates and the deliberate drastic cutback in federally-assisted housing production."

The number of unsold homes remains above 400,000, equal to about one year's supply at the current rate of sales. By the end of 1974, the council noted, only about one-fifth of the $10 billion committed by the government during the year under special programs for purchase of mortgages at interest rates of 7¾ to 8¾ percent had been used because most families cannot afford to buy homes at those interest rates.

Housing starts under the low- and moderate-income programs declined from 339,000 in 1972 to 115,000 in 1974 as a result of an Administration-ordered moratorium; $400 million in annual assistance payments for homeownership and rental housing remains unused. Other programs remain on the shelf and the Administration has no plans to use available funds, the council said.

In light of the evidence, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to protect unemployed homeowners facing possible foreclosures, to make mortgage funds available at a lower rate and to spur the use of available housing programs that will help meet the needs of the people and provide jobs for the unemployed workers.

True Welfare Reform

AMERICA'S TWIN economic woes—galloping recession and raging inflation—make it imperative that this nation re-examine its programs to provide necessary assistance to the growing number of poor and disadvantaged.

Approximately 23 million Americans live in poverty; another 10 million are considered "near poor." Yet less than half—15 million—are being helped by the nation's welfare programs.

Welfare is neither the basic cause of, nor the solution to, the problems of poverty. Most people are on welfare because of poor education, inadequate health care, chronic unemployment, lack of job opportunities and discrimination. For many, welfare is a necessary supplement to extremely low wages. Thus, the way to reduce welfare rolls is to tackle head-on the problems that cause poverty.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council urges the Congress to begin the long-overdue task of reforming the nation's welfare system, by:

First, a legislatively mandated national commitment to a full employment policy, including a permanent public service employment program to provide jobs at decent wages for those who cannot find work.

Second, a strengthened and improved unemployment insurance system to meet the needs of unemployed workers, including new entrants as well as workers re-entering the workforce, who are now forced to resort to welfare.

Third, restoring welfare to its residual function so that it can meet the needs of those it was intended to serve. With the new Supplementary Security Income program, the federal government took over responsibility for assistance to the needy elderly, blind and disabled. The federal government should also assume responsibility for the welfare of all the rest of the needy, including families with dependent children, childless couples and individuals. The new federal program should contain the following elements:

- A national minimum payment, raised as quickly as possible by stages to not less than the poverty level. States with benefits above the national minimum should be required not to reduce payment levels. Payments should be pegged to the cost of living, like social security and SSI. Until these changes in the welfare program are made, families with needy unemployed fathers should be eligible for welfare in every state.
- The job rights and employment conditions of state and local employes who presently administer welfare must be protected when the federal government takes over the program.
- During the present emergency the federal government should bear the increased costs of welfare. Obviously, financially hard-pressed states and cities cannot bear the additional burden.

Fourth, universally available child care for mothers who choose voluntarily to work. We insist that child care must not be considered a welfare-related program or be used as a device to force poor mothers into jobs and out of the home.

Welfare is not a solution to the nation's unemployment problems; only jobs can cure joblessness. But in this society, based on human compassion, the welfare system must truly meet the needs of those citizens it serves or they shall be condemned to a life of poverty and deprivation. That we will never accept.

Airlines Should Reinvent Beds To Beat Jet Lag on Long Trips

By John P. Roche

THE OTHER DAY I was talking to a friend who had just returned from the Far East. I inquired how the trip was, and he said, "Great, except for the jet lag. When I got to Tokyo, it took me two days to figure out where I was, and I felt like a moon-man for almost a week when I returned to New York." A day later another friend arrived from Saigon and registered the same complaint: "When I got back I wished I was still in the Army so I could pull out my dog tags every so often to find out who I was." This is a common phenomenon.

Indeed, one of the funniest experiences of our married life occurred in Washington the night after I had returned, without layovers, from Southeast Asia. There was a closet next to my bed and, about two in the morning, according to my extremely reliable wife, I was hanging around among the clothes.

"What in the world are you doing?" she asked. "What do you mean, what am I doing?" said I. "Don't you know this is the exit to Bangkok?" This broke her up—I suspect she lunched off it for weeks—but the intellectual disequilibrium is no laughing matter. I understand that major corporations never allow executives to get down to business for at least two days after a long flight.

To revert to my conversation with the friend back from Tokyo, he went on to ask, "How in the world can someone like Dean Rusk or Henry Kissinger climb off a plane and go right into negotiations? They might give away the crown jewels without even knowing it." This surprised me, because I assumed it was general knowledge—Air Force 2, the Secretary of State's usual plane, is equipped with two beds and a number of Pullman-style berths that come down from the sides in the back of the aircraft.

This really makes a qualitative difference. At one time or another in my White House years I slept from Korea to Alaska, from Jakarta to Guam, from Hawaii to Washington, and on several other long journeys, as snug as the proverbial bug in a rug. The only difference between these bunks and the usual Pullmans is that, of course, on retiring, you strap in.

Sleep seems to have a benign influence on one's inner clock (real sleep, that is; not dozing in a chair, however comfortable, with somebody always clambering over you, or lurching down the aisle). At least in my experience, it virtually eliminates jet lag.

Now I have never displayed any entrepreneurial talent, and besides I doubt if the idea could be patented, but I would like to suggest to the hard-headed capitalists who run our overseas airlines that maybe there is some money to be made by pioneering in bunks. (As I recall there used to be a Boeing on the transatlantic run, back when it was four props and 16 hours, that came equipped with bunks, but I could never afford one. However, since someone has just reinvented the trolley car, perhaps I can reinvent air-beds.)

What makes this suggestion even more sensible is that I have not taken a long flight in two years that was more than half-full. With all that spare space around, why not give it a try?

To be even more specific, the last time I took a 747 to Europe I splurged on first class (before, I hasten to add, they put the fare on a rocket and sent it up). After dinner I wanted to smoke a cigar, which is frowned upon, but the stewardess suggested I go to the upstairs lounge, that funny-looking bump on the roof from which one almost expects to see 50-calibre machine guns protruding. Up I went to smoke in solitary bliss for an hour or so, interrupted only by my friendly, local, onboard service manager inquiring whether I would like a drink.

I HAVE NEVER BEEN ABLE to read on planes—subconsciously I don't really believe they can stay in the air, which makes it difficult to lose oneself in the printed word—so I amused myself by figuring out how many bunks that cabin would hold. Geometry was never my strong suit, but I calculated that probably a dozen double-deckers could be squeezed in. That figure may be high, but the space is otherwise a complete waste.

Aha! But what about the price? Well here let us return to square one. If a high-priced executive is grounded for two days after arrival in, say, Tokyo, that time is money—a lot of money. If, on the other hand, he could march out of the plane clear-eyed and rested, it might be possible to go right to work. In any event, somebody could certainly cost-out the potentialities. And if any airline wants to find out how to install bunks over the tourist seats, I'm sure the Military Airlift Command will be glad to provide technical assistance. Any takers?

Executive Council Statement:

Minimum Standards Essential To Modernize Jobless Benefits

The following is excerpted from a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 17, 1975, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

ADEQUATE unemployment insurance for the millions of jobless workers is more desperately needed today than at any time since it was enacted, but fragmentation in separate state programs has stymied necessary changes. The AFL-CIO has long favored federalization of the system. If this recommendation had been heeded, the Congress could have long ago strengthened the program to raise benefit levels and bring about other essential improvements.

We reaffirm our support for federalization of the unemployment insurance program with full protection of the job rights and employment conditions of all state employes who presently administer unemployment insurance. But until that step is taken, we call for immediate enactment of federal minimum standards.

The Ford Administration finally recognized the serious nature of the growing unemployment problem in late 1974. In desperation, the Administration requested the 93rd Congress, during its closing hours, to enact emergency stop-gap unemployment compensation legislation to deal with the crisis.

These measures merely attempt to patch-up the existing outdated system of unemployment compensation, but the real need is for permanent improvements in the program. Fundamental and basic improvements must be made in the unemployment insurance porgram if it is to meet the needs of a modern industrial economy.

In addition, immediate steps must be taken to alleviate the economic hardships imposed upon jobless workers who are the victims of the present economic crisis and of the past neglect of the program.

We urge the Congress, as a matter of immediate national concern, to enact both short-term and permanent improvements in the nation's unemployment insurance program.

In order to implement these recommendations in the quickest and most efficient manner and avoid the need for state legislative action, the cost of these improvements should be financed with federal revenues.

Extended unemployment compensation benefits should be made available to jobless workers recently covered by the Emergency Jobs & Employment Assistance Act of 1974. The duration of these benefits should be the same as the duration provided for jobless workers covered by the permanent program.

The waiting week—a week for which benefits are not paid—required under the provisions of most state laws should be compensated.

The existing benefit structure of the program should be improved. The individual's weekly benefit amount should be increased to two-thirds of his or her former weekly wage, up to a maximum weekly benefit amount equal to 75 percent of the state average weekly wage.

Unemployment compensation protection should be extended on a permanent basis to all wage and salary workers, including farm workers, domestic workers, and all public employes.

A weekly benefit standard should be established under which every jobless worker will be entitled to at least 66⅔ percent of his or her former weekly earnings up to a maximum weekly benefit of at least 75 percent of the state average weekly wage.

Uniform eligibility and duration standards are essential to proper operation of the program. Every jobless worker with 20 weeks of work, or its equivalent, should be entitled to a benefit duration of at least 26 weeks. Jobless workers with less labor force attachment should be eligible for benefits and their duration period should be determined in relation to the basic standard outlined above.

THE EXISTING triggered extended unemployment compensation program should be abolished and replaced with a 100 percent federally financed extended benefit program. This program should entitle all jobless workers to an additional 26-week federal benefit period when their regular state benefits are exhausted. Extended benefits should be coordinated with a comprehensive program of job counseling, training, retraining, upgrading of skills, rehabilitation service if needed, relocation assistance, and job placement.

The financing of the unemployment insurance program should be placed on a firm and adequate tax base. The taxable wage base should, as a first step, be fixed at a level equal to the state annual average wage in covered employment. In subsequent steps, it should be raised to a level equal to the taxable wage base used to finance the OASDHI (social security) program.

The adequacy of state unemployment insurance reserve funds should be assured by enactment of a minimum federal standard of reserve adequacy each state would be required to meet and maintain. It is essential for the solvency of the program that this standard be established at an early date.

In addition, the Congress should extend the protection of unemployment compensation to new entrants into the labor force and to former workers attempting to re-enter the labor force.

Modernization of the unemployment compensation system has been too long delayed. The improvements the AFL-CIO recommends would provide decent protection to all jobless workers. It would help to meet the problems of unemployment stemming from monetary and fiscal policies, technological changes, environmental improvements, and energy adjustments.

Equity in Tax Rebate Pressed:

Sinking Economy Cuts Deeper Than Official Statistics Show

NEARLY A MILLION production jobs have been stripped from the U.S. economy, as the deep recession sinks closer to a depression, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said on Labor News Conference.

Clayman stressed that even the "horrendous figures" on industrial unemployment don't show the whole picture. He pointed out that cutbacks have also shortened the workweeks and paychecks of industrial workers an average of two and one-half hours over the past year.

Taking sharp issue with the Ford Administration's tax cut and rebate proposals, Clayman charged that the plan "gives too much to those who don't need it—the richer people—and too little to those who really need it—the middle-income families and the poor." He said the AFL-CIO proposal that a larger share of the tax relief go to low- and middle-income taxpayers would mean more equity and fairness and do more to boost the sagging economy.

"It makes good economic sense" to channel the heaviest part of the rebates to ordinary taxpayers, who are more likely to spend it on consumer goods and help rebuild economic strength, he declared, rather than to high-income, wealthier taxpayers, who will "put it away in the bank where it will simply lie unused."

Clayman also scored President Ford's attempt to "conserve energy by applying special taxes on gasoline or by import fees" which, he said, would mean that "people who can't afford to buy gasoline at higher prices will simply be wiped out of the market."

"The crisis is clear," he said, "we do need to conserve, and the most equitable way of doing it is rationing, so that everyone, rich or poor, small or great will get the same treatment."

He also cautioned against relaxing job health and safety as a trade-off for more factory jobs. "We can't say that the price of a job is injury, death or disease—flesh or blood," he declared.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

READING THE PRESIDENT'S Economic Message to Congress and the Report of his Council of Economic Advisers is the most fascinating example of hindsight that American history is likely to produce for a long time.

"The economy is in a severe recession," said President Ford as he opened his report to the nation.

"The story of the past year was one of inflation and recession," said his Council of Economic Advisers in confirmation of that ugly word "stagflation."

"The most pressing concern of policy is to halt the decline in production and employment so that growth of output can resume and unemployment can be reduced," the economic advisers continued, admitting that "as 1975 begins, the unemployment rate stands at its highest level since 1958 and production and unemployment are declining sharply."

These words mean a long overdue confirmation of what the labor movement and its economists have been predicting from the day that Richard Nixon entered the White House in January 1969 and launched his "tight money" policy. It was a policy that, he promised, would lick the relatively mild inflation of the day without adding to unemployment or cutting back on national production.

Ten months later the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's national convention:

"The government's restrictive economic policies and the highest interest rates in 100 years slowed the pace of economic activities by mid-1969 and threatened rising unemployment and recession."

By the time of the federation's next convention in November of 1971, the Executive Council's report on the state of the economy was even grimmer. It accused the President of trying to "psych" the economy toward prosperity through "mini-expansion measures" that represented no change in policy but merely a change in rhetoric.

NOR WAS THAT THE END of labor warnings. At its 1973 convention, the council again foresaw what was coming when the very first paragraph of its report declared:

"The American economy, in mid-1973, was heading into a sharp slowdown during the second half of the year and a possible recession with continuing inflation in early 1974 if trends were not quickly reversed."

Citing the Nixon wage-price controls that sharply limited labor's wage increases without lowering prices, the council pointed to a tightening monetary policy, sharply rising interest rates, continued high unemployment—then 5 percent as compared with the now expected 8 percent of 1975—still soaring inflation which had not then reached the double-digit heights of 1974, decreased buying power of the average worker and greatly increased profits.

Today a new President has launched new programs with the gloomiest kind of predictions of worse to come, lightened only by presidential optimism that belies the "economic assumptions" of his own budget proposals to Congress.

These foresee: less "real" national production in 1975 than in 1974; consumer prices actually up from the 1974 increases of 11 percent to 11.3 percent; unemployment up to 8.1 percent in 1975 and horrendous predictions of 7.9 percent in 1976 and 7.5 percent in 1977.

More than one commentator, in Congress and out, already has described the Ford program as the Nixon program brought up to date—continuing tight money; inadequate tax relief directed heavily toward the upper tax brackets; sharp cuts in the social services at the expense of the elderly and the poor; inadequate job-creating proposals in the public service field.

All of this is far from the vitality-filled days of Franklin Roosevelt and his "New Deal" and the imaginative new programs some of which have endured to this day.

A MILLION JOBS have been stripped from U.S. industrial production as the economy continues to sink from deep recession toward depression, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman, center, of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Phillip Kadis of the Washington Star-News. The weekly program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Soviet Role Hit In East-West 'Union' Parley

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Executive Council denounced as a "visible product of hypocrisy" the East-West Trade Union Conference to be "held under the roof of the ILO" in Geneva.

The conference is "another example of a long-sought Soviet political goal," the council said, "won through patient cultivation of Western European labor centers through exchange visits and mutual endeavor."

The council reaffirmed the federation's opposition to any and all exchanges with totalitarian labor front organizations, "particularly those of the Soviet Union and its satellite states." It added that it views the "fraternization of democratic Western European labor centers with Communist Party labor fronts with disgust."

Recalling the AFL-CIO policy spelled out at its founding convention in 1955, the council strongly reaffirmed the position and said the federation "will not compromise its organizational freedom by paying homage to the so-called 'labor movements' of totalitarian regimes. . . ."

It added, "we are saddened and concerned by the dissolution of that resolve in the Western European labor bodies, the last bastions of freedom in a disunited Europe."

Missouri IBEW Leader Heads Senate Labor Unit

Jefferson City, Mo.—State Sen. Donald J. Gralike, president of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1 in St. Louis, has been appointed chairman of the Missouri Senate Labor & Management Relations Committee.

Gralike, a Democrat, served in the Missouri House of Representatives for 10 years before he was elected to the Senate in 1972.

Gralike has been a member of IBEW Local 1 for 25 years and serves on the executive board of the Missouri AFL-CIO.

OFFICERS of Building & Construction Trades Dept. hear from John T. Dunlop, who has been announced as President Ford's choice to be Secretary of Labor. Seated beside him is Department President Robert A. Georgine.

Spiraling Tuition Spurs Call for More Funding

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the federal and state governments to establish funding levels high enough to keep the cost of a college education within reach of the sons and daughters of American working families.

"Mounting costs and diminishing federal, state and private financial support have caused college tuition to rise sharply," the council noted. "Increasing numbers of young people are finding themselves priced out of the colleges and universities.

"It is a vicious cycle. As enrollments fall short of expectations, per student costs increase and a new wave of tuition increases follows, followed by a further decrease in enrollments."

The AFL-CIO has joined in a renewed campaign for low tuition with a number of educational organizations, including the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, the National Association of State Universities & Land Grant Colleges, and the American Association of Community & Junior Colleges.

In its statement, the council said this campaign must be carried to the federal government and to the state legislatures. The AFL-CIO has consistently supported the principle of low tuition in higher education and free tuition at least through the junior college level.

Well-to-do students have little problem meeting rising tuition costs, the council noted. But to low- and middle-income families, faced with a widening gap between available student aid and higher tuition costs, the matter is of critical importance.

The council noted that higher education programs enacted by Congress during the 1960s have for the most part died for lack of funding under the past two Republican administrations.

The scant federal funds that have been available for higher education have been increasingly limited to student aid, largely restricted to students from low-income families. And even these would be reduced by $130 million under President Ford's 1976 budget, despite increasing tuition costs, the council said.

Action Called Urgent:

Congress Pressed On Health Security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called upon Congress to ignore the threat of a presidential veto and move swiftly to enact some form of national health insurance.

"The health of the American people is just too important for further delay," the federation's Executive Council declared.

"We reject the claims of the Administration that social progress must be postponed in times of economic difficulty," the council asserted. "Millions of Americans cannot obtain or afford medical care. They need help as soon as possible."

Noting that a majority of congressmen pledged their support of national health insurance during last fall's elections, the council observed: "We expect they will keep their pledge."

Of several bills already introduced in the current session of Congress, the National Health Security program sponsored in the House by Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.) and in the Senate by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) is the one favored by organized labor.

"We support Health Security because it is the only program that would provide quality health care as a matter of right for all Americans, financed through tried, proven and accepted social principles," the council declared.

Besides universal coverage, the Kennedy-Corman proposal would provide a comprehensive, simple standard of benefits; strong cost and quality controls; no deductibles and no coinsurance; reform of the health care delivery system, and strong consumer representation.

In addition, the council observed, only Health Security would provide comprehensive coverage for unemployed workers when they lose their group health insurance because they are laid off.

The council noted also that the Health Security bill introduced in this year's Congress is stronger than versions of the measure previously offered. The new bill includes the following improvements:

- Sound financing through a higher ceiling on individual contributory taxes. The proposed ceiling has been raised from $15,000 to $20,000.
- Grants for local nonprofit agencies to develop and provide social care services to the aged and chronically ill.
- Protection of the employment and benefit rights of employes in health care institutions.
- Use of free-standing centers for treatment of alcohol and drug abuse, family planning and rehabilitation as providers of health care.

Crisis Points Up Need For Welfare Reform

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The current economic crisis makes it imperative that Congress begin the long overdue task of reforming the nation's welfare system, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Any new program must provide necessary assistance to the "growing number of poor and disadvantaged," the council said, including the following proposals:

- A permanent public service employment program to provide jobs at decent wages for those who cannot find work.
- A strengthened unemployment compensation system to meet the needs of the jobless, including new entrants as well as workers re-entering the workforce, who are now forced to resort to welfare.
- An extension of federal responsibility to all the needy including families with dependent children, childless couples and individuals as well as the needy elderly, blind and disabled.
- A universally available program of child care for mothers who choose voluntarily to work, but not to be used as a device to force poor mothers into jobs and out of the home.

The progress in the Johnson years of the war on poverty ended in the Nixon years, the council said, and a retreat set in until today about 23 million Americans live in poverty and another 10 million are considered "near poor." Yet less than half—15 million—are being helped by the nation's welfare programs.

The council pointed out that most people are on welfare because of poor education, inadequate health care, chronic unemployment, lack of job opportunities and discrimination. Welfare recipients include persons in all age, race and social groups, it noted.

Neither a so-called "negative income tax" nor dismantling of existing programs will solve the problems of welfare recipients, the council said, and a real job of reform is necessary.

In terms of federal responsibility for the various groups of needy the council urged a national minimum payment raised by stages to not less than the poverty level and pegged to the cost of living. The national government, it said, should bear the increased costs of welfare during the present emergency to ease the burden on the states and cities.

Labor Backs Extension Of Vocational Aid Act

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council—warning that the Ford Administration seems "determined to throw vocational education into a state of total chaos"—affirmed its support of a House bill that would extend the current Vocational Education Act until 1982.

The measure, introduced by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), also would increase basic federal grants to the states under the act by $500 million a year.

"Regrettably, the Ford Administration is proving itself to be no more friendly to vocational education than was the Nixon Administration," the council observed, noting that President Ford's 1976 budget proposals include cuts of $125 million in state grants for vocational education.

The council pointed out that the Administration's cuts are based on a proposed law which has not yet been introduced in Congress. The legislation would consolidate all of the federal categorical programs into a single block grant to the states, funded at a level even lower than the existing categorized grants.

"This consolidation program would open the way for the states to ignore such well-identified needs as vocational education for the handicapped and the economically disadvantaged," the council said. "The failure of the states to meet these needs led to the enactment of the categorical programs in the first place."

The council noted that the 1963 Vocational Education Act and its amendments specifically earmarked funds for the handicapped and the economically disadvantaged.

The laws, enacted in large part as a result of organized labor's efforts, directed vocational education more realistically to the world of work, and provided a degree of flexibility that had never before existed.

One major concern of organized labor now, the council said, is the possibility the Administration's proposals "could erode support for the classroom-related part of apprenticeship programs, especially in the big cities where competitive pressure for available funds is particularly severe."

"We believe support for apprenticeship training needs to be strengthened rather than weakened," the council declared.

"The apprenticeship system has been responsible for the development of America's unparalleled supply of skilled labor, and any proposal which would endanger it should be firmly rejected."

Full Commitment Held Vital for Fair Housing

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for a strong government commitment to fair housing and reaffirmed its own dedication to adequate enforcement of the law it helped pass.

Given the impact of inflation on minorities, the drastic shortage of low-income housing and the problem of home and job location, the question of fair housing is more important than ever before, the federation's Executive Council declared.

The council statement recalled that the AFL-CIO strongly supported passage of the fair housing law in 1968, adding that seven years later "much remains to be done to implement that policy."

Discrimination in the sale and rental of housing and the lower income of minorities may combine to become the "racism of the '70s," the council noted, quoting a finding from the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Correction of this "economic-racial exclusion" is an extremely complex matter, the council emphasized, and said it will take a strong commitment to and adequate enforcement of the laws already on the books.

"This commitment must come from the federal government, state and local bodies and concerned private organizations," the statement said, adding:

"The obligation to promote fair housing can only be met if this country's national housing goal for low and moderate income families is also met, expanding the supply of housing available at a price lower income households can afford."

Reaffirming the AFL-CIO's commitment "to the goal of providing equal housing opportunities for all Americans," the council called on the federation's "state and local central bodies and affiliated international unions to continue their efforts to further this goal."

Shipping Decline Grows:

Maritime Trades Hit Cargo Bill Veto

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The U.S. merchant marine faces increasing difficulties stemming from the nation's economic crisis and President Ford's veto of legislation requiring that a greater share of oil imports be carried in American tankers, the Maritime Trades Dept. reported.

The answer, the department's executive board asserted in a resolution, is a six-point program that will strengthen the merchant marine and update its objectives in light of world conditions and the current state of the U.S. economy.

The board heard MTD President Paul Hall review the oil import legislation as a great legislative victory that was subverted by a regrettable veto by a man who was thought to be a friend of the maritime industry.

Hall reported also that an ad hoc maritime committee, formed last year to seek a unified approach to the problems of the industry and deal with jurisdictional problems, had decided to become a special section of the MTD and operate under the department's auspices on a self-financing basis.

During 1974 and through early 1975, the resolution pointed out, the "volume of cargo available to U.S. ships declined" with many ships laid up and "thousands of shipyard and shipboard workers laid off from their jobs."

The President's failure to sign the bill calling for 30 percent of imported oil to be carried in U.S.-flag tankers deprived these tankers of a source of cargo "and by the end of 1974 more than 1.5 million tons of tankers were laid up. Work on ships under construction was interrupted."

Thousands of seamen, shipyard workers and workers in support industries joined the growing number of unemployed, the statement said, as the multinational oil companies continue to use the foreign-flag ships of "their foreign subsidiaries as a convenient rig for tax dodging and transfer pricing" to the disadvantage of the U.S. consumer and taxpayer.

The board called for:

- Development of new sources of cargo, through legislation if necessary, including dry bulk cargoes and liquid bulk cargoes such as chemicals and petroleum.
- Enlargement of the role of the U.S. merchant fleet in the operations of the Military Sealift Command. The U.S. Navy "must employ" the merchant marine for its peacetime requirements to keep it properly trained and prepared.
- Creation of a single, independent federal maritime agency consolidating the activities and services performed by a variety of agencies.
- Continued expansion of America's inland waterways transportation network.
- Establishment of U.S.-flag control of marine services to American outer continental shelf development and ocean mining activities.
- The development, particularly on the northeast coast of the United States, of water transportation as a major mass transit mode.

The board, after hearing a report from MTD Administrator O. William Moody, also approved a resolution on preserving the Jones Act covering U.S. coastal and inland shipping including a call for a congressional survey on oil company plans to meet the shipping requirements of the Alaska pipeline. The resolution said the oil companies were involved in "merchant marine brinkmanship" in preparing for shipment of the oil.

The department has prepared and distributed a detailed report, titled "The Jones Act: Security for the United States and Americans," as part of its legislative campaign in the current Congress.

Another resolution strongly opposed the appropriation of any funds from the defense budget for naval vessels engaged in non-combatant supply or support functions that can be performed by the private merchant marine.

In a resolution directed at President Ford's veto of the Energy Security Transportation Act—the legislation calling for use of more U.S.-flag tankers to handle oil imports—the department's board said the bill would "have aided consumers and the environment" and that Ford vetoed the measure because congressional approval "marked the first legislative defeat of the oil corporations." The board urged immediate efforts to pass the legislation in the new Congress.

The department issued the third in a series of reports on the U.S. oil industry and the energy crisis, entitled "Big Oil vs. The People: The Inevitable Showdown," and adopted a resolution urging a seven-point program including changes in the tax laws, use of the anti-trust statutes and the possibility of treating the oil industry as a public utility subject to federal regulation.

PROGRAM TO STRENGTHEN America's merchant fleet was adopted by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. The MTD executive board said the outlook for U.S. shipping was dimmed by President Ford's veto of a labor-backed bill reserving a portion of oil import cargoes for American-flag tankers.

ILO Warned on Granting Observer Status to PLO

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The International Labor Organization was warned by the AFL-CIO that its usefulness to the United States would be at stake if it grants observer status to the Palestine Liberation Organization. A statement by the federation's Executive Council said:

"In the next few days, the Governing Body of the International Labor Organization will consider the admission of the Palestine Liberation Organization to observer status.

"Following the shameful greeting given to PLO strongman Yasser Arafat by the United Nations in New York and his welcome to the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization, there is little doubt that PLO acceptance by the Governing Body will receive serious consideration.

"Support by the ILO Governing Body of the PLO application and the eventual acceptance of the PLO to observer status by the annual conference in Geneva should cause the United States to weigh the usefulness of the International Labor Organization in the future."

Steel Union Forges Plan to Combat Cancer Risk to Coke-Oven Workers

The Steelworkers forged an action plan to correct coke-oven health hazards that incorporates improved federal safety standards and wider protection through collective bargaining.

Delegates to a two-day conference in Washington adopted 17 resolutions aimed at reducing the cancer risks involved in coke-oven production and to properly compensate workers already affected by occupational illness.

Findings of medical researchers show that the cancer death rate among coke-oven workers is 2.5 to 10 times greater than that of all workers in the basic steel industry.

In spelling out the USWA action program, the 275 delegates called for earlier retirement and a workweek of 32 hours or less for coke-oven workers. Several other resolutions proposed special compensation and benefits.

USWA safety and health groups have been pressing the Labor Dept. for a number of years to develop a stricter federal standard to reduce the cancer risk for coke-oven workers.

But the union has encountered a foot-dragging process, first through a delay in the issuance of a criteria document on the coke-oven hazard and later in formation of a standards advisory committee. The committee was appointed last year only after the USWA had threatened to picket the Labor Dept.

What progress has been made in the battle against coke-oven hazards centers on the stepped-up efforts of the union since its first conference held in 1972.

"No other problem has received so much attention by this or any other union," USWA President I. W. Abel declared in keynoting the conference. Abel noted that union's 1974 contract negotiated with the basic steel industry provides for a $2 million research fund to finance a labor-management study into the hazards of coke-oven operations.

Sen. Richard Schweiker (R-Pa.) predicted in an address to the conference that Congress will enact this year the labor-supported workers' compensation law that would establish national standards on benefits for job-related injuries, illness and death.

While the compensation bill holds a top priority in the Senate Labor Committee, USWA Legislative Director John J. Sheehan warned that employers would make a strong lobbying push to kill the legislation.

Sheehan said the proposed coke-oven standard must not only require the industry to provide the best available technology to reduce emissions and even develop a new coke production process, but also consider the total working career of employes exposed to the emissions.

Sheehan serves on the standards advisory committee along with Dan Hannan of the USWA safety and health department and Joseph Odorich, director of USWA District 15. Odorich, whose district represents more coke-oven workers than any other in the union, was chairman of the conference.

Dr. Edward J. Baier, acting director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, said the federal government's studies are still inadequate to determine the exact cause of the high rate of cancer among coke-oven workers. A complex mixture of substances is emitted when coal is converted to coke, he noted.

For this reason, Baier said, the 1973 NIOSH criteria document on emissions concentrated on medical surveillance, worker education and fundamental engineering aspects of coke-oven operations.

Drs. Thomas Mancuso and Carol Redmond of the University of Pittsburgh noted that to date health research in coke production has been largely limited to mortality studies. Mancuso called for federal improvements to correct deficiencies in workers' compensation programs and for steel companies to release medical records on workers which are essential in the filing of compensation claims.

Some coke oven workers have expressed fears of medical examinations, a group of delegates told the conference. because of the belief that confirmation of an illness could mean the end of their working lives. They called for earlier retirement provisions, more liberal disability programs and increased spell time from exposure to the emissions.

Firemen & Oilers Add Unit of 5,300

A union holding bargaining rights for 5,300 non-teaching school workers in a Maryland county has affiliated with the Firemen & Oilers.

The affiliation with the AFL-CIO union was voted by the Montgomery County Council of Supporting Services Employees after more than a year of discussions. Officers and delegates of the council visited other locals of the Firemen & Oilers representing school workers, including the union's big Philadelphia local.

It resulted in the largest single affiliation in the history of the Firemen & Oilers.

Water Funds Decision Seen Creating Jobs

sarily covered by the ruling, are various other cases dealing with presidential impoundments—a device Nixon used more than any other President. Congress last year passed a budget and impoundment law which for the first time sets up a requirement for congressional review when a President seeks to withhold funds voted by Congress. But the law does not apply retroactively to past impoundments.

The $9 billion in clean water funds represents nearly half of the $19 billion that as of last December remained impounded under presidential directive. In addition, there has been a multibillion dollar holdup of federal highway aid funds, only partially alleviated by President Ford's recent announcement that he will release $2 billion to the states.

In terms of jobs, the Building & Construction Trades Dept. estimated that each $1 billion in contract construction generates directly and indirectly about 40,500 jobs.

It urged Ford "to comply immediately" with the Supreme Court decision on the clean water projects and asserted that "the same principle" requires release of additional impounded funds.

Veto Battle Looms:

Congress Rejects Ford Oil Tax Plan

President Ford said he will veto the bill. Although he had not done so when the AFL-CIO News went to press, the delay was seen as an effort to recruit the one-third plus one of the Senate or House needed to sustain the veto. The White House had hoped to keep the Senate vote below or at least close to the two-thirds mark. But 10 Republicans joined 56 Democrats in voting to suspend Ford's oil tax and only two Democrats voted with 26 Republicans to back the President.

The AFL-CIO General Board last month called on Congress to block the President's imposition of the special oil tariff, terming it "nothing more than another excise tax which would be paid by consumers and is particularly discriminatory against the industrialized Northeast."

Instead, the General Board's "action program" urged there should be a quota on oil imports with prices negotiated by the government and "a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing to minimize regional, industry and individual hardships."

The Administration has estimated that the consumer price index would jump an additional 2 percent under Ford's oil tax plan.

In other congressional developments:

• A House-Senate conference committee worked on a bill to stave off the collapse of the Penn Central and other bankrupt railroads with government-guaranteed loans and grants. The House voted 270-137 for a bill, strongly backed by rail unions, to provide $347 million in funds and the Senate earlier had approved a $275 million bill.

• The AFL-CIO joined with civil rights groups in urging the Senate to assert its right to vote on its own rules—including the rule that now requires a two-thirds vote to halt a filibuster.

A bipartisan group of senators—representing a majority of the Senate—is seeking to reduce the two-thirds requirement to 60 percent. But opponents of even this mild compromise have blocked a vote. The immediate issue before the Senate is whether a two-thirds majority is needed to end a filibuster against a change in the two-thirds rule at the start of a new Congress.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged the importance of a series of key procedural votes that would enable a majority of the Senate to work its will on the rules change. He stressed that "filibusters have been increasingly used to block vital economic, social and consumer issues."

CWA Sets Up Foundation to Honor Beirne

The executive board of the Communications Workers voted to establish a Joseph A. Beirne Memorial Foundation dedicated to furthering the interests of the late CWA founding president.

Beirne headed the CWA and its predecessor union from 1943 until his retirement because of ill health a few months before his death last Labor Day. He also had been a vice president of the AFL-CIO.

The foundation's objectives are to "develop, establish and finance programs in the advance of education and learning among all people, along with other programs of social concern."

It is designed to provide grants and fellowships and to fund symposiums for studies in the humanities, trade union affairs and vital social issues, in addition to furthering efforts to aid handicapped and retarded children.

Union Acts to Protect REA Worker Interests

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Railway & Airline Clerks pledged to protect the rights of the union's members employed by REA Express Inc., the nationwide small shipments concern that has petitioned for reorganization under federal bankruptcy laws.

BRAC is the principal collective bargaining agent for REA's workers, representing some 12,000 now actively employed, an additional 10,000 who have been furloughed in recent years, and an estimated 10,000 retirees.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis, in a statement issued here, said the union has engaged a Washington, D.C., law firm to represent the interests of the union and its members in the bankruptcy proceedings.

"It is almost inevitable that, in this complex bankruptcy proceeding in which there is a multitude of creditors, someone will want to make the active, furloughed and retired employes bear the brunt of the financial difficulty," Dennis said.

"BRAC will take every legal step to make certain that this does not happen," he added.

Dennis said the union would also cooperate with "all fair and honest efforts" to restore the company's financial health. He blamed the Ford Administration for its apparent inability "to turn the economy around so that unemployment may be curtailed and corporations can earn fair returns on investments, or borrow capital at fair interest rates."

REA's petition for reorganization was filed in federal court in New York City. In financial difficulties for years, the company listed assets of $44 million and liabilities of $55 million.

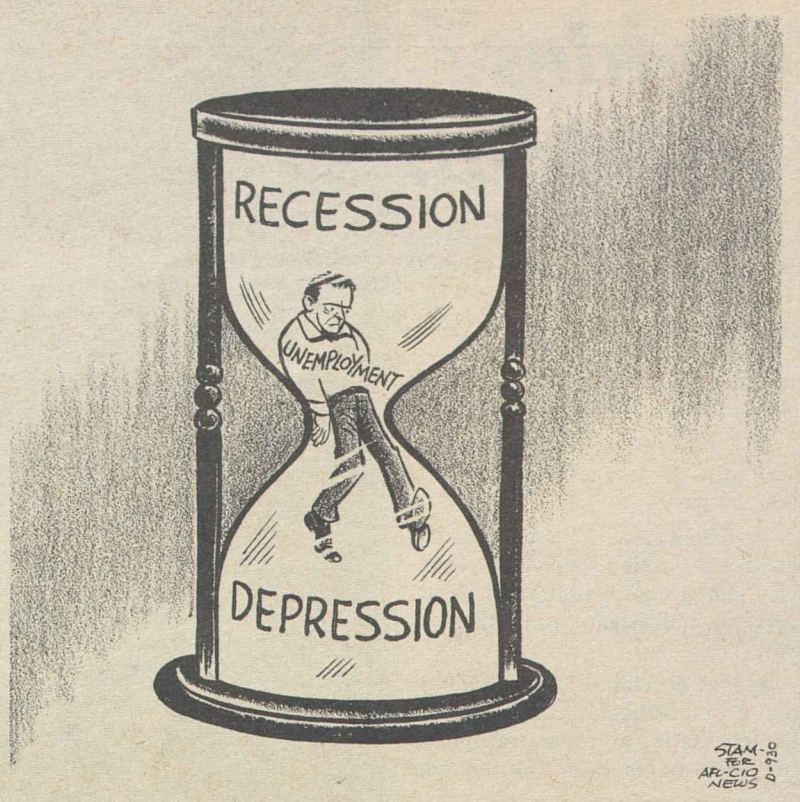
Running Out of Time



Supreme Court Rulings Reinforce Union Rights

The Supreme Court agreed with labor's position in two decisions, both of which upheld the National Labor Relations Board and overturned federal appellate court rulings.

By an 8-1 majority, the court affirmed the exclusive role of a union in representing all workers in a bargaining unit—on race discrimination complaints as well as on other contract issues.

In an unrelated decision, the Supreme Court held on a 6-3 vote that workers suspected of wrongdoing that could lead to disciplinary action are entitled to insist that a union representative be present when their employer questions them.

That decision was reached in a case involving a retail store worker accused of not paying the full employe price for her lunch, who was told she couldn't have her Retail Clerks shop steward present for the interview. A similar case, reaching the Supreme Court through a different appellate court, involved a member of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

In both cases, the NLRB had upheld the right to union representation and the opinion written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., backed the labor board and suggested also that the presence of "a knowledgeable union representative" could be useful to both the accused worker and the employer.

In the race discrimination case, Justice Thurgood Marshall said the whole concept of collective bargaining would be negated if a dissident handful of workers was able to compel an employer to bargain only with them as the claimed representative of all black workers in an establishment.

In the particular case at issue, two store employes in San Francisco had refused the good faith offer of a local of the Retail Clerks to process as a grievance their charges of race discrimination. They said they would only deal directly with the "top management" of the store, and then picketed the establishment calling for a community boycott of their employer.

The NLRB refused to overturn their subsequent dismissal, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia circuit held that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 protected the workers against employer retaliation.

Justice Marshall noted that remedies against discrimination on the job are available through a variety of orderly means, including the courts and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission as well as through enforcement of the union contract. But none of this, he stressed, requires "fragmentation" of the bargaining unit.

An AFL-CIO brief to the Supreme Court had cited congressional debate on the fair employment title of the Civil Rights Act—which labor strongly supported—as evidence that Congress did not intend to overturn the basic precepts of collective bargaining.

Maryland Unit Switches to CWA

Baltimore — The Communications Workers were certified to represent Bell System telephone operators throughout Maryland following a second election victory over the unaffiliated Maryland Telephone Union.

The National Labor Relations Board certified the results of a January mail election which gave the CWA 1,068 votes to 927 for the MTU.

CWA rolled up a bigger margin of votes in the rerun of an earlier election that was held last June which had been contested by the MTU. In the previous voting, the CWA got 983 votes to the MTU's 894.

The new CWA bargaining unit represents about 2,400 traffic department employes of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. with the bulk of the members in Baltimore. Prior to the election, the CWA had represented C&P traffic units in Maryland's Montgomery and Prince Georges counties and many other Bell employes in the state.

Jobless Claims Soar, Factory Output Skids

The latter are just now becoming eligible for the benefits.

Altogether, in the week ended Feb. 1, a record 5,745,100 workers were drawing jobless insurance benefits.

The drop in the nation's industrial output was the fourth monthly decline and was widespread. The sharpest cutbacks were in consumer goods, including autos, business equipment and industrial materials, the Fed noted.

In announcing the January decline, the board also reported a revision in the December industrial output. Rather than the 2.8 percent decline previously reported, the drop was 3.1 percent.

The output of the nation's factories, mines and utilities now has plunged 9.5 percent since last October, one of the steepest declines since the Great Depression.

Reflecting the severe contraction of the economy, business sales fell by $6.2 billion, or 3.8 percent, in December with inventories rising, the Commerce Dept. reported separately. The government noted that inventory accumulation in all of 1974 totaled $47.1 billion, compared with $26.9 billion in 1973.

The auto industry increased the number of hourly-paid workers on layoff, despite some slight sales gain attributed to price-rebate programs initiated earlier in the year. An estimated 37.3 percent of the workers at the nation's four auto firms were out of jobs because of the recession.

First Benefits Paid 300 Under Sheet Metal Plan

Phoenix, Ariz.—The first benefits protecting Sheet Metal Workers against underemployment were paid to about 300 union members in the Phoenix area.

Payments of up to $1,697.40 each were made under the Stabilization Agreement of the Sheet Metal Industry (SASMI) negotiated with area contractors in May 1973. The payments totalling more than $340,000, are based on work lost by members of Local 359 during the last six months of 1974.

The SASMI agreements have been negotiated by 50 bargaining units across the country and are currently in effect in about 40 locations.

President Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers in announcing the first payments said that while no one is happy at the economic conditions that trigger such benefits, the union and contractors can take satisfaction in initiating the much-needed program.

He said the value of the benefits are essential to the Sheet Metal Workers, their families and their communities.

"This supplement to hard-pressed incomes in a time of economic recession also represents an historic turning point in the construction industry," Carlough said. "For the first time, craftsmen who contribute so much toward building a better America have a more effective shield against hard times."

The SASMI program is a jointly administered union-management trust fund with employer contributions, based on the number of union members employed by participating contractors. The program also provides for payment of travel allowances to underemployed members who are forced to leave their home areas to work, payment of health insurance premiums and incentives for members to maintain stable work records.

The first benefit checks were distributed by Carlough and Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner at a special meeting of Local 359 here.

Council Presses Program To Halt Economy's Plunge

Jobless Aid Rolls Near 6 Million

A record 5,962,800 workers drew unemployment insurance benefits in the week ending Feb. 8, the Labor Dept. reported. With layoffs continuing to mount, the number drawing such benefits is expected to top the six-million mark next week.

The latest figure included 4,986,200 persons receiving benefits under regular state unemployment insurance programs. This too, was a new record. Both figures were the highest since the unemployment insurance program got under way in 1937.

The remaining 976,600 workers were drawing jobless insurance benefits under six separate programs, including those set up by emergency legislation enacted by Congress late last year.

The 5,962,800 covered employes represented an increase of 217,000 over the previous week. The Labor Dept. said the unemployment rate for workers covered by state jobless insurance moved up from 7.4 to 7.6 percent during the week ended Feb. 8. A year earlier, the rate was 4.1 percent when the volume was 2,604,300.

Thirty-eight states posted higher volumes of benefit payments over the week. In addition, 655,100 initial claims under all programs were filed in the week ending Feb. 15, the Labor Dept. reported. The total included 615,600 under state programs alone.

There was other gloomy news from the government, including a revision of a month-earlier report on the nation's total output of

11-Year Low:

Purchasing Power Takes Sharp Drop

By James M. Shevis

Workers' buying power plunged to its lowest level in nearly 11 years in January, as the nation's economy continued its long downward slide, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In its monthly report on earnings, BLS said the real spendable weekly earnings of a worker with three dependents averaged $88.08 in January, the lowest weekly figure since March 1964. Real spendable earnings are take-home pay expressed in 1967 dollars.

At the same time, BLS reported, the cost of living went up another six-tenths of 1 percent in January, slightly less than the rise in each of the preceding four months. But the rise left the consumer price index 11.7 percent above the level of a year earlier.

The January earnings decline—1.2 percent over the month and 5.1 percent over the year—left the average worker with a family $1.04 less buying power than in December and $4.72 less than a year earlier.

The $88.08 average in real spendable earnings was the second-lowest since BLS began keeping such records on a seasonally adjusted basis in January 1964. Real spendable earnings in that month averaged $87.15. They averaged $88.17 in February and $88.09 in March of that year, and $88.88 for the calendar year 1964.

The decline in real earnings largely reflected a drop in the number of hours worked, a direct result of production cutbacks due to the recession. Real spendable earnings now have been below their year-earlier level 23 months in a row.

While the rate of increase in inflation, as measured by the consumer price index, slowed a bit in January, the monthly rise still was higher than historical norms. The seasonally adjusted increase of six-tenths of 1 percent was the smallest rise in the CPI since last April's increase of five-tenths of 1 percent.

Higher retail prices for medical care, utilities, houses, cereal and bakery products, fresh fruits and vegetables and other consumer items accounted for a large part

Funds Urged to Add 1 Million Public Jobs

The AFL-CIO has asked Congress to fund an additional one million public service jobs for Americans who can't find work in private industry.

City and state governments have been able to hire about 300,000 unemployed persons with federal funds. But that isn't enough to make a significant dent in unemployment, labor witnesses testified at House hearings.

Kenneth Young, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, noted that during the high unemployment years of 1933 to 1940, "our government provided employment for one-third of the nation's jobless."

Even if unemployment doesn't rise above the present 7.5 million—"and everyone expects it to go higher," Young said—the added public service jobs that labor proposes would still be substantially below the level of the 1930s.

Young, along with Legislative Rep. Robert McGlotten, testified before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.). A bill introduced by Daniels and backed by the Democratic leadership would authorize $5 billion additional for the emergency public service jobs program that was added last Decem-

Asks Basic Reform In Nation's Policies

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for basic reform and overhauling of national policies dealing with taxes, energy, and interest rates to slow and stop the "frightening speed" of the economic crisis.

It stressed also the need for thorough-going enforcement and follow-through on trade and occupational health and safety legislation as the federation's Executive Council wound up its mid-winter sessions here.

Earlier the council had outlined a series of steps to aid the victims of the deepening recession—the poor, the unemployed and the low-wage worker.

It strongly re-emphasized the need for quick action by Congress on the emergency program adopted by the AFL-CIO General Board in January if the nation is to escape a depression.

And to underline the scope of the problem, it pressed Congress for a full-scale investigation of the growing concentration of economic power in America—a concentration that is endangering democratic institutions.

It called on the U.S. for continuing support of Israel until military and economic threats to its existence end and affirmed its backing for funds for South Vietnam authorized by Congress but not actually appropriated to date.

The council gave a top priority to "immedate and drastic action" to free the U.S. from the "blackmail threat" of a renewed Arab oil embargo and called for control over oil imports and the activities of the giant oil companies.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told reporters that "we think that they should be looked upon the same as any other public utility and we think that the present oil situation with the ominous threat of another Arab oil embargo, perhaps before this year is out," calls for "greater regulation and in the final analysis it may need nationalization. . . . I think oil is too important now to really leave all phases of the operation of the industry in the hands of private interests."

A key factor in "bringing recession to the American economy," the council stressed, has been the policies of the Federal Reserve System under the chairmanship of Dr. Arthur Burns, and the council spelled out a reform program to bring the FRS into line with the "needs of the American people."

In a detailed analysis of the national economy, the council said the recession is spreading "at a frightening speed" and only "massive emergency measures can halt the downward spiral, turn the economy around, put Americans back to work and restore public confidence. . . ." It called on the House for speedy passage of the Ways & Means Committee's emergency tax cut measure and on the Senate to meet the need for an even greater stimulus to the economy.

Following that, the council said in a separate statement, Congress should proceed promptly with a complete restructuring of the nation's tax system to provide "tax justice" by closing loopholes and ending "special privileges which rig the tax structure against wage earners and consumers."

The council warned that more unemployment and further production losses will result from the Trade Act of 1974, but it said certain

'Drastic Action' Spurred To Counter Oil Threats

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Immediate and drastic action" to free the United States from the "blackmail threat of a renewed Arab oil embargo" was given a top priority by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The nation's experiences of more than a year ago during the Arab boycott will pale into "insignificance compared to what looms ahead" unless a battery of measures are adopted to reduce imports, conserve energy, increase energy supplies and related measures dealing with the activities of oil companies, the council warned.

Of the year-ago crisis the council said: "We believe that the energy emergency was a result of policy decisions made by the multinational oil companies to squeeze the consumers, force them to pay higher prices and fatten the profits of the oil companies. And this happened."

The problem of oil imports can best be handled by taking the importation of oil "out of private hands" and placing it in the hands of government. "The government should determine the amount of oil imported, negotiate its price

Most Internal Disputes Settled by Mediation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO's Internal Disputes Plan operated with continuing effectiveness in 1974 with mediation playing a major role in disposing of nearly 60 percent of all cases.

A report filed with the Executive Council showed that the number of cases increased from 87 in 1973 to 125 last year, but were below the 135 filed in 1972. Since the plan's inception in 1962 there have been 1,546 cases filed of which 875, or 57 percent, have been settled through discussions between the organizations involved and mediation.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told a news conference questioner that the plan is "working wonderfully . . . beyond my wildest dream" given the history of disputes in the trade union movement.

He said that the council had acted to remove the National Maritime Union from the sanctions imposed by the plan after hearing a plea for removal from the union. The sanctions were imposed in a case going back 13 years.

Of the 1974 cases, about 55 percent were settled in mediation; the impartial umpire set up under the plan found violations of basic policies in 24 cases. Of the 20 appeals, the umpires' determinations were sustained in 12 cases, five are pending, one was withdrawn and two were referred to the council. The council set aside one determination and one appeal was withdrawn.

Over the 12-year period, the umpires found violations in 382 cases of the 659 before them and there were a total of 205 appeals taken. Determinations were sustained under the appeal process in 151 cases, and of the 18 cases that went to the Executive Council 15 determinations were affirmed.

There have been a total of 105 non-compliance complaints but in only 20 was non-compliance found. There are six cases pending. In the 12-year period, 12 affiliates have been placed under sanctions. In nine instances the sanctions were removed as compliance was achieved and the affiliates' rights under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution were restored. The council's action on the NMU brings that to 10.

Only two affiliates are currently under sanctions—the Air Line Pilots Association and the International Typographical Union.

Strong Chance Seen for Mail Registration

Bal Harbour, Fla.—This is the year for Congress to enact a national registration-by-mail law, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

During the 93rd Congress, a postcard voter registration bill easily passed the Senate after a filibuster was ended by a two-thirds vote to limit debate. But a conservative coalition in the House blocked the bill on a 204-197 procedural vote.

The Executive Council said the arguments raised against the bill in the House debate have been refuted by the experience of three states that have adopted mail registration laws.

In New Jersey, Minnesota and Maryland, the more convenient registration procedure has substantially increased the number of persons eligible to vote. And, the council noted, there have been no allegations of fraud despite the fears expressed by opponents. As for costs, some jurisdictions have been able to register more voters at less expense.

The council termed the case for registration by mail "compelling" and said the strongest argument is that "it works and it increases a citizen's opportunity to participate in the democratic process."

Pension Plan Filing Deadline Extended

The Labor Dept. is extending the deadline for administrators of pension plans to file certain reports required by legislation enacted last year.

Administrators are required by the law to file a detailed description of the pension plan with the Secretary of Labor and to distribute a description to all persons covered by the plan and beneficiaries.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Paul J. Fasser, Jr., announced that the original Apr. 30 deadline for these reports has been postponed until Aug. 31, 1975.

Runaway Film Held Insult to Bicentennial

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Film producers who go overseas to save money on motion picture and television filming have added insult to job injury, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council strongly protested a plan by the ABC network to produce a major film about the American revolution—an adaptation of Gore Vidal's book, "Burr" — in England and Ireland. The film would be shown during America's bicentennial.

"If ABC goes ahead with its plan," the council said, "foreign interests will depict the history of this country for the nation's 200th birthday."

The Executive Council said this would be both "a clear insult" to the United States and a blow to American workers. It called on ABC to change its plans and produce the historical series in the United States with American citizens both in front of and behind the cameras.

Overhaul Pressed:

Labor Hits Failures Of Federal Reserve

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Federal Reserve System under the chairmanship of Dr. Arthur Burns is guilty of bringing "recession to the American economy and unemployment to millions of workers," the AFL-CIO declared.

Reviewing the evidence of the system's responsibility for the severe economic crisis, the federation's Executive Council spelled out a seven-point program to overhaul the nation's central bank and make it responsive to the needs of the American people.

The council indicted the Federal Reserve System on five basic counts:

- It failed to serve the needs of the American people for full employment, economic expansion and adequate public facilities and services "while contributing to the cycles of boom and bust."
- It has been an "engine of inflation with soaring interest costs imposed directly and indirectly on consumers, home buyers, small business, public utilities and government itself."
- It has been a major cause of the 1969-70 recession and today's disastrous conditions "resulting in the highest unemployment rate in 34 years and huge deficits in the federal budget."
- It has discriminated against extension of needed credit for home building, small business, state and local government and public utilities but has provided substantial amounts for various types of speculation, inventory hoarding and foreign lending.
- It has brought the economy to the "brink of depression" with spreading bankruptcies of businesses and banks.

In addition, the council asserted, the Fed continues to operate in "relative secrecy and with little accountability to the Congress which created it."

The council denounced the system's "arrogant brinksmanship" with the American economy and its money-crunch policies that in the name of fighting inflation "brought a depression to the housing industry and mass unemployment."

The Federal Reserve should be overhauled and reformed in the following ways, the council said:

- Direct it to reduce short- and long-term interest rates and to allocate available credit for high-priority economic activities.
- Establish a comprehensive oversight review to bring the central bank fully into the government structure.
- Require that the FRS operations be subject to a yearly audit by the General Accounting Office.
- Fix the term of the chairman at four years "coincident with that of the President who appoints him." The term of the members of the Board of Governors should be cut from 14 to 7 years.
- Abolish the Open Market Committee with its functions to be absorbed by the Board of Governors who are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Five of the 12 members of the Open Market Committee are not government appointees.
- Extend membership on the Board of Governors and all committees and district banks of the system to representatives of all major community groups including consumers and organized labor.
- Require all commercial banks to be participants in the FRS.

In addition, the governors should keep Congress informed promptly and in reasonable detail of major policy decisions and the reasons for arriving at them.

Ex-IBEW Official Gets New Labor Dept. Post

Ronald T. Weakley, a former business manager of a California local of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has been named to a new Labor Dept. post dealing with the pension reform law. He will be acting assistant director of the public services division in the Office of Employee Benefits Security.

His previous assignment was technical assistance director in the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports.

Tightening Power of Corporations Spurs Call for Full-Scale Probe

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The increasing concentration of economic power in the hands of giant corporations and banks must be fully investigated to safeguard the nation's democratic institutions, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The answer is a full-scale, comprehensive investigation by Congress of the structure of the U.S. economy and the role of the big corporations and their allies, the Executive Council declared.

Recalling the massive studies and reports of the New Deal era which spotlighted the growing concentration of the 1920s and '30s, the council said the findings are now far out of date and a new deep and detailed examination is required. It noted that:

"The 500 biggest U.S. corporations now hold more than two-thirds of all business income. The top 111 manufacturing corporations hold more than half of all assets and get more than half of all profits in manufacturing. The 50 biggest banks control more than half of all bank assets and hold leverage control stock in more than 5,200 companies."

The council noted also that although the record flood of mergers in the late 1960s and early 1970s has slowed down, "conglomerate mergers in manufacturing, mining and services—accompanied by increasing concentration of banking with interlocking business connections—are continuing to produce increased concentration of economic power."

There have been excess concentrations in such basic industries as food and energy, the council added, with resulting high prices that "drain billions of dollars away from the buying power of American families."

Emphasizing the lack of detailed information on the structure, ownership, management, policies and operation of America's giant business and financial institutions and their interlocking relationships, the council said they too often can avoid effective public regulation because neither the government nor the public can get adequate data.

While there have been a few instances of more data becoming available and new proposals in Congress, the only workable approach is a full-scale congressional investigation including the role of mergers and acquisitions at home and abroad in increasing economic concentration, the interlocking relationships between giant corporations and banks, and the effects of all this on prices, income distribution, the U.S. position in the world economy and the country's economic institutions.

Steelworkers' Tomayko Named to Pension Unit

John F. Tomayko, assistant to Steelworkers President I. W. Abel, has been appointed to the advisory committee to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. President Ford designated Tomayko as one of seven members of the committee which will help administer the pension protection machinery established by Congress last year.

AFL-CIO Calls for Action on Recession

Council Cites Need for Reform In Key Areas of National Policy

sections of the law could be used to minimize the damage and should be given wide publicity and vigorous enforcement.

It declared, too, that with the Occupational Safety & Health Act approaching its fifth anniversary this year, Congress must "make good on the act's promise of a safe and healthy workplace" through strengthening amendments and vigilant rejection of all attempts to weaken the law, its coverage or protective standards. Accompanying the statement was a 13,000-word report on administration of the law so far, which the council observed "is not pleasant reading."

In other statements the council called for extension of the Voting Rights Act and enactment of registration by mail—a long-supported AFL-CIO measure that fell short by a handful of votes in the last Congress.

It acted also to pledge support of activities in connection with the nation's bicentennial and condemned a runaway film effort on the celebration. It backed the observance of international women's year and pledged continued support for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. It mourned the passing of two former members, Emil Rieve and Paul Phillips, and placed appropriate resolutions in the record.

Meany told reporters at a series of news conferences that:

● The Farm Workers are having some difficulties, but their boycott of grapes and lettuce is "having an effect on the growers" and the union is "not giving up and we are not giving up either." He said the council had not heard from UFW President Cesar Chavez.

● The federation is "living with" the Taft-Hartley Act and while it is "very unjust" and Section 14(b) is "a special law designed to curb trade union organization," the unions "are making progress."

● A trade barrier is a form of economic warfare and "if we are going to have economic warfare it should be two-sided. We certainly are not making any progress by this policy of unilateral concession to these countries."

● The Open Market Committee of the Federal Reserve System makes its decisions in secret, decisions that "affect the lives of all the American people on money matters and I think this sort of thing has no place in a democracy."

● "It's tremendously important that we keep pace with the rest of the world militarily . . . because in today's world we can't play from weakness," he said in opposing reductions in military expenditures in order to achieve a tax cut.

● The federation's finances are in good shape at the moment "but we are going to be affected by inflation and the rising cost of living." The five-year financial projection of 1969 has stood up fairly well, he said, with expenses a bit lower and income better as per capita remained unaffected by the recession to date.

● The fact that women are not in high places in the trade union movement is certainly not because of any undemocratic practices." Women are "very, very effective in the trade union movement on the local level," but at the national level breaking home ties seems to get in the way and "has prevented women from coming to the top in the trade union movement."

The council received a report on the operation of the federation's Internal Disputes Plan showing the continuing effectiveness of mediation and voted, after a brief hearing, to remove the National Maritime Union from the sanctions provisions of the plan.

Contributions were voted to 14 organizations including the Consumer Federation of America, National Urban League, Conference on Economic Progress, Joint Council on Economic Education, National Housing Conference, Southern Regional Council, United Negro College Fund, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, CARE, National Council of Senior Citizens, Energy Policy Task Force, Committee for National Health Insurance, New Leader and Urban Coalition.

The opening date of the AFL-CIO's 20th anniversary convention was set for Oct. 2, 1975, in San Francisco at the Civic Center.

The next meeting of the council will open in Washington on May 6, 1975.

NEWEST MEMBER of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, President Glenn E. Watts of the Communications Workers, was welcomed to the council's mid-winter meeting by Federation President George Meany.

Full Tax Reform Sought After Emergency Slash

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An emergency tax cut to stimulate the economy should be promptly followed by a restructuring of the tax system, the AFL-CIO said.

An Executive Council resolution on "tax justice" stressed the need to close loopholes and end "special privileges which rig the tax structure against wage earners and consumers."

It termed tax reform essential to help rebuild public confidence in government. And it said the $20 billion to $30 billion that could be realized from comprehensive tax reform would both finance needed government programs and permit permanent tax reductions that would increase the buying power of low- and middle-income Americans.

The council reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's call for abolishing tax subsidies for overseas operations of American-based multinational corporations—and particularly of the international oil companies.

It cited a variety of devices used by corporations to reduce taxes, noting that the corporate share of income taxes collected has slipped from one-third to one-fourth of the total over the past decade.

The Executive Council urged an end to depletion allowances in the oil, gas and mineral industries. It called for an excess profits tax, and an end to capital gains loopholes. It said the investment tax credit "should be eliminated as soon as the present emergency situation is over."

Other reforms urged to achieve tax justice include ending the tax-exempt status of state and local bonds—with a less costly interest subsidy to prevent hardship to states and cities. The council also called for tightening the law on federal estate and gift taxes — a potential $3 billion-a-year source of revenue — and ending various tax shelters used by wealthy individuals.

The resolution noted that the Ford Administration has sought to curtail for budget reasons a number of social programs "that create jobs, alleviate human hardship and help build the nation."

But instead of supporting tax reforms that would bring in the needed revenue, the council said, the Administration through such proposals as permanently lowering the corporate income tax rate would both reduce revenue and put the tax structure further out of balance.

U.S. Backing for Israel Pressed Against Threats

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Until the economic and military threats to the existence of Israel are stopped that Middle East nation "must be supported and strengthened" by the United States, the AFL-CIO declared.

In a statement assessing the situation in the Middle East, the Executive Council said that the chances for peace in the area are threatened by the Soviet Union and the oil producing nations and their role in worldwide economic blackmail and oil embargoes.

"Israel's enemies do not wish to have peace return to the Middle East," the council said. "If it were otherwise, face-to-face negotiations of all parties in the region could commence at once. It is greed which motivates Israel's neighbors. It is the creation of political crises and the long-term prospect of conquest which motivated the Soviet Union."

Oil energy blackmail coupled with economic and military threats against Israel must be stopped and until these objectives are achieved the United States and "all other nations with the fortitude to resist tyranny" must support Israel, the council declared.

The statement emphasized Israel's role as a democratic state in the Middle East and that its "jeopardy is heightened and prolonged" by the military and economic assistance supplied to her enemies by the Soviet Union and other industrialized nations, including the United States.

Bold Steps Demanded To Halt Economic Skid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Only "massive emergency measures" can halt the nation's worst economic decline since the 1930s, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared at its midwinter meeting here.

It urged Congress to adopt the action program spelled out by the federation's General Board to end the recession, "turn the economy around, put Americans back to work and restore confidence in the government's ability to correct the economy's difficulties."

"America's economic crisis is growing at a frightening speed," the council said in a statement, and the recession that began well over a year ago now is "feeding on itself."

A severe drop in purchasing power has led to shrinking consumer sales, and this decline in buying power and sales has resulted in attempts by business to reduce inventories through cutbacks in orders, production and employment, the council noted, adding:

"It has also resulted in an alarming drop in industry's operating rate and reductions in the real volume of business investment in plants, machines and equipment.

"Moreover, every additional week of layoffs and cuts in weekly work-schedules is resulting in a further drop in consumer buying power, which means a further weakening of sales, production and employment."

The council pointed out that the drop in consumer purchasing power has been so sharp it would now require an increase of close to $60 billion in the annual rate of total after-tax personal income to bring the average buying power of consumers back to its level of the July-September quarter of 1973, before the recession began.

As business and consumer loans have fallen off, the council observed, interest rates on short-term loans have moved down, but rates on long-term loans for mortgages and business expansion remain close to the 1974 record peaks reached during the Federal Reserve Board's money crunch.

The result has been a depression in the homebuilding industry, a decline in business investment in plant and equipment, and accompanying declines in employment.

Noting that January unemployment soared to 7.5 million workers or 8.2 percent of the workforce—the worst rate in 34 years—the council charged the Ford Administration's economic proposals would only exacerbate the employment situation.

"The Administration has proposed a complicated package of income-tax reductions, more than offset by energy-related tax and price increases," the statement declared. "On balance, this package is a formula for more unemployment, extended recession and prolonged inflation."

The council urged Congress to block President Ford's imposition of another excise tax on imported oil. And it called on the House to speedily pass the Ways & Means Committee tax-cut measure.

The tax-cut measure would reduce individual taxes by $16.2 billion this year.

But even this stimulus to the economy will not be enough, the council said, and it called on the Senate to provide the greater stimulus demanded by the continuing deterioration of the economy.

Support Asked Against Suit On Wage Law

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. has asked the federation's state and local central bodies to help oppose a suit by the National League of Cities and the National Governors Conference that challenges extension of the wage-hour law to public workers.

The department, in a report to the AFL-CIO Executive Council, asked central bodies to help persuade governors and mayors to withdraw support for the suit "or, as a minimum, to make no contribution from public funds for its support."

A report from the executive board of the recently-established department expressed thanks to the AFL-CIO "for continuing help, encouragement and support." It said the labor movement's legislative positions have been responsive "to the needs of workers in the public sector."

Dealing with Blackmail

THE CORNERSTONE of the nation's energy policy must be the establishment of a reliable source of energy free from the blackmail threat of a renewed Arab oil embargo while achieving high employment, a dynamic economy, and a prosperous and satisfying way of life.

The hardships, inconveniences and sufferings—financial and otherwise—endured by the American consumer more than a year ago as a result of the first peacetime shortage of energy due to the Arab oil embargo need no recital. Everybody knows about the staggering increase in gas and fuel prices, the inadequately heated homes, and the frantic search by people to find a few gallons of gasoline.

If the energy crisis were a thing of the past—a passing phenomenon—we would need have no concern. But not since the depression of the '30s, except for World War II, has America faced a situation of such dangerous and monumental proportions.

We believe that the energy emergency was a result of policy decisions made by the multinational oil companies to squeeze the consumers, force them to pay higher prices, and fatten the profits of the oil companies. And this happened.

What this country experienced a year ago pales into insignificance compared to what looms ahead unless immediate and drastic action is taken to cope with the energy problem.

There is no single, simple, painless measure that will take care of the problem. A battery of measures directed both at a short term and long term is called for in a comprehensive energy policy, which would provide for the reduction of imports, energy consumption, increasing energy supplies and other related measures.

As long as the United States is dependent on the importation of oil, shipped in foreign vessels, from insecure sources, the energy crisis will remain with us. The first steps must be aimed at the elimination of that dependence:

Take the importation of oil out of private hands and place it in the hands of government. The government should determine the amount of oil imported, negotiate its price and provide for its internal allocation.

Enact a quota on oil imports, including a ban on such imports originating in those countries that embargoed oil to the United States and Holland in 1973-1974.

Establish a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing. Permit motor gasoline consumption above the rationed amount, but levy a high tax on this additional consumption. The funds created by this tax should be earmarked for the reduction and the ultimate elimination of commuter transit fares and for the development and construction of mass transit systems.

Make it clear to any nation contemplating an embargo directed against the United States that this country will strike back with economic counter measures. To nations imposing such an embargo against this country, export bans would be applied. No item, including military equipment as well as agricultural and industrial commodities, would be shipped to such countries. Their assets in this country would be frozen. All technical assistance would be withdrawn. This country would construe such an oil embargo as economic warfare and retaliate with all the economic weapons at its command.

History, Reality of Middle East Rewritten at Israel's Expense

By John P. Roche

A WHILE BACK a distinguished commentator stunned me by casually referring to "Israeli aggression" in the 1967 war. He subsequently made amends for an obvious accident, and there is no purpose in heaping ashes on him by name. But what struck me as significant about the slip was that it is part of a new mood about the Middle East; a new history is being propagated featuring innocent Arabs as victims. This, of course, was reflected in the United Nations' decision to give the Palestine Liberation Organization observer status and permit Yasser Arafat to harangue the assembly.

In Washington, Sen. Charles Percy has told Israel that it can no longer count on automatic U.S. support and should, to get negotiations under way, "pull back essentially to the 1967 lines." This was followed by a story in the Christian Science Monitor that President Ford "is known to agree" with Percy. Taken for granted is the premise that Israel should make concessions. Why? Well, to prevent people who want to destroy her from going through with it. That is a real trade.

What is overlooked in all the comings and goings and intricate deals is that the issue for Israel is not at all abstract or complex: it is survival. The Arab states can lose wars indefinitely; Israel can only lose once.

Let us take as a case study an Israeli withdrawal to 1967 borders, a matter which has confused a number of people of good will. If Israel had done this, it would have been strangled by the Yom Kippur assault. As it was, things were pretty dicey for a few days, but the Israeli defense forces had some room for maneuver. But there is an even more basic proposition: Why should Israel have returned one inch of conquered land to aggressors who refused to recognize her existence, even her right to existence?

Since 1947 the Arab states have refused to accept the legitimacy of a Jewish nation in the former Palestine Mandate. Recall that in 1947 the United Nations, with full agreement by both the United States and the Soviet Union, voted to partition Palestine into a Jewish and a Palestinian Arab state. The Jewish Agency, the quasi-official organization which represented Jewish interests, accepted partition. The Arab states refused. When the British Army pulled out in the spring of 1948, officially ending the Mandate, the Jews established Israel in perfectly legitimate fulfillment of a UN decision. The Arab states invaded, determined to drive the Jews into the sea.

The Israelis made the mistake of winning, an event that has created difficulties ever since. Moreover, exercising the right of victors they took over some of the territory originally assigned by the UN to the Arabs—particularly the Negev. About 600,000 Palestinian Arabs fled, creating the refugee problem. Probably 700,000 Jews escaped from Arab states to Israel with little but the shirts on their backs. This did not create a refugee problem. (Indeed, various Jewish groups had to "buy" the Jews out of Yemen and other states, which set outrageous prices for exit visas—at least no Palestinian Arab refugee ever had to pay for an exit visa.) Israel settled these Jewish immigrants—the Arab governments, notably Nasser's Egypt, refused to permit any resettlement effort on behalf of the poor souls who had fled during the war. Nor would they discuss the matter with a "non-existent" Israel.

EXCUSE ME for sounding caustic, but note that since 1947 there has been an undiminished pattern of Arab aggression. Israel never wanted to become the Sparta of the Middle East, but the lesson of the Yom Kippur War was stark: Never let down your guard for a minute. The Israelis are not paranoids—paranoia is the illusion of persecution.

Take the question of recognizing the Palestine Liberation Organization: Various spokesmen for this organization have assured us that they will act in a reasonable fashion, and one is tempted to say, "How nice." Then he realizes that acting in a reasonable fashion means not blowing up airplanes. In return, we are supposed to take the PLO into the bosom of the world community.

Besides, the PLO is obviously working a split-level political warfare scenario. The same Arafat, who in New York seemed almost to say there might be a possible way for Jews and Arabs to live together in peace, plays a different record elsewhere, calling on the UN to repeal the 1947 partition and flatly telling a Yugoslav correspondent that "the establishment of a fighting Palestinian rule over every liberated section of Arab soil is a step on the way towards the full liberation of all of Palestine." Sec. Kissinger might brief the President and Sen. Percy on this record.

Executive Council Analysis:

Recession Spiral Drags Down All Sectors of U.S. Economy

From a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the national economy, Bal Harbour, Fla., Feb. 20, 1975:

AMERICA'S ECONOMIC CRISIS is growing at a frightening speed.

The worst downward spiral since the 1930s is now feeding on itself. A massive drop in purchasing power has brought down consumer sales.

With declines in business and consumer loans, as a result of the slide in economic activities and the modest shift in the Federal Reserve's policies, interest rates on short-term loans have moved down. But interest rates on long-term loans for mortgages and business expansion remain close to the 1974 record peaks, reached during the Federal Reserve's money-crunch.

As a result, homebuilding remains in a depression, with housing starts down 60 percent from the early months of 1973—hitting residential construction and the numerous building supply and home appliance industries. The accompanying decline of business investment in plant and equipment is causing cuts in production and employment in heavy construction, machinery and related industries.

The squeeze on state and local governments from high interest payments and falling tax revenues is resulting in layoffs of public employes and postponed efforts to improve public facilities and services.

Many businesses, as well as consumers, find themselves burdened with large debts and falling incomes, with the threat of impending bankruptcies. Many of the nation's over-extended banks face insolvency, if payments on the huge business loans, extended for inventory hoarding and speculation in 1973 and 1974, cannot be met.

Under these conditions, production cutbacks are continuing to spread. Unemployment is feeding on unemployment.

In the face of this dangerously deteriorating situation, the Administration has proposed a complicated package of income tax reductions, more than offset by energy-related tax and price increases. On balance, this package is a formula for more unemployment, extended recession and prolonged inflation.

The direct impact of the proposed energy-related tax and price boosts, according to the Economics Division of the Library of Congress, "could cost at least $50.3 billion in 1975" which "could raise prices by three percentage points." As these energy costs ripple out through the economy, they would boost the prices of everything, from food and drug bills to bus fares.

The President's budget projects prolonged recession-level unemployment rates of 8.1 percent in 1975, 7.9 percent in 1976, 7.5 percent in 1977 and 6.9 percent in 1978. That would mean four successive years of the highest unemployment levels since 1941. Even by 1980, five years from now, the budget's projected unemployment rate is 5.5 percent—a rate which is totally unacceptable to everyone except the Administration.

While the Administration complacently accepts such forecasts of continuing troubles for millions of American families, its spokesmen concentrate their fire on the crisis-created budget deficits. The President proposed to hold down federal spending by cutting programs for the poor, the retired and veterans and by placing a 5 percent ceiling on 1975 pay increases for federal employes. However, the Budget Report admits in all candor:

"Aside from the effects of the proposed tax reduction, the deficits anticipated for 1975 and 1976 are largely the inevitable result of those aspects of the budget and the tax system that respond automatically to changes in the economy, such as budget receipts and unemployment benefit payments. . . . If the economy were to be as fully employed in 1976 as it was in 1974, we would have $40 billion in additional tax receipts, assuming no change in tax rates, and $12.7 billion less in aid to the unemployed. These two factors alone exceed the budget deficit for 1976."

The budget deficit will recede when employment and business activities pick up. Further, the elimination of major special tax privileges for corporations and wealthy families can provide as much as $20 to $30 billion of additional federal revenue.

THE ECONOMIC CRISIS has gone so far that only massive emergency measures can halt the downward spiral, turn the economy around, put Americans back to work and restore public confidence in the government's ability to correct the economy's difficulties.

The special meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board on Jan. 23 adopted such an emergency program.

Since that time, the Administration has partially responded by releasing $2 billion in impounded highway funds and $4 billion in sewer and waste treatment funds by next July, and the Federal Reserve has slightly reduced the discount rate. These are welcome but terribly insufficient steps.

They have been more than offset by the new excise tax on imported oil which will shortly raise all consumer prices on any article touched by oil.

As a first step the Congress must block the President's imposition of another excise tax on imported oil, and speedily pass the House Ways & Means Committee tax cut measure. That measure, while providing a stimulus to the economy, will not be enough. The continuing deterioration of the economy demands an even greater stimulus and the Senate should meet this need. In addition, the Congress should then move without delay to enact the other proposals contained in the AFL-CIO General Board's program to put America back to work.

Taxable Wage Base Lags:

Reform of Financial Structure Vital for Jobless Compensation

DRAMATIC CHANGES are needed in the financial structure of unemployment compensation to make it the strong "first line of defense against poverty and recession" that it was intended to be, AFL-CIO social insurance expert James O'Brien declared.

O'Brien said that long neglect has left the system "starved for revenue." The failure to keep the taxable wage base in pace with the actual rise of wage levels means that now half the wages in covered employment "escape financial obligation—contributions to the system." He said that experience-ratings have further distorted the program, letting many employers pay little or nothing into the unemployment insurance system.

O'Brien, an assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, called for an immediate boost of the taxable wage base to the average annual wage in covered employment. He said the base should then be raised in steps over the next few years to the social security wage-base level. He pointed out that Congress set that parity in 1939, but let the unemployment insurance wage base drift without improvement for 33 years—until 1972.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, O'Brien said that despite the heavy strain of the worst unemployment since the depression, the unemployment compensation system is not in immediate danger of going broke.

He said that state reserves stood at $10 billion at the beginning of the year, and that President Ford has asked that an additional $5 billion "be made available to the states, should they encounter difficulties" in paying benefits. He said the few states that have had trouble paying benefits have been able to meet payments through the loan fund account that is part of the trust fund.

O'Brien was questioned by Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OTHER DAY the Dept. of Commerce and the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development issued a joint press release carrying more depressing news about the housing industry.

During December 1974 new one-family homes dropped to an annual rate of 364,000 units—a little over 30,000 a month. This was a decline of 14 percent below the previous month and 16 percent below the December 1973 rate, according to preliminary statistics.

The number of new one-family homes actually sold during 1974 was about 500,000, which means that the decline at the end of the year was substantial.

All this is taking place at a time when interest rates are starting to drop, but the decrease has been far too slight to bring a sufficient number of homebuyers into the market.

And to add to the depression and uncertainty in the housing industry, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board has proposed regulations that would permit savings and loan associations to make mortgage loans with interest rates that would rise and fall with the market over the term of the loan.

At present, almost all mortgage loans carry fixed interest rates setting uniform monthly repayments over the life of the loan.

The proposal is designed to guarantee savings and loan associations enough income to continue making mortgage loans during periods of inflated interest rates when investors often withdraw their savings in search of higher interest possibilities.

Under the proposal, the savings and loan associations would be free to increase interest payments when interest rates rose generally in the economy. So, a contract that the home buyer signs with the lender would be open-ended and the borrower would have no way of knowing what his monthly payments might be in the future.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), former chairman of the House Banking & Currency Committee, had this reaction to the Bank Board move:

"True, the proposal would also allow interest rates to be lowered as interest rates went down generally in the economy, but the history of the monetary market plainly indicates the emptiness of this side of the equation. The lenders obviously are not promoting this scheme because they think interest rates—over the long haul—are going to trend downward."

The Bank Board would allow the lenders to increase interest rates by 2½ percent over the life of the mortgage. Thus, an 8 percent mortgage could be hiked to 10½ percent—almost one-third.

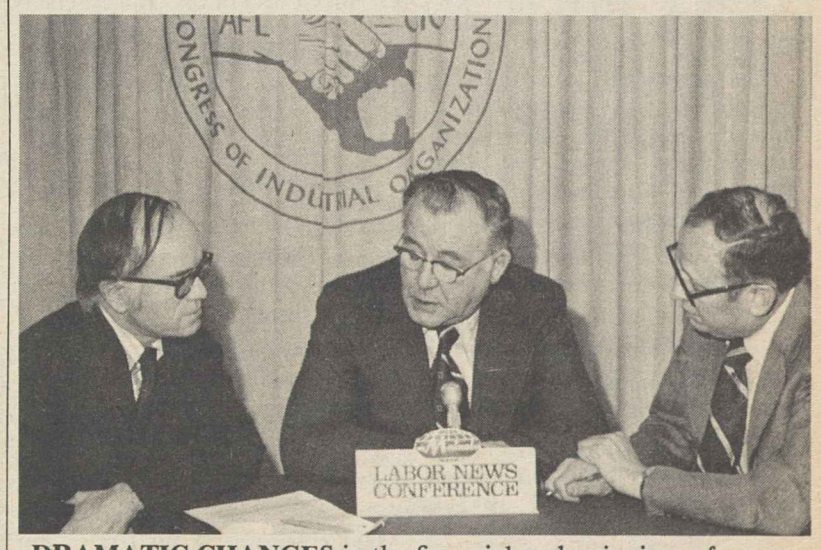
ON TWO PREVIOUS occasions the Bank Board sought to adopt its variable-rate home mortgage plan but the Congress, responding to strong opposition by labor and consumer groups and the home builders, blocked it. Congress will have to act again within six months to stymie the latest move.

Both Patman and the new House Banking Committee chairman, Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), have indicated they plan to do just that.

Reuss has his own proposal which would set up a mortgage interest subsidy program for middle-income homeowners as a means of stimulating new construction. Under the bill, HUD would be authorized to subsidize the difference between the actual interest rate and a 6 percent rate—about 3 percent subsidy in the current market.

Another proposal, introduced by Rep. Thomas L. Ashley (D-Ohio) and 84 other members, would provide emergency federal assistance to homeowners in danger of mortgage default because of unemployment or other economic setbacks. However, the bill would not directly stimulate new construction.

There are other proposals, too. And while it is too early to tell exactly what will emerge, it seems likely that the 94th Congress will act to counter the depressing impact of interest rates on the housing industry.



DRAMATIC CHANGES in the financial underpinnings of unemployment compensation are vital if the system is to be the strong "first line of defense against poverty and recession" Congress intended, James O'Brien, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning the assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security were Jerome Cahill, left, of the New York Daily News and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The weekly interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Labor Slates Bicentennial Observance

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The coming bicentennial celebration offers American workers an opportunity to reflect on their heritage and contributions toward the nation's development, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It declared Labor Day 1975 through Labor Day 1976 as Labor's Bicentennial Year, pledging "to make this time a memorable one for American workers and for the American people."

Labor is proud of its accomplishments, the council said, and is preparing to participate fully in the nation's bicentennial activities.

"We in the American labor movement have steadfastly held to the proposition that the system of government created by our founding fathers, although imperfect, remains the best system for a free people yet devised by man," the council said. "It allows for change and for new directions to meet the challenges now facing America and the world."

All AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies were urged to take part in the various national and regional bicentennial programs observing the nation's 200th birthday.

Among the programs planned for the celebration are:

- The Working Americans Festival on the Mall in Washington from June 16 to Sept. 6, 1976.
- Regional festivals, like the one planned by the Philadelphia AFL-CIO at Independence Hall on Labor Day 1976.
- American Issues Forum, where labor can make its views known on a variety of topics of interest to all Americans.
- Bicentennial Youth Debates, a major national effort to involve young people and students in a dialogue on the topics raised by the American Issues Forum.

Wage Chiseling Totals $55 Million in 6 Months

Wage chiseling by employers uncovered by Labor Dept. investigators during the last six months of 1974 amounted to more than $55 million, an increase of $11 million in illegal underpayments from the comparable period of 1973.

The department's Wage & Hour Division reported that 218,286 workers were shortchanged in their paychecks, due mostly to violations of minimum wage and overtime provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Only about half of the lost wages — $27.8 million — was recovered for 173,520 underpaid workers. But this represented an improvement over the $23.3 million recovered for 130,000 of the 170,000 workers who lost $44 million during the last six months of 1973, the division noted.

During Fiscal Year 1974 which ended last June 30, government investigations discovered employers' underpayments totalling $96.6 million for 357,000 workers.

Minimum wage underpayments during the first six months of the current fiscal year amounted to $14,167,235 for 104,213 workers and overtime underpayments totaled $21,790,510 for 113,370 workers, the Labor Dept. reported.

Violations of the FLSA Equal Pay amendments resulted in $14.9 million in wages due 15,258 underpaid workers, mostly women. These amendments require equal pay for men and women doing substantially the same work in a workplace.

Investigators also found that 950 older workers lost $2.4 million in wages because of violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act.

Employers on federally funded or assisted contracts were found to owe more than $1.7 million prevailing wages and overtime pay to more than 7,000 workers.

More than $1 billion in illegal wage underpayments has been uncovered by the government compliance officers since the FLSA became law 37 years ago. Nevertheless, economists in organized labor have estimated that only about one-third of all wage chiseling is detected.

The major reason for the lesser amount recovered than lost to wage chiseling is that a number of cases are regarded as unsuitable for litigation, the Labor Dept. said. But in such cases, workers have the right to institute private action for back wages due. Another reason is the two-year statute of limitations under the wage-hour law.

Job Protection Measures:

Steps Asked to Ease Trade Act Damage

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor will work to minimize the damage of the 1974 Foreign Trade Act on workers by making use of certain sections of the law, even though it is convinced the law is unfair and will cause more unemployment and production losses.

While stressing the need for remedial trade legislation to protect the American standard of living and restore U.S. jobs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council pointed out that the immediate use of job-protecting provisions of the Trade Act by the President and Congress can help.

Vigorous participation by import-injured unions also can benefit laid-off workers and those threatened with layoffs, the council observed.

It called on President Ford to exercise his authority under the Trade Act to curb imports that adversely affect U.S. jobs and contribute to the deficit in the balance of payments.

The President also should restrict imports from countries whose trade practices put an unfair burden on American commerce, the statement said.

It urged Ford to give strict enforcement to anti-dumping provisoins of the law and curb the export of raw materials, technology and products vitally needed in the United States.

The council called on Congress to carefully examine all negotiated trade agreements and to refuse to ratify any that adversely affect U.S. jobs and production.

Congress also should maintain constant oversight activities to insure the effective implementation of the Trade Act provisions that can be used to aid workers and preserve U.S. jobs and industries. The council stressed that special congressional attention is needed on sections of the law dealing with dumping, countervailing duties, adjustment assistance, adequate reporting and limitation on import-sensitive items.

The statement called for congressional rejection of any new trade agreements with concessions that allow increased imports from Communist countries "while American workers are desperately in need of jobs."

The council urged unions whose members have been hurt by imports to seek relief through presidential action after a finding of injury by the government's International Trade Commission.

Import-harmed unions also should petition the Labor and Commerce Departments for adjustment assistance for workers and communities affected by imports.

Participation of trade unions in hearings being conducted by the International Trade Commission is essential to call public attention to job losses resulting from unregulated imports, the council stressed. The hearings opened in Washington on Feb. 25 and will continue in 13 major cities over the next two months.

Additional input is needed from unions at hearings on all aspects of international trade negotiations to be held this spring by the President's Trade Information Committee, the council said.

While these measures would limit the damage to workers and U.S. industries, the council declared that immediate legislative action is needed to reverse "the oppressive economic impact" of foreign imports on the nation. It called for:

- Revocation of provisions for the deferral of tax payments on foreign-earned profits.
- Elimination of the foreign tax credit for U.S. corporations operating outside the country.
- Repeal of sections of the Tariff Code that encourage foreign production for shipment back to U.S. markets.
- Regulation of the export of American capital and technology that results in the export of U.S. jobs.

"The AFL-CIO supports strong, vigorous, fair international trade," the council declared. "But the rising tide of restrictions abroad, the ever-increasing impact of multinational corporations, the staggering balance of payments deficits and the depression-level unemployment at home, require emergency measures."

Rail Union Coalitions Agree on Unification

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The two railroad labor organizations—the Congress of Railway Unions and the Railway Labor Executives Association—announced here they will be reunited effective Apr. 1.

The rail unions for many years prior to 1969 had been together in the RLEA. However, in that year, six organizations—United Transportation Union, Railway & Airline Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employees, Transport Workers, Seafarers and Hotel & Restaurant Employees—left to form the CRU. Differing interests of memberships and views on objectives brought about the division.

The agreement to reunite as the RLEA was reached at a joint meeting of the unions here. Reunification means the new RLEA will be composed of 19 unions representing more than 400,000 rail employes.

Affiliates will include the UTU, Waymen, Transport Workers, Seafarers, Hotel & Restaurant Employees, Machinists, Carmen, Railway Supervisors, Train Dispatchers, Locomotive Engineers, Signalmen, Sleeping Car Porters, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Marine Engineers, Masters, Mates & Pilots, Sheet Metal Workers, and Yardmasters.

The Railway & Airline Clerks, which only recently left the CRU, said it looks favorably upon the unions' reunification but will not immediately decide whether to join the organization.

The chairmen of the CRU and RLEA — UTU President Al H. Chesser and Signalmen's President C. J. Chamberlain, respectively, issued a joint statement praising the reunification as a step toward developing "an effective coordinated policy on all matters of mutual interest and importance to railroad labor."

Reunification, they added, will help the unions protect workers during the current economic crisis and give railroad labor a stronger voice in helping to restore the industry's role in mass transportation.

CONVENTIONS

The Louisiana AFL-CIO convention will be held Mar. 24-27, 1975, in Baton Rouge.

The Arkansas AFL-CIO convention will be held May 5-7, 1975, in Hot Springs.

The Wyoming State AFL-CIO convention will be held in September (exact date to be determined) in Casper.

The Allied Industrial Workers convention will be held in Kansas City starting Sept. 15 instead of Sept. 5 as previously reported.

Voting Rights Act Extension Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress should extend the Voting Rights Act and not permit it to expire this August, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

The law, originally passed in 1965 and extended five years ago, outlawed literacy tests and other subterfuges that had been used to keep blacks and other minorities from voting.

Instead of ending existing protections, the council said, the right to vote should be "expanded and safeguarded."

U.S. Commitment Cited On Aid to South Vietnam

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO affirmed its support of the "military and economic assistance authorized but not fully appropriated by the Congress" for South Vietnam.

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement declaring that North Vietnam is "waging full-scale warfare in Indochina" in violation of truce agreements, and all peace-keeping efforts have been suspended.

The U.S. Congress had authorized economic and military aid funds for South Vietnam, but $300 million has not been actually appropriated. These funds, the council said, are needed to "buttress the capability of South Vietnam and her neighbors to survive within the limits of the peace accords to which North Vietnam is a signatory."

AFL-CIO President George Meany told reporters he favored the United States keeping its commitment on the funds, that more than $700 million of the $1 billion had been appropriated, and "they should get the additional commitment in order that they can have something left to try to fight for their liberty." He added that the question now is whether "the United States is going to keep its word or is it going to walk away from its allies."

He noted in reply to a question that Vice President Jerry Wurf asked to be registered as voting against the council statement.

The statement pointed out that the truce agreement of January 1973, which provided for the withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam and parallel accords related to Laos and Cambodia, "has been violated repeatedly and openly by the introduction of North Vietnamese forces into the region."

The refusal of the Communist side to negotiate, the council added, has resulted in the suspension of all peace-keeping efforts, making the International Commission of Control & Supervision "completely ineffective."

Laggard Enforcement Scored:

Strengthening of Safety Law Pushed to Fulfill Its Promise

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress must act to fulfill the promise of protecting workers from injury and health hazards on the job as the historic federal occupational safety legislation nears its fifth anniversary this year, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The Occupational Safety & Health Act has yet to be fully implemented by the Nixon and Ford Administrations, while enforcement has been spotty because of the lack of adequate funds and misdirected policies, the council said in a statement.

A 13,000-word report accompanying the statement spells out the inadequacies of the federal safety program, observing that the administration of the act has been "one of missed deadlines, forgotten timetables and endless, needless delays."

Focus of the criticism is on the Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA), the Labor Dept. agency whose job it is to develop safety and health standards and to enforce the law.

The report charges that OSHA has been slow to develop effective safety standards and enforcement policies. "Even when OSHA seemingly is on the right track, it pulls back at the last minute."

Sufficient funding is one of OSHA's key problems, the council statement observed. "President Ford's proposed fiscal 1976 budget for OSHA merely allows for increased inflation. It does not provide for expansion or strengthening of programs."

Two other major points emerge in the report:

- The Nixon Administration purposely watered down enforcement of the act for political purposes, and that watered-down standard of enforcement continues today.
- Safety and health standards are not promptly established as the law requires. There are endless delays in the hearing process for the promulgation of standards, and the failure to properly enforce the few standards which have been developed costs workers their health and their lives.

The council urged Congress to approve funds needed to hire 2,000 OSHA compliance officers and other personnel for training, research and development efforts to fully carry out the intent of the law.

Congress should oppose all attempts to weaken the act, the council stressed, including efforts to dilute protective standards and to deny coverage of workers in small businesses.

Oversight hearings by congressional committees are particularly valuable in assuring the proper administration of the law, the council said.

It also expressed the need for improving the effectiveness of the law through the following amendments:

- Extending coverage to all workers in all workplaces, including those in federal, state and local governments.
- Establishing full federal enforcement by eliminating state programs.
- Permitting compliance officers to issue "on-the-spot" orders for workers to leave their jobs when they are in imminent danger.
- Shifting the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health to the Labor Dept. from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Requiring full pay for worker representatives accompanying compliance officers on inspections.

The report reiterated the concern of organized labor's job safety specialists over continued efforts to shift enforcement authority to ineffective state programs.

Even if the state efforts were on a par with the federal programs, the report noted, "one of the most serious dangers to enforcement of health and safety laws is the lack of uniformity in standards. This makes it difficult for multi-state employers and unions to properly fulfill their responsibilities under the law."

Despite the objections of organized labor, more federal funds have been budgeted during the current fiscal year for state programs than for federal enforcement.

Even so, there appears to have been little improvement in state efforts to step up enforcement programs although 25 states had their plans approved by the Labor Dept.

One of the policies established in the Nixon Administration that bears heavily on the development of effective standards is the requirement for an economic impact study before the standards are promulgated. The policy stresses the cost of compliance to the employer, but largely ignores the economic impact on workers left unprotected by the lack of an effective standard. The end result could be death, injury and illness to workers, lost production and increased expenditures in workers' compensation.

The report also describes instances of long delays from the time of inspection until a citation is issued and of uneven enforcement from one region to another.

'We Can Fill Our Own!'

'Drastic Action' Spurred To Counter Oil Threats

and provide for its internal allocation." The council also called for a quota on oil imports and the establishment of a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing.

On rationing the council called for permitting motor gasoline consumption above the rationed amount but levying a higher tax on this additional consumption with the funds earmarked for reducing and eliminating commuter fares and for the development of mass transit systems.

The council also called on the United States to strike back "with economic countermeasures" at any nation contemplating an embargo against the United States. It added:

"To nations imposing such an embargo against this country export bans would be applied. No item, including military equipment as well as agricultural and industrial commodities, would be shipped to such countries. Their assets in this country would be frozen. All technical assistance would be withdrawn. This country would construe such an oil embargo as economic warfare and retaliate with all of the economic weapons at its command."

In the area of energy conservation the council renewed the call for a rigidly enforced 55-mile speed limit and urged a tax on automobile and other energy-using equipment in relationship to their energy efficiency. Labelling of energy consuming equipment, revamping utility rate structures to discourage wasteful uses, energy efficiency standards for new and existing structures as well as temperature and light standards for commercial and industrial buildings were also included in the program along with a new call for expanded use of mass transit systems and subsidized low fares.

On increasing energy supplies, the council urged a major effort toward expanding the domestic use of coal, intensified production from U.S. military reserves, revocation of leases from producers who refuse to pump supplies on land leased from the United States, establishment of a government corporation for construction of prototype and new energy facilities to serve as a cost yardstick. The call for a 10-year, $20 billion government-funded crash program to develop alternative sources of energy was renewed.

The council listed 10 additional measures that included a stretch-out of environmental restrictions—a matter of timetable not of objectives; a petroleum stockpile; identification of all significant foreign investments; rejection of the proposal to deregulate the price of natural gas and "old" oil; blocking the $3 per barrel import duty plan; terminating U.S. subsidies for giant international oil companies by closing tax loopholes.

The statement urged legislation to prohibit a single company from owning competing sources of energy and laws to dissolve the vertically integrated oil companies, separating marketing from production. It renewed the proposal to treat oil companies as public utilities subject to federal regulation and for legislation to require that a substantial portion of oil imports be transported in U.S.-flag vessels.

Veteran Organizer R. W. Christofferson Dies

Robert W. Christofferson, executive secretary of the Newspaper Guild's contracts committee since 1965 and a veteran labor organizer, died after a long illness Feb. 17. Christofferson, 50, had suffered a severe stroke last June.

He had been a Guild member since 1944 and served on the organizing staff of the CIO and later the AFL-CIO. He joined the Guild staff in 1958.

Labor Pledges Renewed Fight To Ratify ERA

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its commitment to "full equality for women" and pledged a continued campaign for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The amendment, already ratified by 34 of the required 38 states, is needed to end "any doubts about the legal status of women," the Executive Council said.

A council resolution on the current observance of International Women's Year called on affiliates and central bodies "through their education programs and in the full range of their activities to focus on the status of women in every facet of national life."

It said the nation "can no longer ignore the fact that the status of women in America falls short of full equality."

At House Hearings:

Funds Urged to Add 1 Million Public Jobs

ber to the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.

That would be "an important step in the right direction," the AFL-CIO testified, but still "too low" in view of the urgency of the need. To provide an additional and "badly needed" one million jobs, the funding for the fiscal year starting July 1 should be $9.8 billion, Young said.

As to the anticipated Administration response that this would further unbalance the budget, Young stressed that every 1 percent increase in unemployment means a loss of $12 billion to $15 billion in tax revenue plus an additional $2 billion to $3 billion in unemployment insurance outlays.

"This is where the real deficit comes from," he said.

The Ford Administration has proposed $400 million in new funds for the regular public service employment program (Title 2 of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act). This program allocates money to communities with high unemployment for "transitional" jobs that are supposed to prepare persons hired for permanent employment in either the public or private sector. But the Administration has not asked any new authorizations for the less restrictive emergency public service employment program that was added at the end of 1974 as Title 6 of the law.

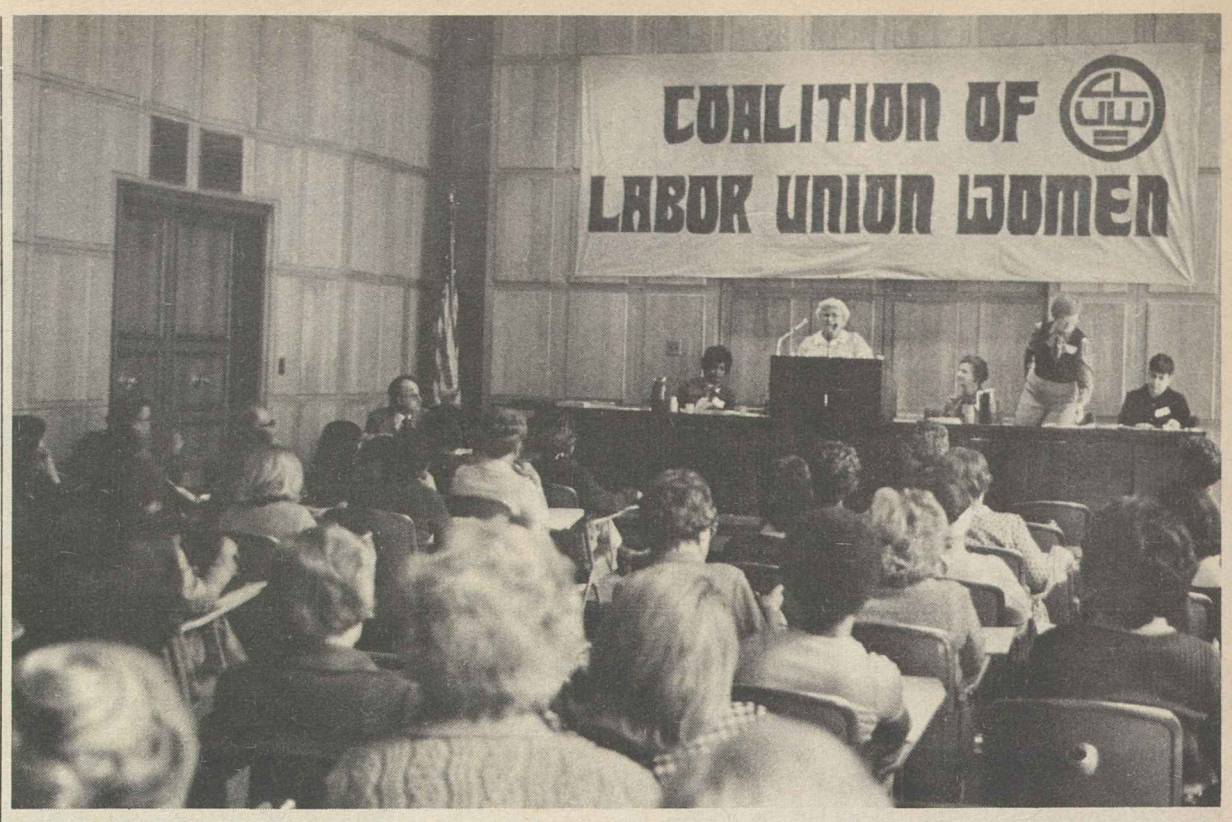
Young told the House panel that the sharp rise in unemployment accompanied by a financial squeeze on local and state governments resulting in layoffs of regular public employes has posed "impossible choices" in CETA public service hiring.

Who should be hired, Young asked, "when the job competitors include: a well qualified but laid-off city employe, a veteran, a long-term unemployed worker from the private sector, and a member of a minority group?"

Such "terrible competition among jobless workers" can be avoided only by a complete turnaround in the economy, Young said. But it can at least be reduced by adequate funding of the public service jobs program.

Young and spokesmen from affiliated unions also testifying before the subcommittee urged that the present $10,000 ceiling on salaries and benefits that can be financed under the program be lifted "so that areas with extremely high living costs can take advantage of the program."

He also urged that Congress prod the Labor Dept. to do a better job of policing violations of regulations "by state and local officials who are circumventing the law in order to use cheap labor."



FORUM ON WOMEN AND LABOR draws 80 representatives from unions, government and business to the AFL-CIO headquarters to discuss goals and problems affecting working women. The one-day conference was sponsored by the Coalition of Labor Union Women and the U.S. Center for International Women's Year. CLUW President Olga Madar addresses the forum.

Montana State Workers Win Strike Ruling

Helena, Mont. — The Montana Supreme Court ruled unanimously that most public workers in the state have the right to strike.

Montana's collective bargaining law allows "concerted activities" by workers, and the court said the phrase clearly includes strikes. It noted further that teachers and nurses are the only groups specifically denied the right to strike under state law.

Several hundred highway workers, members of four unions that bargained as a craft council, had been compelled to end a three-day strike by a temporary restraining order obtained by the Highway Dept. But the judge who issued the restraining order agreed with the union position after a hearing and dissolved it. The department then appealed to the Supreme Court.

The state's high court said that if the legislature had intended to limit the right to strike, it would have said so clearly as it did in the case of the teachers and nurses.

Real Wages Plummet To 11-Year Low

of the January CPI increase, BLS said.

These increases were only partially offset by price declines for clothing, automobiles, beef, sugar and lower mortgage interest rates, the government noted. The CPI in January stood at 156.1 percent of its 1967 average.

A breakdown of the index into its main components showed food prices rose over the month by eight-tenths of 1 percent. Nonfood commodities increased six-tenths of 1 percent, and services cost eight-tenths of 1 percent more.

Among the food items that cost more in January were bread, pork, fats and oil products, and nearly all sugar-based products. Grocery prices usually show no change in January. The cost of eating out rose 1.1 percent over December, a slightly higher increase than in the two previous months.

Among nonfood commodities, prices were higher for shoes, tobacco, gasoline, alcoholic beverages, toilet goods, and household durable goods. New car prices declined 1.8 percent, reflecting the effect of the auto industry's customer rebate scheme.

Higher charges for medical care and for utilities—gas, electricity and water and sewerage—accounted for about half the rise in the services index in January. Other services that cost more included dry cleaning, housekeeping, home maintenance, personal care and movie admissions.

Florida Teachers United By Statewide Merger

Tallahassee, Fla.—Members of the Florida Education Association and the Florida American Federation of Teachers have overwhelmingly approved a merger agreement uniting their state affiliates in a single, statewide teacher-only organization known as FEA/United.

Unofficial vote totals indicate that teachers in all 50 of the FEA and Florida AFT local affiliates approved the merger by a margin of almost 9 to 1.

"The chain remains unbroken," remarked Richard Batchelder, chief administrative officer of FEA/United. "Wherever teachers at the local level have been allowed to vote on uniting their rival organizations, they have voted to be together."

He said, "Florida teachers have voted overwhelmingly to join their colleagues in other parts of the country who have voted to merge their rival organizations and redirect their energies from fighting each other to fighting the real enemies of education."

He referred to a growing number of teacher-approved mergers including those in New Orleans, Los Angeles, Flint and Gibraltar, Mich., and New York State. Teachers in these merged organizations—about 260,000—are affiliated with both the NEA and the AFT.

The FEA and Florida AFT merger agreement and the FEA/United constitution required approval by both a majority of the members voting and a majority of the locals.

"Teachers have voted to create for themselves the strongest and most politically powerful organization in the state," Batchelder said. He noted that half the state legislature is elected from the Duval, Hillsborough and Dade County areas, all FEA/United strongholds with active political action and legislative participation.

FEA/United is affiliated with the national American Federation of Teachers, but local affiliates of the new state organization have an option on such affiliation. FEA/United is made up of locals with AFT and no national affiliation, although a majority are affiliated with the national organization.

Harris Named To New Panel On Elections

Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, has been nominated to the new Federal Elections Commission that will enforce the campaign spending law that Congress enacted last year.

The six-member bipartisan commission includes four congressional nominees and two proposed by the President. Harris was nominated by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield. All six commissioners must be confirmed by both the House and Senate.

Harris, 62, will leave the AFL-CIO to take the full-time post. The new commission will enforce the strict spending and contribution limits established for all candidates for federal office and administer the public financing of presidential election campaigns, primaries and presidential nominating conventions.

Harris has been associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO and the former CIO since 1948 and has argued a number of major cases affecting the trade union movement before the Supreme Court.

He is a nationally prominent attorney who served as law secretary of the late Supreme Court Justice Harlan Fiske Stone after his graduation from Columbia Law School in 1935 and subsequently held high posts in the Justice Dept. and several government agencies. He also has been in the private practice of law with leading firms in New York and Washington. He is a native of Arkansas and a graduate of the University of Arkansas.

Jobless Insurance Rolls Surge to New Record

goods and services showing the decline in real gross domestic product in the last three months of 1974 was steeper than originally estimated.

Real gross domestic product in the last quarter plunged at an annual rate of 9.3 percent, instead of 8.9 percent as originally announced in a preliminary Commerce Dept. report. Real GDP shows the value of goods and services produced within the boundaries of the United States.

In its revised report, the Commerce Dept. said real gross national product, which measures the total output of all citizens at home and abroad, remained the same—9.1 percent below the year-earlier quarter. Both real GDP and real GNP reflect output minus the effects of inflation.

At the same time, the government said inflation over the 1974 October-December period was higher than reported a month ago. As measured by the so-called gross national product deflator, inflation soared at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 14.4 percent—seven-tenths of 1 percent higher than the original estimate.

More bad news came from the National Machine Tool Builders Association which reported that machine-tool orders in January declined 60 percent from their year-earlier level, reflecting sharp curtailment in industry plans for expansion. And the Commerce Dept. reported that new orders for durable goods in January fell 2.8 percent, the fifth monthly drop in a row.

12 Labor Markets Join High Unemployment List

Rising joblessness pushed 12 more major labor areas into the "substantial" unemployment list during January, the Labor Dept. reported.

That raised the number of areas with unemployment above 6 percent to 67 of the nation's 150 major labor markets. A year ago, the number was only 33.

Both the total and the single-month increase in January were the highest since 1961.

Added to the list were four Ohio areas, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Toledo and Youngstown-Warren. Also added in January were San Jose, Calif.; New Haven, Conn.; Miami, Fla.; Augusta, Ga.; Utica-Rome, N.Y.; Portland, Ore.; El Paso, Tex., and Wheeling, W. Va.

Meany Warns Recession Threatens Human Rights

$5.9 Billion For Jobs Endorsed

The AFL-CIO endorsed an emergency bill to finance job-creating federal programs and President George Meany prodded Congress to complete action on the funding bill before Easter.

House Speaker Carl Albert and Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon unveiled the legislation at a joint news conference.

They said the $5.9 billion in emergency appropriations would result directly in more than 900,000 new jobs this year—and an equal number indirectly as employment feeds upon employment.

Federal funds would go into public service employment, summer jobs for youth, a vast array of public works and construction, conservation projects and the purchase of new fleets of trucks and autos by the postal service and other public agencies.

Meany wired Albert that the bill represents "a sound first step toward achieving real jobs which America needs desperately."

Introduction of the Emergency Unemployment Appropriation Act, Meany said, "is welcome news to America's millions of unemployed and the millions of other workers who live in fear that their jobs may also disappear."

The urgency is such that any delay in the legislation would be "unthinkable," Meany stressed.

As the Appropriations Committee put the funding bill in final shape, President Ford moved part way along the same path by going beyond his budget request to ask Congress for an additional $2 billion for public service jobs and for summer employment for youth. Both items are included in the $5.9 billion emergency bill announced by the House leadership.

Most of the money in the bill would close the gap between spending ceilings previously authorized by Congress and the amounts actually appropriated.

The funding bill "is not going to end unemployment overnight," Albert conceded. "A great deal more will be needed," he said, "and will be provided."

A tentative timetable called for approval of the funding package by the full Appropriations Committee on Mar. 7 and action by the House on Mar. 12. That would leave the Senate two weeks to act before an Easter recess.

Major ingredients of the funding bill include:

Senate Set To Weaken Filibuster

The Senate moved towards approval of a compromise rules change that in the future will make it somewhat easier to close debate and stop a filibuster.

Under the compromise, three-fifths of the total membership of the Senate would be able to invoke cloture. That would enable 60 senators to cut off a filibuster.

The Senate's old Rule 22 requires a two-thirds vote of senators actually present and voting in order to halt a filibuster. The two-thirds requirement could be as high as 67 with all 100 senators on hand. But normally it is several votes less because of absenteeism.

Initially, a bipartisan group of rules reform advocates had sought to change the rule to allow three-fifths of senators present and voting to break a filibuster. In most cases, the required number would be less than 60. But in weeks of parliamentary maneuvering, they were unable to penetrate the delaying tactics of opponents of rules change.

At one stage, a ruling by Vice President Rockefeller appeared to have enabled the reform group to establish the constitutional principle that at the start of a Congress a simple majority of the Senate can adopt new rules.

The rules reform move was strongly supported by the AFL-CIO and the civil rights coalition.

But Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.), who led the fight against any rules change, managed to twist the Senate into new parliamentary knots that blocked further action.

BROTHERHOOD CITATION of the National Conference of Christians & Jews is presented to AFL-CIO President George Meany by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller at a dinner in Washington attended by 1,200 persons.

Blasts Use Of Blacklist By Arabs

The deepening recession could bring new social and racial tensions threatening progress in human rights and human relations, AFL-CIO President George Meany warned.

If the economy "continues to go downhill," he told a dinner audience of 1,200 in Washington, "it can become the breeding ground of ugly social impulses and emotions."

Meany's warning came in an address accepting the national brotherhood citation of the National Conference of Christians & Jews, presented by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller.

Accepting the award in the name of the AFL-CIO, Meany said the American labor movement is the "most effective human rights organization in this country."

Spelling out the role of trade unionism in giving workers a sense of dignity and self-worth, and in sustaining the fight for freedom against dictatorship and totalitarianism, he said the labor movement "has, and must have, a continuing and consistent commitment to human rights and democratic values."

Tracing the development of the economic crisis—the worst "since the Great Depression of the 1930s"—Meany spoke of the threat of rising tensions "among them the ancient curse of anti-Semitism." He pointed out that in addition to domestic problems there are "powerful waves of anti-Semitism emanating from the Middle East."

He commended President Ford "for speaking out so clearly against the Arab blacklist. The idea that any foreign investors would discriminate against Americans who

Compromise Mood Grows:

Ford, Congress Vie On Tax, Oil Policy

By David L. Perlman

Congress and President Ford veered between confrontation and compromise on policies to halt the nation's disastrous economic plunge and put Americans back to work.

The House overwhelmingly passed a tax cut and refund bill that differed significantly from the President's proposal to give large refunds to persons in the higher income brackets and only token amounts to others. The vote was a decisive 317-97.

At Senate Finance Committee hearings, Treasury Secretary William E. Simon urged that higher-income families be given a bigger share of the tax cut. He claimed they are more likely to spend the money for major purchases that will "stimulate the really soft spots in our economy." But he stopped short of any veto warning.

Ford did carry out his threat to veto the bill suspending for 90 days his power to impose a special tariff on imported oil. But first, in a conciliatory gesture, he postponed the second and third step of his oil tariff hike. That left standing only the initial $1-a-barrel tax he had imposed last month.

In contrast to some recent high-velocity rhetoric from the White House seeking to portray Congress as a "do-nothing" body blocking the President's program, Ford had nothing but good words about the Democratic congressional leadership in his veto message. He termed their desire to hold up the oil tariff "reasonable" and welcomed the fact that Congress is "moving" on energy problems.

Congressional leaders put off an immediate effort to override the veto. The President's "olive branch" approach reduced the likelihood of mustering the needed two-thirds majority against the veto.

The AFL-CIO had strongly protested the oil tariff and had sup-

New Cuts in Tariffs Held Path to 'Disaster'

A new wave of tariff cuts would throw more workers out of jobs and push the United States to the brink of "economic disaster," the AFL-CIO warned.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the U.S. International Trade Commission that past shifts of production to low-wage nations left America "pock-marked by abandoned factories."

His testimony was presented by Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, accompanied by Economist Elizabeth Jager.

In some communities that were once manufacturing centers, "the busiest facility is the state unemployment office," he observed.

The International Trade Commission — the new name for the U.S. Tariff Commission — is holding regional hearings on "the economic impact of future tariff reductions which the President can make through international trade agreements under the Trade Act of 1974."

Its recommendations to the President are expected to influence the U.S. position in forthcoming trade negotiations.

Biemiller told the commission that the AFL-CIO doesn't see how

Economic Index Down For 6th Straight Month

The government's composite index of leading economic indicators declined 1.3 percent in January, the Commerce Dept. reported. It was the sixth consecutive monthly drop in the index, which serves as a barometer of economic trends. The December decline was 3.1 percent.

The six-month skid equaled the most prolonged decline on record—from September 1957 through February 1958—but the depth of the current measurement is steeper. Since its peak last July, the index has dropped 12.6 percent, easily surpassing the 9 percent fall-off in the '50s.

Even so, the Commerce Dept. report may not reflect the true dimensions of the economic slump. A study by the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston showed its index of key economic indicators down by 3 percent in January, more than double the rate indicated by the Commerce Dept.

The Fed's index of 12 economic indicators is considered by many

Alexander Uhl Retires From PAI Service

Alexander H. Uhl, editor and co-founder of Press Associates, Inc. with Harry Conn 21 years ago, has announced his retirement effective Mar. 1.

One of the nation's outstanding labor journalists, Uhl was a respected foreign correspondent and editor before his PAI days. As a PAI editor he concentrated in such areas as economics and trade, explaining the complexities of both to readers of the labor press through the service.

Born June 11, 1899, in New York City, Uhl received his bachelor of arts degree from City College of New York and did graduate work at the Columbia School of Journalism. After serving one year as a reporter on the Newark Star Eagle, he joined the Associated Press in 1923.

In 1935 he was assigned as bureau chief in Madrid and headed the AP coverage of the Spanish Civil War through 1938. His stories from Spain were heralded for their depth and significance. "It was in Spain that I first developed a social conscience," he later said.

From 1940 to 1948 he served as foreign editor of the newspaper PM and covered the European Theater during World War II. He was awarded the French Legion of Honor decoration. After PM folded, he moved to Washington as a writer for the Public Affairs Institute and in 1954, along with Conn, founded Press Associates, which today is the only independent national trade union press service.

Uhl lives with his wife, Gladys, on a farm in Montgomery County, Md. He plans to write, particularly on the Spanish Civil War, and possibly do some traveling.

RETIRING LABOR NEWSMAN Alex Uhl chats with AFL-CIO President George Meany during the recent Executive Council meeting. Uhl capped a long journalistic career, including service as a foreign correspondent in the Spanish Civil War and World War II, with his retirement Mar. 1. With Harry Conn, Uhl founded Press Associates, Inc., the labor news service, 21years ago.

Pilots Seek Reform Of CAB Procedures

The Air Line Pilots Association proposed sweeping changes in Civil Aeronautics Board procedures and regulations which it said are long overdue.

"The nation has suffered long enough from the abuses of an antiquated system of regulation which permits a dynamic industry to die on its feet while professing to serve the public interest," Capt. Rod Gilstrap, ALPA first vice president, said in testimony to a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

Specifically, ALPA proposed the following amendments to the Federal Aviation Act, under which CAB gets its authority:

- Improve the statute, enhance antitrust policy and spell out in detail its mandate with respect to the nature and scope of air carrier competition it desires to preserve.
- Prevent the board from breaking its labor promises by incorporating into the act itself the obligation to protect employes. Congressional amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act serve as precedents for such action.

He charged that the CAB approved capacity reduction agreements as devices by which carriers achieved multilateral reduction in service and major profit benefits to the detriment of the public interest and airline career personnel. In the process, he said, CAB's procedures for the decision-making have been debased.

Pilot and flight attendant layoffs in recent years have reached levels exceeding those in any other period in aviation history, he said. "With TWA alone, 840 pilots have been furloughed since 1970." He added that the board considers this loss in career and manpower resources to the total system to be "only of limited effect" and does not require invoking its employe protection formula where capacity reductions are concerned.

Meany Warns Nation:

Recession Threatens Human Rights Gains

are Jewish or who do business with Israel is a monstrous abomination."

Meany urged going further than the President's statement. "I think we have to let the whole world know that in the United States of America, that in our country, human rights still take priority over the dollar.

"I think we should tell the Arabs that any would-be investors from any country who subscribe to the blacklist are henceforth barred from doing business in the United States. There is some business we don't need."

Rockefeller praised Meany for his leadership in the human rights, civil rights battles and in labor-management relations, for his candor and integrity. Dinner Chairman Joseph B. Danzansky said that NCCJ in selecting Meany for the award was especially mindful of his "leadership of the labor movement in its constant efforts to improve human conditions, in maintaining individual freedoms and in efforts to achieve justice for all in a free society."

Meany commended Rockefeller for his role as presiding officer of the Senate in the current filibuster battle, noting that "I see where he is trying to bring the United States Senate into the 20th Century. And I would say, if he was scarred a little in the attempt, not to worry about it. They are very honorable scars."

Discussing the role of the trade union movement and its relationship to human rights, Meany said the unions are in the business of "helping people hold their heads a little higher," and making them "more conscious of their human rights."

Achievements in the human rights field are threatened by the deepening recession, he said, because "racial and social tensions are bound to rise, posing a threat to the real accomplishments of organizations like the National Conference of Christians & Jews and so many others that have labored so hard to eradicate bigotry and prejudice from the land."

There is in addition a great confusion around the world about what the United States stands for, Meany said, contrasting the reluctance in Congress to make good on a $300 million aid commitment to South Vietnam while expressing a willingness to give 6 percent U.S. credits to the Soviet Union. If the argument to cut off aid to South Vietnam is based on the ground that its government is repressive, he observed, then the Soviet Union hardly qualifies with "the most degrading form of corruption—the complete monopoly of all power" to be found anywhere.

There was a time when the United States had a clear commitment to the growth and expansion of democratic societies throughout the world, Meany said, but this is now "buried under mountains of propaganda about detente and peaceful coexistence. . . . I think this is a terrible thing." He added:

"There is no doubt in my mind that this worldwide confusion about the credibility, the commitment and the cardinal purposes of the U.S. in world affairs today is a major factor contributing to the financial and political instability that has shaken so much of the western world and threatens to alter the international balance of power with frightful consequences."

Meany concluded, "we cannot survive as a trade union movement except where there is democracy. Human rights are the very life blood of our movement."

Harding Retires As OCAW Editor

Denver — Paul Harding retired Feb. 1 as publicity director for the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and editor of the union's newspaper, ending a 31-year trade union career.

Jerry Archuleta, assistant publicity director and a former editor of the Colorado Labor Advocate, will succeed Harding.

Election Fund Mounting From Checkoff of Taxes

The checkoff of tax dollars to provide public financing for the next presidential election campaign is earmarking sufficient funds so that candidates will no longer have to rely on private contributors.

An Internal Revenue Service tally of returns filed during the first five weeks of this year showed that 23.6 percent of taxpayers were checking the box that directs the government to put $1 of their taxes into the nonpartisan presidential campaign fund—$2 in the case of a couple filing a joint return.

That still indicates that a great many people are confused over the fund or overlook the box to be checked. But the participation is greater than last year when, during a comparable period, only 14.1 percent of taxpayers earmarked their dollar.

The AFL-CIO and other groups have sought to clear up misconceptions, noting that persons who check the presidential fund box do not pay any more nor any less in taxes than if they did not mark the box. The check merely directs the government to put into the fund $1 of taxes that would be paid anyway.

The law limits spending by and for a presidential candidate and allocates $20 million from public funds for each major party candidate, with lesser amounts for third party candidates. A candidate accepting public funds is barred from private fund-raising.

Earmarked funds over the past two years have put $30 million into the presidential fund, and this year's returns are expected to double that amount.

In addition to full financing of the general election campaign, the fund is available for matching payments to candidates running in presidential primaries — provided they raise an equal amount of funds in small contributions from supporters.

The federal Campaign Financing Act strictly limits the amount of money that can be spent in campaigns, whether raised from private contributions or received from the presidential fund.

Maritime Union Sanctions Ended

Sanctions required under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes plan have been removed from the National Maritime Union, Federation President George Meany informed affiliates.

Meany said the NMU has fulfilled "in all respects" the procedures of Section 16 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution dealing with removal of sanctions imposed for noncompliance with determinations of the impartial umpire. The sanctions had been imposed in November 1962.

Since the NMU is now in full compliance with Article XX, Meany said the NMU is entitled to full protection under the disputes plan and "other rights enjoyed by AFL-CIO affiliates in good standing."

He advised all affiliates that his letter of Nov. 30, 1962, finding the NMU in noncompliance "is herewith rescinded."

Action by Arizona Governor Urged To Help Settle Lemon Grove Strike

AFL-CIO President George Meany has appealed to Arizona Gov. Raul Castro to intervene in the Farm Workers' strike for union recognition in the Yuma County lemon groves which is entering its seventh month.

The Farm Workers are determined to bring a measure of decency to their members, Meany said, and will not abandon their cause until collective bargaining rights are achieved for the citrus grove workers.

But the growers are prepared to allow the strike to go on even as millions of dollars in crops are lost, he pointed out.

The 1,600 UFW lemon pickers and pruners have demonstrated full support of the strike against the more than 600 citrus growers in the Yuma area.

Since the strike began last August, the dispute has been marked by periodic harassment of the pickets by Yuma County's Sheriff's Dept., the UFW charged. It said hundreds of strikers have been arrested and a number of pickets were beaten.

The UFW called the strike after the growers failed to respond to its requests for union recognition and negotiations for a first contract in the state's lemon groves. The growers have been paying lemon pickers an average of $36 a week early in the season and up to about $120 a week at the height of the harvest.

With trees in the Yuma area drooping from the weight of ripe lemons, UFW President Cesar Chavez said that the growers' losses from the strike have been high. Still, he expressed optimism that the union and growers can reach agreement.

In his letter to Castro, Meany said the intervention of the governor's office is vital to achieve an early settlement.

"This strike will eventually be settled," Meany said. "The Farm Workers union will be recognized and the rights of both the employers and workers will eventually be respected in that relationship."

"Enough time has passed for everyone to realize that, and I believe that the time to intercede and to attempt to bring about a settlement of this strike is now."

Meany assured Castro of the federation's cooperation in seeking a settlement, saying that his office and that of the Arizona AFL-CIO were ready to give any assistance he needed.

Although UFW strikers have maintained picket lines at the groves six days a week from 5 a.m. to 5 p.m., strike-breaking activity was stepped up when the growers raised bin pay for the pickers from $12 to $18, the union reported.

It said the majority of the strike-breakers are illegal aliens who cross the border from Mexico. When the UFW reports the illegal aliens to the U.S. Immigration & Naturalization Service many are pulled out of the fields and sent back to Mexico—often without the pay they have due. But within three days, the deported illegals are back on the job, the union charged.

Centennial Banquet:

Marine Engineers Celebrate 100th Anniversary as Union

By James M. Shevis

One hundred years ago, 10 men met in Cleveland to explore the idea of forming a national organization of licensed steamboat engineers. Their need was pressing.

Marine engineers then faced intolerable working conditions, including scandalously low pay. Working close to the new steamboat boilers that powered the early ships along the Mississippi and the Great Lakes, they often suffered injury—sometimes death—when the cheap engines exploded in their faces.

The engineers earlier had banded together in city associations, but these were not enough to bring about the reforms that were needed. Out of that Cleveland meeting on Feb. 21, 1875, was born the National Marine Engineers Association, dedicated to "the elevation and maintenance of the rights" of its members.

Today, marking its centennial, the National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association (the word Beneficial was added in 1883) is a union with a growing membership. It has become an increasingly significant force in the mainstream of the American trade-union movement.

At a centennial banquet in Washington attended by more than 1,000 union, industry and government leaders, MEBA President Jesse M. Calhoon noted that the problems of a century ago are much the same today.

In 1875, he said, Americans were battling inflation, high unemployment, recovering from a divisive war and worrying about trade. "If you throw in the energy crisis, you have the problems of today," Calhoon observed.

But he added, "the greatest problem facing this nation today is the multinational corporation" which "owes no loyalty to any nation," and "thinks of itself as a supergovernment." Because of multinationals, Calhoon said, American jobs have gone abroad and the nation's economic situation has been greatly exacerbated.

In an introduction to a history of the maritime union prepared for the centennial observance. Calhoon looked back on "a century of progress" for MEBA members.

"A hundred years ago the engineering officer lived an uncertain existence," he noted. "Exploitation and poor working conditions were the accepted norm.

"Today, through the collective bargaining process and the essential strength of the union, the engineering officers of the American merchant marine have achieved a status commensurate with the greatly increased responsibilities of their position."

MEBA in its early years was more a professional society than a trade union. But in 1891 the organization struck Great Lakes vessel owners when they proposed a wage reduction for its members. The action caused the owners to drop the pay-cut idea and enhanced the organization's prestige and influence.

MEBA survived the economic panics that periodically beset the country through the years, and came of age with the onset of World War I. A generation later, during a second world war, the union rushed to the nation's defense again, manning the merchant ships that carried vital goods to American troops overseas.

With the nation's other maritime unions, MEBA emerged from World War II in a sound condition. But, as shipping declined and the federal government adopted an off-again on-again interest in maritime affairs, job opportunities — and membership — slipped sharply.

Nevertheless, the post-war years have brought impressive gains in both wages and working conditions, and MEBA has joined with other maritime unions in a program to spur the revitalization of the American merchant marine.

The Merchant Marine Act of 1970 marked the most sweeping maritime legislation in more than a third of a century. The measure, enacted with the strong support of maritime labor, called for government subsidy of the construction of 300 American-flag ships over a 10-year period.

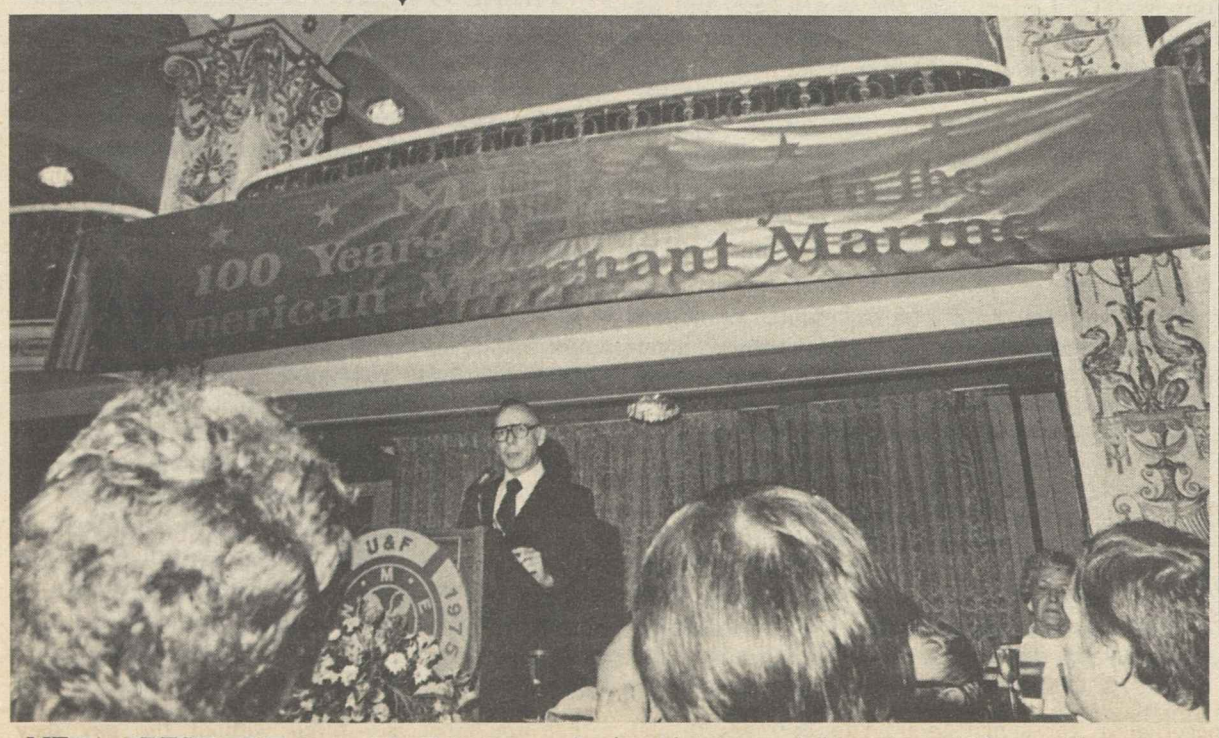
Another legislative milestone appeared within reach when Congress approved the Energy Transportation Act of 1974 requiring that a share of all oil imports be carried in American-flag ships. Hopes that the legislation would spur a revival of maritime industry employment were dashed when President Ford used a pocket veto to kill it.

MEBA's current membership works out of Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific ports, as well as on ships in the Great Lakes. In recent years, other groups of professional employes have affiliated with the union, the largest of which are the Air Traffic Controllers.

At its centennial banquet, the union awarded plaques to several individuals for their contributions to the maritime industry. Recipients included AFL-CIO President George Meany, Senators Warren Magnuson and Henry Jackson of Washington, Rep. Leonor Sullivan of Missouri and Malcolm McLean of Sea-land Service.

Certificates were presented Helen D. Bentley, chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission, and Robert J. Blackwell, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Maritime Affairs.

Accepting the award for Meany was AFL-CIO Vice President Paul Hall.



MEBA PRESIDENT Jesse M. Calhoon, reviewing highlights of the union's 100-year history at a centennial observance in Washington, pledged the Marine Engineers would continue its fight to rebuild the United States merchant marine.

Rail Dispatchers Agree On Terms of Contract

The Train Dispatchers became the fifth railroad union to reach agreement with the industry in the current round of negotiations. Another union, the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, was reported close to settlement.

The National Railway Labor Conference, which represents management, said a tentative accord between the Engineers and the carriers had been worked out but that "nothing has been initialed."

The Dispatchers gave final approval to their pact at a meeting of the union's executive board. Meanwhile, two other AFL-CIO affiliates — the United Transportation Union and the Sheet Metal Workers—also reported ratification of their agreements.

All the agreements generally match those accepted in January by the Waymen, Signalmen, Sheet Metal Workers, and the United Transportation Union. The agreement calls for wage and benefits increases totaling about 41 percent over a three-year period.

UTU reported its membership approved the new contract by a ratio of 18 to 1, while the Dispatchers reported approval by a 6 to 1 ratio. The Waymen and Signalmen ratified the pact earlier.

Meanwhile, the Transport Workers and the American Railway Supervisors Association reported reaching tentative agreements with the Penn Central.

Talks with the industry were going forward with the Yardmasters. The Railway & Airline Clerks, which had broken off negotiations with the carriers, were in mediation under the auspices of the National Mediation Board.

Four shopcraft unions in the Railway Employees' Dept. — the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Carmen, Firemen & Oilers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—petitioned for mediation but scheduled talks nonetheless. The Machinists also asked for assistance from the mediation panel but continued to negotiate with the industry.

About half of the 500,000 workers employed by the major railroads now are covered by new agreements.

In other developments, the unions were studying a government plan to reorganize seven bankrupt railroads stretching over half the nation. Drawn up by the U.S. Railway Association, the preliminary system plan would consolidate the troubled lines into one streamlined carrier called ConRail.

USRA was set up by Congress to reorganize the bankrupt carriers. Rail labor took the lead in pushing for the congressional action. The proposed consolidation affects about 100,000 workers represented by 26 unions with 140 individual collective bargaining agreements. The unions are expected to give their views on the proposal at hearings scheduled in the next few months in 23 cities.

Meanwhile, the management of the financially ailing Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific accepted a union proposal to provide the railroad with "interest-free loans" in the form of voluntary 10 percent pay cuts to be repaid at a later date. Management personnel would be asked to take the same pay cut.

TWUA Seeks 20% Boost at Northern Mills

Boston — The Textile Workers Union of America will seek a 20 percent wage boost and substantial fringe benefit improvements in this year's bargaining with the woolen and northern cotton-synthetic industries.

About 20,000 workers at 70 plants, mostly in New England, will be affected by the talks, TWUA President Sol Stetin noted at a conference of more than 100 union delegates from the two industries here.

The conferees drew up a policy calling for one-year contracts in all instances to prevent workers from being tied down to future wage increases that may prove insufficient in the face of inflation.

Stetin noted the 12-month duration was prompted by refusal of the northern cotton-synthetic industry to reopen its agreements in February 1974 after the Nixon Administration had "allowed prices and profits to run hogwild."

All cotton-synthetic agreements are due to expire in mid-April. About half of the agreements in the woolen industry expire in May and suceeding months.

The Concentration of Power

COMPREHENSIVE INFORMATION on the structure of the American economy is woefully lacking. The massive studies and reports of the New Deal era are far out of date.

The 500 biggest U.S. corporations now hold more than two-thirds of all business income.

The top 111 manufacturing corporations hold more than half of all assets and get more than half of all profits in manufacturing.

The 50 biggest banks control more than half of all bank assets and hold leverage control stock in more than 5,200 companies.

Although the record flood of mergers in the late 1960s and early 1970s has slowed down, conglomerate mergers in manufacturing, mining and services—accompanied by increasing concentration of banking, with interlocking business connections—are continuing to produce increased concentration of economic power.

Big multi-product, multinational conglomerate corporations have spread their power globally, through mushrooming investments in subsidiaries and joint ventures in foreign countries and through aggressive merger-and-acquisition campaigns at home. They export jobs of American workers, as well as capital and technology developed in the United States, at the expense of the American taxpayer.

U.S. corporate expansion overseas, often in the newest technological industries, blunts domestic economic expansion and reduces job opportunities at home. This process is eroding the nation's industrial base, and accompanying plant shutdowns are undermining the economic strength of numerous communities throughout the country.

Excessive concentration in such basic industries as food and energy results in high prices that drain billions of dollars away from the buying power of American families.

Unfortunately, there is little detailed information on the structure, ownership, management, policies and operation of America's giant business and financial institutions and their interlocking relationships. These economic giants far too often can avoid effective public regulation because the U.S. Congress, government regulatory agencies and the general public—including representatives of consumers and workers—simply cannot get adequate detailed information.

Much more adequate public disclosure of basic economic information must be forthcoming. The quarterly line-of-business reports now required of major corporations by the Federal Trade Commission are only a small step in the right direction.

Also aimed in the right direction are the model corporate disclosure regulations proposed by a federal interagency committee and supported by Sen. Lee Metcalf of Montana to get detailed information on corporate structure, voting stock ownership, interlocking corporate directorships and many other aspects of the structure and operations of big corporations.

The AFL-CIO calls on the Congress to undertake a full-scale, comprehensive investigation of the structure of the U.S. economy, the role of mergers and acquisitions at home and abroad in increasing economic concentration, the interlocking relationship among the giant corporations and banks, their control of key parts of the U.S. economy, their effects on prices, income distribution, America's position in the world economy, and the impact of these tremendous aggregations of economic power on democratic institutions.

A Word Edgewise:

Doomsday Weapons Proliferate With Easy Access to 'Nuke Club'

By John P. Roche

CURIOUSLY—PROBABLY BECAUSE we don't want to think about it—one of the greatest risks to our civilization, and I mean world civilization, has received very little public attention. I describe this as the problem of the "Sears Roebuck nuke," the nuclear weapons which can be obtained virtually by mail order by nations not now members of the "nuclear club."

The classic example here was India, which obtained for "peaceful purposes some atomic reactors from Canada and proceeded to use the plutonium by-product to join the "club." The Canadians are currently negotiating with other countries, notably Argentina, for the sale of more of these reactors—naturally for "peaceful purposes."

The United States in the 1950s installed 26 reactors in foreign states, but recently we have been much more cautious. (Though former President Nixon, during his joyous honeymoon with Egypt's President Sadat, did offer him a reactor.)

Then there is the problem of protecting American tactical nuclear weapons scattered throughout NATO. Let us take the worst case and assume that Turkey pulls out of NATO, that there are tactical nukes on Turkish soil, and that the Turks decide to keep them. Do we launch an expedition against Turkey to rescue the weapons' systems? Can we count on the various electronic locks and the label that reads: "Not to be opened without permission of the President of the United States?" Or would the Turks shortly have an operational nuclear capacity?

Experts differ slightly on the number of nations that could in a short period of time develop nuclear weapons, but the list is impressive and terrifying. Worse than that is the degree to which technology has almost reached the point where a suitcase could hold a murderous nuclear weapon and, given the extent to which present international conditions have fulfilled St. Augustine's pessimism about the nature of man, somebody could supply terrorist organizations with suitcases.

Fortunately at the moment we have as director and assistant director of the United States Arms Control & Disarmament Agency two men who are acutely aware of these apocalyptic potentialities: Dr. Fred Ikle and Amron H. Katz. Indeed, a quarter of a century ago, when Argentine dictator Juan Peron announced he was (with the aid of a refugee Nazi scientist) building an atomic bomb (later dubbed the "baloney bomb"), Katz began to worry about the possibilities of "catalytic war"—that is, the ability of a malignant third power to trigger a nuclear exchange between the U.S. and the USSR.

As he put it in an article in 1961: "A third country, or its leaders, might in a fit of miscalculation or ignorance or stupidity or for other reasons, consider it useful to bring the United States and the Soviet Union to their knees, thus elevating the relative position of the third country. One way for a third country to do this would be to put a bomb in a ship and set it off in New York harbor, with the hope that the U.S. thinking the Soviets did it, would immediately launch a 'retaliatory' attack on the Soviet Union. (Whether under such circumstances) we respond by getting into a big war depends on whether or not we have anticipated and thought about this possibility ahead of time."

Sardonically, Katz suggested each nation be internationally assigned a color for its mushroom clouds. Then observers could ask, "Whose cloud is that?"

THERE IS A BITTER NOTE about this, as well there should be. For all intents and purposes the problem has been swept under the rug for years. Simultaneously, the number of nuclear powers has increased, to say nothing of those (like Canada) who could rapidly join the throng but have refrained on policy grounds.

However, in January 1975, in a Washington speech which oddly enough got better coverage abroad than here, Dr. Ikle highlighted the dangers inherent in the worldwide spread of nuclear technology: "The truth is that we are basically defenseless against threats of nuclear attack that could come from a great many different sources rather than from one or two principal adversaries. Our strategic doctrine and strategic weapons systems are designed to deter these potential advesaries from launching an attack. . . . In a world of widespread nuclear proliferation (our strategic) premises would be shattered."

Ikle went on to suggest a number of safeguards that should immediately be given top priority, calling for an extensive critique and revision of our military strategies. The President and Congress should take a little time off from tennis and listen to our arms-control experts.

Labor's Case for Tax Justice:

Billions in Revenues Forfeited For Lack of Fair Tax System

The following is excerpted from a statement on tax justice adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on Feb. 20, 1975, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

WHILE AN EMERGENCY tax cut is needed immediately to stimulate the economy and create jobs, such a tax cut must be followed promptly by a program of tax justice:

- To put an end to the loopholes and special privileges which rig the tax structure against wage earners and consumers.
- To help restore the balance needed to permit the nation to recover from the present economic crisis in a sustainable fashion.
- To help rebuild public confidence in government and the economy.
- To enable the federal government to raise equitably the revenue necessary to meet the need for essential public investments and to maintain government operations.

However, in the name of fighting inflation and budget deficits, the Administration proposes sharp cutbacks in essential federal programs that create jobs, alleviate human hardship and help build the nation.

Yet, there are no proposals whatsoever to meet budget problems by closing any of the escape hatches which cost billions of dollars in revenue and unfairly rig the tax structure.

As soon as the Congress completes its work on an immediate, emergency tax cut, it must move as quickly as possible to enact a comprehensive program of tax justice.

Such a program of tax reform would raise some $20-$30 billion by loophole-closing reforms and provide sufficient revenue to permit tax reductions, which would in fact lower the share of the tax burden and increase the real purchasing power of low- and middle-income Americans.

The corporate income tax structure must be thoroughly and completely overhauled.

Elimination of the tax subsidies for the overseas operations of U.S.-based multinational corporations generally, and of U.S.-based international oil companies specifically, requires top priority. These preferences have eroded the tax structure, destroyed American jobs and helped make America vulnerable to economic and political blackmail.

Moreover, through devices such as phantom write-offs for depreciation and depletion, inventory accounting gimmickry and the many opportunities available to multinational companies to shift profits between countries, branches and affiliates, the measuring of corporate profits for tax purposes has been badly undermined.

As a result, corporations are bearing less and less of the nation's tax burden. In 1973, for example, 10 corporations with profits totalling almost $1 billion paid no federal income taxes at all and the nation's largest oil companies paid U.S. income taxes at effective rates of about 6 percent of their profits. In the 1960s, corporations bore about one-third of the nation's income tax load. In recent years, the corporate share has slipped to about 25 percent.

IF CORPORATIONS presently were bearing the same share of the income tax load as in the 1960s, federal revenues (fiscal 1975) would be some $20 billion higher.

In addition, the AFL-CIO urges prompt enactment of the many tax reforms needed to assure that wealthy individuals bear their fair share of the tax burden. In 1972, according to the latest available information, no federal income taxes, whatsoever, were paid on 402 tax returns from individuals with incomes of over $100,000. We call for:

1. Closing the capital gains loopholes. The preferential half-tax which applies to gains on unearned income stocks or other property sold at the profit and the zero tax that applies to such gains when passed on at death are among the most disruptive elements in the tax structure. Closing these loopholes could raise as much as $8-$10 billion in annual revenue.

2. Disallowing the tax exemption for interest income from state and local bonds. This provision benefits only banks and the very wealthy. Such income should be taxed in full with the federal government providing an interest-subsidy to assure that fiscal powers of the state and local governments are not hampered.

3. Eliminating the maximum-tax provision, an uncalled-for tax bonanza to top corporate executives and others whose income comes from very high fees and salaries. The yearly revenue gain would be over $200 million.

4. Ending the many opportunities for the wealthy to shelter and wash-out otherwise taxable income through investments in mineral exploration and oil drilling ventures, real estate, hobby farms and the like. Revenue losses from these tax avoidance opportunities total over $1 billion annually.

5. Overhauling federal estate and gift taxes. Present law provides unnecessary exemptions and a host of opportunities to minimize or postpone tax payments for generations, through devices such as family foundations and generation-skipping trusts. An effective and equitable estate and gift tax structure could generate about $3 billion in additional annual revenue.

Stronger Stimulus Needed:

Ford's Economic Proposals Held Deficient for Recovery

PRESIDENT FORD'S plan for an income tax rebate coupled with huge hikes in energy taxes would do little or nothing to stem the recession, create jobs or slow inflation, AFL-CIO tax expert Arnold Cantor declared.

"The economy needs a tremendous amount of stimulation," Cantor stressed, probably double the $16 billion the President asked for in his tax rebate plan. The approach of the House-passed bill is much better, he said, pointing out that more of the rebate on 1974 taxes would go to low- and moderate-income families, and the measure adds a tax cut for 1975, which would mean lower withholding and more take-home pay for most working families at about the same time the rebates are coming through.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, the assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Research warned that the program the President sent to Congress would bring "continued unemployment, continued recession, continued high prices and continued inflation."

Cantor turned aside the contention that a $30 billion-or-greater tax cut would trigger another cycle of inflation. He stressed that the economy is now operating far below its potential with "much excess and unused capacity." Further, he said, the inflation danger is slight "when you have automobile lots bulging . . . retail shelves sagging with goods that people don't want or can't afford . . . industries operating at very low capacity rates and, most important, when you have 7½ million workers unemployed."

Cantor said that as soon as "Congress finishes the emergency tax cut that is needed to stimulate the economy, it should turn to a "real program of reform" that will help raise revenues and, in fact, permit reduction of the relative tax burden on low- and moderate-income people.

He said that among the loopholes to be closed is "a whole range of corporate gimmickry, such as depreciation speed-ups, which have really decimated the corporate tax structure." He noted that if corporations were paying the same share of the income tax load in the 1960s, that would add $20 billion to federal revenues.

Questioning Cantor were John V. Reistrup of the Washington Post and Michael Posner of Reuters New Agency. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

LAST YEAR BROUGHT A RASH of derailments of trains carrying explosives. The National Transportation Safety Board has just completed a long probe of an airline crash outside Washington. Truck drivers are seeking repeal of legislation passed in 1974 allowing heavier and longer trucks.

If there's a common thread running through these developments it is that the need for safety in transportation is crucial. Injuries, deaths and property damage from transportation accidents involve not only workers but also the traveling public—and even innocent bystanders.

When a train laden with chemicals derails, it often either explodes or leaks dangerous gases. Last summer, within a period of several months, there was a whole flurry of such derailments. The United Transportation Union described the sites of accidents—Decatur, Wenatchee, Peotone, Bluford and Markham City—as "sounding like the names of Civil War battlefields and left resembling them." Nine persons were killed, several hundred were injured and thousands of community residents left in shock.

Many members of Congress thought they had dealt with this problem when they passed the Hazardous Materials Control Act of 1970. Now lawmakers have become appalled by its lack of effectiveness. A Senate committee found that more than 2 billion tons of hazardous materials are in transport in the United States each day, with less than 2 percent undergoing any inspection.

The 93rd Congress passed legislation to strengthen the law with new safeguards against hazardous materials in transportation. Now unions are waiting to see of the new legislation will be effective. It directs the Dept. of Transportation to implement regulations to restrict hazardous cargoes. Union leaders were dismayed that President Ford, while signing the bill, expressed concern over the additional "paperwork" it might cause industries.

The Air Line Pilots tried for more than three years to get curbs on hazardous materials being carried on passenger planes. Until ALPA's efforts received news and television exposure last year, few passengers probably knew they were being accompanied by assorted explosives, flammable items, acids, laboratory-produced disease germs and radioactive materials.

BEFORE THE NEW LAW was passed, the union served notice it would refuse to move passenger planes carrying such cargoes after Feb. 1, 1975. The legislation is supposed to apply to airlines. But when no new regulations came through by Feb. 1, ALPA applied its embargo. The only exception is radioactive materials destined for medical use.

The union says the embargo has been effective. DOT's reaction has been a request to the Civil Aeronautics Board to reject "unlawful" embargoes on hazardous materials, to block carriers from cooperating with the union in its "won't fly" campaign.

Only recently, the National Transportation Safety Board conducted nearly a month of hearings into the Dec. 1, 1974, crash of a TWA jetliner into the foothills of the Blue Ridge mountains on its approach to Dulles International Airport during a snowstorm.

Hearings into air crashes are routine. Washington seldom hears much about them. But this one was in its own backyard. The hearings were front page news for weeks and got feature coverage on radio and TV. Most of the proceedings were occupied with who was to blame.

But the ALPA and the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization (PATCO) both want the government to look beyond blame for a particular accident. They urge a uniform air traffic control system embodied into one manual for pilots and controllers alike.

ALPA and PATCO also believe that another point has been overshadowed. They contend that if either of two landing safety systems—a Precision Approach Radar system or an Instrument Landing System—had been installed to control Runway 12 into Dulles the TWA crash would not have occurred.

NO STIMULATION for economic recovery is found in President Ford's combination of income tax rebates and huge hikes in energy taxes, Arnold Cantor, center, said on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO assistant research director was questioned by John Reistrup, left, of the Washington Post and Michael Posner of Reuters News Agency. The program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Mediation Cases Jump By 16 Percent in Year

The federal government stepped up its mediation activity in labor-management disputes during fiscal year 1974, according to the annual report of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The report discloses that FMCS was involved in 20,160 cases between July 1, 1973 and June 30, 1974, an increase of more than 16 percent from the 16,930 cases reported in the previous fiscal year.

The 1974 level surpassed the previous high of 17,668 cases recorded in 1971, and marked the first year FMCS has handled more than 20,000 cases since it was established as an independent agency in 1947.

The report noted that the number of strikes in fiscal 1974 rose from the previous reporting year. FMCS counted 2,801 walkouts last year, compared to 1,937 in 1973. The agency said a large number of the strikes occurred after Apr. 30, when wage controls expired.

"The percentage of strikes to settlements increased from 11.4 percent in FY '73 to 14.9 percent in FY '74," FMCS reported, "but was identical to the percentage of FY '71, when many of the same agreements were last negotiated."

The FMCS also noted that while private sector mediation activity was up in 1974, public sector activity increased more. This was partly a reflection of the large organizing gains posted among public employes.

"About one-third of all state, local and federal employes are now organized, compared to about 20 percent of the private workforce," FMCS said.

The agency said it was involved in 507 federal disputes in fiscal year 1974, compared to fewer than 200 the year before. In addition, it mediated 140 state and local cases, compared to practically none in previous years.

FMCS made several major organizational changes during the year, including:

- Establishment of a technical services office, with coordinators assigned to each of the agency's seven regions, to coordinate technical assistance and public-sector bargaining.
- Creation of a separate general counsel's office and a strengthened office of arbitration services. They were previously combined.

The FMCS report observes in an introduction that the agency's rising workload results from a greater acceptance of the value of third-party assistance by both labor and management.

Job-Restoring Plan Outlined In CEP Study

An immediate $40 billion federal stimulus, along with other fiscal and monetary actions, could restore maximum employment, production and purchasing power to the nation by the end of 1976 or shortly thereafter, the Conference on Economic Progress declared.

A conference study, prepared mainly by Leon H. Keyserling, a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Truman, said the economic expansion should include $8 billion for a public service employment program of about one million jobs, $16 billion in tax reductions for low- and middle-income workers, and $16 billion in increased federal spending beyond that provided in the Administration's fiscal 1976 budget.

In addition, the study recommended that the Federal Reserve Board be directed by Congress or the Executive Branch to expand the money supply at an annual rate of 8 to 10 percent during 1975 and 1976, with allocated credit and variable interest rates in accord with priority needs.

By comparison, the money supply expanded at an annual rate of only 4.2 percent from 1973 to 1974, the study noted.

It said the economic restoration program proposed by the conference "in itself" would work to reduce inflation. "Actual experience during the past 20 years demonstrates . . . that improved economic health reduces inflation, and vice versa."

If the conference's programs and policies were adopted, the study declared, joblessness would drop from January's 8.2 percent level to 3 percent in December 1976; gross national product would rise by $302 billion, or 21.1 percent, from fourth quarter 1974 to fourth quarter 1976, and inflation would subside from the last year's 12.2 percent pace to 3 percent in December 1976.

Tariff Cuts Held Road To 'Disaster'

any further tariff cuts can help the economy.

"Where can be absorb even more manufactured goods?" he asked. The job losses since the last round of tariff cuts in 1967 have made the recession worse and the United States has become a net importer of manufactured goods and an exporter of raw materials, jobs and technology, he pointed out.

Biemiller warned that further tariff cuts would give manufacturers an even stronger incentive to expand production abroad. "More industry would flee from America to build other economies at the expense of U.S. jobs and production," he said.

Loopholes in the tariff laws have resulted in U.S. firms using low-wage workers in Mexico and other nearby countries such as Haiti to assemble products for U.S. markets. Biemiller noted that in 1967, 33 plants just over the border in Mexico employed 4,000 workers. By last year, he said, 527 such plants employed 83,000 workers.

All those, he stressed, are jobs lost to the United States. Besides jobs, Biemiller said, America has lost tax revenue from both companies and payrolls. And the phrase "low-cost imports" conceals the higher cost to the nation in unemployment insurance and other by-products of increased joblessness.

Biemiller cited the "action program" adopted this year by the AFL-CIO General Board which called on the President to:

- Use his Trade Act powers to establish quotas on imports of industrial goods in areas where U.S. production has declined.
- Impose import restrictions against countries that discriminate against U.S. commerce.
- Put export quotas on raw materials and other products in short supply in the United States.

The program also called on Congress to close tax loopholes that encourage the shift of manufacturing abroad and to regulate the export of American capital and technology.

Sidell Heads Campaign on Parkison's Disease

President William Sidell of the Carpenters is chairman of the 1975 national campaign of the American Parkinson Disease Association.

The association, which hopes to raise $1 million in the fund-raising drive, subsidizes care and treatment centers and conducts an information program about Parkinson's disease.

Two-Thirds Covered:

Unions Show Gains In Federal Service

Both the number and percentage of federal employes represented by unions holding exclusive bargaining rights continued to rise during 1974, the U.S. Civil Service Commission reported.

As of last November 1,142,419 federal workers were represented by unions, an increase of 56,000 from the previous year.

That figure represents a record 57 percent of the total federal workforce—and an estimated two-thirds of all eligible federal employes. About 10 percent of government employes are supervisors not eligible for union representation.

The totals do not include the autonomous U.S. Postal Service, where 607,000 workers are represented by unions—87 percent of the total. If the highly organized postal workers were included as part of the federal workforce, 64 percent of federal workers would be represented by unions.

Just 10 years earlier—in 1964—only 230,000 federal workers or 12 percent of the non-postal workforce were represented by unions.

Although a substantially higher percentage of hourly-paid blue-collar federal workers are represented by unions — 82 percent compared with 48 percent among salaried white-collar employes—the salaried group has a growing lead in absolute numbers.

In 1970, for the first time the number of white-collar employes in exclusive bargaining units moved ahead of the number of blue-collar workers. As of last November, the lead had grown to a commanding 736,000 salaried employes to 406,000 blue-collar workers.

The stronger union traditions in the blue-collar occupations probably result in a higher percentage of union members in bargaining units than in the white-collar fields. There is no union shop in the federal service and the number of workers in units that have voted for union representation is substantially larger than the dues-paying membership. Unions that hold bargaining rights are required by law to represent non-members as well as members.

During 1974, there was a significant gain in the number and percentage of federal employes in bargaining units in which a union contract has been negotiated. The 985,000 non-postal workers covered by written agreements as of November 1974 was up 18 percent or 147,000 workers from the previous year.

Among unions and councils with exclusive bargaining rights, the American Federation of Government Employees, an AFL-CIO affiliate, continued to represent more federal employes than all other unions combined.

The 1974 total of 650,000 in AFGE bargaining units was up more than 25,000 from the previous year and included 441,600 salaried workers and 208,400 hourly-paid workers.

Among unions representing more than 25,000 workers with a predominantly blue-collar membership, Metal Trades Councils affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. posted an 11 percent gain, to 58,370. Separate Machinists' units, usually in smaller installations, bargained for 30,170 workers, up 2 percent from 1973. According to the report, the only major union that had a decline in employes represented was the unaffiliated National Association of Government Employes, which represents 74,000 workers.

AFL-CIO Backs Curbs On Illegal Alien Hiring

The AFL-CIO endorsed legislation to crack down on employers who hire aliens illegally in the United States—usually at substandard wages and working conditions.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told a House Judiciary subcommittee that fear of being turned in to immigration authorities makes the illegal alien "an easy prey for the unscrupulous employer looking for cheap labor."

The alien's employment both adds to joblessness among United States citizens and pulls down wages for all workers in the community, Biemiller noted.

Under present law, employers are specifically exempt from criminal penalties against persons who harbor illegal aliens. A bill introduced by Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) would eliminate this exemption and make employers criminally liable for knowingly hiring an illegal alien.

Biemiller said the legislation would be improved by modifying the requirement that the employment be "knowingly" and eliminating the stipulation that an employer is absolved of responsibility if he gets from an employe a signed statement that the worker is legally in the United States.

The influx of illegal aliens has spread beyond farm labor to almost all industries and services, Biemiller noted. Immigrants from other nations who have legally been admitted to the United States are especially harmed by the hiring of illegals, he stressed.

The United States should continue to be a land of opportunity and a haven of liberty for those from other countries, Biemiller said. But he warned that the policy of welcoming immigrants "is threatened by the increasing number of persons who enter this country illegally, take jobs needed by our own unemployed, and undermine domestic labor standards by working at low wages paid by exploiting employers."

Welfare-Pension Panel Includes 3 Unionists

A 15-member Advisory Council on Employee Welfare & Pension Benefit Plans has been appointed by the Labor Dept. in accordance with a law requiring representation of various groups.

The three union appointees are AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, named for the maximum three-year term; Building & Construction Trades President Robert A. Georgine, appointed for two years, and Teamsters Sec.-Treas. Murray W. Miller, named to a one-year term.

One of the three public members is Nelson Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Over Money Supply:

Secretive Federal Reserve Wields Unchecked Power

Most Americans may not be aware of it, but the secretive operations and policies of the Federal Reserve Board have a direct impact on their daily lives and their livelihoods.

Markley Roberts, an economist in the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research, notes in an article in the February issue of the American Federationist that the extraordinary power of the "Fed" (as it is familiarly called by those who watch it closely) derives from its power to control the nation's supply of money and credit and its power to control interest rates.

Tight money and record-high interest rates paved the way for the current collapse in the housing and auto industries which has led the nation's economy into a severe recession.

Much of the board's activities is cloaked in mystery, and the average American knows little about how it operates, Roberts observes in the AFL-CIO magazine.

This is the way the banker-oriented central banking system wants it, but not the way it is supposed to be, Roberts notes. He debunks the "myth" that the Fed is "independent," and not subject to "outside" interference.

"It is a creature of Congress, and Congress can make changes and reforms in the Fed if it chooses to do so," he notes. Unfortunately, the myth is perpetuated by remarks such as President Ford's statement in his October 1974 WIN speech.

"I have personally been assured by the chairman of the independent Federal Reserve Board that the supply of money and credit will expand sufficiently to meet the needs of our economy," Ford told Congress.

The Federal Reserve System was established by Congress in 1913 to serve as a "shock absorber" following a wave of bank failures in the panic of 1907, Roberts notes. Since then it has added another role, that of the nation's "money policy manager."

There are 12 Federal Reserve district banks throughout the country. In each district, the private commercial banks that are members of the central bank system become owners of the district bank by paying in capital to the Reserve bank in proportion to their assets.

Thus, private banks actually own the Reserve bank that is supposed to supervise and regulate them. The private banks elect six of the nine Reserve bank directors. The Fed in Washington names the other three. The nine directors choose a president, but he must be approved by the Federal Reserve Board in Washington.

"Of course, this veto power over the most powerful official in each district bank gives added power to the central bank's board of governors," Roberts notes. Thus the power flows back to Washington where conscious central control over the money supply, credit availability and interest rates is exercised over the entire U.S. economy.

"It is intolerable in a democracy that a major agency of public policy like the Federal Reserve System should be 'owned' privately by the member banks," Roberts comments. "And the banker-oriented "independence' of the Fed is intolerable in a democracy.

"The nation's management of its money policies is much too important to be left in the hands of people who are insulated from the major currents of American life by the so-called 'independence' of the Federal Reserve," the author declares.

He suggests that the Fed's failure to consult consumer or worker groups and the implicit assumptions of its operations that money policy is too complicated for ordinary people to understand "all indicate a distrust of the democratic process."

The Fed's "independence" is strengthened by the long-term appointments of its powerful, seven-member board of governors and by its self-financing. The board members are appointed to 14-year terms. And because it makes about $5 billion a year in "profits," the Fed does not depend on Congress for appropriations.

The Federal Reserve Board has three major tools of money management—its open-market operations, changes in the discount rate at which the agency lends money to private banks, and changes in bank reserve requirements.

The higher the reserve requirements, the less available credit there is and, consequently, interest rates go higher.

"There's no simple, exact, predictable cause-and-effect when the Fed manipulates reserve requirements," Roberts notes. Last November, the board briefly lowered reserve requirements but quickly raised them after discovering that it had "significantly underestimated" the loan-expanding, money-expanding effect of lowered reserve requirements.

"This experience reinforced the Fed's reliance on open-market operations for 'fine-tuning' money, credit and interest rates," Roberts observes.

By raising or lowering the discount rate — the interest rate charged by Reserve banks on short-term loans to member banks—the Fed controls interest rates and the money supply. Its most powerful and important money policy tool, however, is the Federal Open Market Committee which buys and sells government bonds and other federal securities. By so doing, the Fed can change the direction of the market.

"The Fed's buying and selling of government bonds in the open market changes the level of bank reserves," Roberts notes. "These reserves determine how much bank lending there will be. And the volume of bank lending is a major factor in determining the level of business activity—and the availability of jobs."

Far too often, Roberts points out, the board has used its tremendous power to choke off essential growth in the money supply through a tight general money policy, "giving us credit shortages and raising interest rates to the highest levels in more than 100 years—helping to produce the recessions of 1969-70 and 1974-75."

NO-RAIDING AGREEMENT is signed by union presidents Charles A. Perlik, Jr., left, of the Newspaper Guild and A. Sandy Bevis of the Typographical Union at the ITU headquarters in Colorado Springs, Colo. The pact was hailed by the Guild and ITU as a step toward eliminating "all possible sources of conflict" between the two unions.

Labor Dept. to Adjust Overtime Exemptions

The Labor Dept. has announced an interim increase in the minimum weekly salaries that firms must pay executives, administrative and professional employes in order to have them excluded from the overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Under the regulations effective Apr. 1, no person earning less than $155 a week can be denied overtime pay as an exempt executive or administrative employe. The present exemption floor is $125.

The $140 minimum salary for "professionals" excluded from overtime protection under the FLSA will be raised to $170 under the new regulations.

A third category of persons who do not have to meet as strict a definition of executive, administrative or professional employment currently must be paid at least $200 a week to be exempt. That minimum—known as the "upset" salary test—will be raised to $250 on Apr. 1.

All three salary figures are below the amounts the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour Division proposed last summer. At subsequent hearings, the AFL-CIO contended the proposed rates were too low: employer groups complained they were too high.

The Labor Dept. had originally proposed a $160 exemption for executive and administrative employes, a $185 professional exclusion and a $300 a week "upset" test.

Instead, it adopted an increase lower than the rise in the consumer price index since the last adjustment. The reason for the reduction, the department said, was "to eliminate any inflationary impact."

The interim rates effective Apr. 1 will be further modified on the basis of a salary study and analysis now being conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The department said the interim rate procedure is being adopted in recognition that the 1970 salary tests "have become obsolete," but it said the use of interim rates shouldn't be taken as a precedent.

As under the present regulations, lower salary tests are used in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa. These rates will be increased on Apr. 1 by the same dollar amount as mainland minimums —to $130 for executive and administrative employes, to $150 for professionals and to $200 for the upset salary test.

Food Chains, Unions Adopt Bargaining Guide

Miami Beach, Fla.—Unions and employers in the retail food industry agreed here on a set of collective bargaining guidelines aimed at reducing strikes and improving contract negotiations.

The guidelines seek to avoid "eleventh-hour bargaining" through an early exchange of contract proposals and a strong commitment to mediation as "a cornerstone of rational collective bargaining."

Three unions and leading food store chains are members of the Joint Labor-Management Committee of the Retail Food Industry, a 19-member group established last year. The Retail Clerks, Meat Cutters and Teamsters—the principal unions to which food store workers belong—make up the labor side of the committee. A neutral, Wayne L. Horvitz, serves as chairman.

The joint committee has held monthly meetings in various regions of the nation, bringing local union and management representatives into the discussions.

Its collective bargaining statement cautioned against "negotiating in the press" and suggested the possibility of agreement by the two parties on either a news blackout or joint releases.

It said the real issues leading to a strike possibility should be fully understood by both parties before any strike or lockout action is taken. A mediator can help clarify the issues for the parties, the panel suggested.

"All possible strike alternatives should be considered before a strike occurs," the report said, and time should be allowed for the union leadership to prepare data for ratification by the membership and for management to consult with its principals.

In the event of a strike, the joint committee said:

- Negotiations should continue.
- News releases by either side should be factual and kept to a minimum.
- Employers should be permitted to remove perishables to prevent spoilage.

"Eventually a strike will be settled," the panel stressed. "Personal exchanges, unfair and unfavorable propaganda exchanges will leave residual scars when normal relations resume."

Union Scores Smoking Bans As Diversion

"No smoking" ordinances adopted in a number of cities to ban smoking in public places divert attention from basic reform and "delay cleaning up the work environment," Homer Cole, secretary-treasurer of the Tobacco Workers charged.

The new ordinances are "unneeded and unenforceable," he said in a statement, and help create "another class of lawbreakers."

But the real problem is that the controversy over smoking in public places is diverting attention from industrial pollution to which millions of workers—smokers and non-smokers — are exposed, Cole declared.

"The TWIU firmly maintains," Cole said, "that the question of what is causing disease among the working population can only be resolved through intensive, objective research, not by scapegoating tobacco. 'No smoking' ordinances which set smoker against non-smoker and delay cleaning up the work environment are not the solution."

Cole charged also that the anti-smoking forces have substituted compulsion for persuasion in the new campaign for public ordinances.

Spur to Building:

Bills Backed to Ease Mortgage Charges

A pair of bills to stimulate homebuilding and bring down mortgage costs got a strong AFL-CIO endorsement—along with suggested amendments—in a statement submitted to a House Banking subcommittee.

As introduced by Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), chairman of the parent Banking, Currency & Housing Committee, one of the bills would provide a temporary mortgage interest subsidy for middle-income families to help them buy homes.

For the first three years of the mortgage, the government would pay the difference in costs between a 6 percent interest rate and the actual mortgage interest—currently around 9 percent. The fourth year, the government would pay half the subsidy and thereafter the homebuyer would be responsible for the full amount.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller expressed concern that this would both tend to keep mortgage rates high and create a hardship for some homebuyers when they have to sharply increase their payments when the subsidy ends.

He suggested, instead, that the government use funds available under various programs to enable lending institutions to issue mortgages at 6 percent under limitations that would ensure the funds would go "for middle-income families to buy medium-priced homes."

The government would then purchase the mortgages for later resale at whatever discount the market might require, thus replenishing funds for other mortgages.

Biemiller said this would also tend to put downward pressure on private market mortgage interest rates, thus lessening the gap between regular mortgages and the 6 percent funding.

The AFL-CIO also endorsed an emergency homeowners mortgage relief bill, introduced by Rep. Thomas L. Ashley (D-Ohio), that would prevent an immediate foreclosure of a home whose owner's income had been sharply cut because of unemployment or other adverse economic conditions. The government would pay the mortgage, taxes and insurance premiums for up to two years, subject to a ceiling of $375 a month. The bill would authorize the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to set conditions for repayment.

Biemiller urged that the legislation set a 6 percent interest ceiling on repayment of money advanced to avoid foreclosure of a mortgage.

The AFL-CIO statement also endorsed sections of unrelated legislation that would authorize HUD to set national building code standards designed to conserve fuel and energy in heating, cooling, ventilating and providing hot water for new residential buildings.

Another provision would provide federal financial assistance to low-income and particularly elderly homeowners to winterize their dwellings with insulation and storm windows.

Harry Boyer Receives Jewish Appeal Award

Philadelphia—Harry Boyer, president of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, received the 1975 Humanitarian Award from the Labor Division of the Federation Allied Jewish Appeal-Israel Emergency Fund.

Boyer, who accepted the award at the division's annual fund raising luncheon, was recognized for "his tireless service to organized labor and commitment to the struggle for universal human rights."

Ford, Congress Spar On Economic Policy

ported the legislation to suspend it.

In a move to complete action on a tax cut and refund bill before Easter so that a multi-billion dollar rise in buying power flows into the economy this spring, the Senate Finance Committee agreed to postpone a battle over repeal of the oil depletion allowance.

The House had added a repealer to the tax cut bill brought to the floor by the Ways & Means Committee on a 248-163 vote—despite warnings that it threatened to delay Senate action on the tax cut.

To avoid that delay, senators on the Finance Committee on both sides of the issue agreed to delete that portion of the House-passed bill in return for a promise by Chairman Russell B. Long (L-La.) to hold hearings on the issue and press for a Senate vote by July.

The House bill would pump $21.3 billion into the economy—$8.1 billion in individual icome tax rebates of $100 to $200, a roughly equivalent reduction in 1975 individual income taxes and a cut of $5.1 billion in business taxes.

Ford's tax rebate plan would have given $1,000 rebates to persons with incomes over $41,000 and less than $100 to most moderate-income taxpayers. The House bill would provide the minimum rebate of $100 to both the lowest income and the highest income taxpayers with up to $200 for those in the middle range.

A resolution calling on the Federal Reserve Board to expand the money supply in the first half of 1975 "so as to lower long-term interest rates and thus do its part in promptly and steadily reducing unemployment" sailed through the House by a 367-55 vote.

Even if passed by the Senate, it remains a "sense of Congress" resolution which is neither subject to a presidential veto nor binding on the Federal Reserve Board.

A stronger bill that would have directed the "Fed" to take such action—asserting the power of Congress to instruct an "independent" agency it created—was rejected by a 20-19 vote of the House Banking Committee.

The congressional alternative to the Administration's price-raising energy conservation plan appeared to be shaping up in the House Ways & Means Committee.

Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.) unveiled a plan that would link the pace of measures to curb dependence on imported oil with the nation's gradual recovery from recession. It includes elements of import quotas, allocation of fuel, and a gasoline tax that would apply only for purchases above a specified number of gallons a week.

Senate Nears Showdown on Rules Reform percent of the entire Senate membership enlarged the rules reform bloc from a simple majority to the two-thirds support that enabled Allen's filibuster to be broken, even under the old Rule 22.

For the key vote on a cloture motion, 94 senators were on hand with five absent and one vacancy because of the still unresolved New Hampshire election dispute.

Under the old Rule 22, which applied in this case, 63 votes were needed to limit debate. The actual vote of 73-21 was well above that.

The original rules reform proposal, sponsored by Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and James B. Pearson (R-Kan.), would have enabled 57 senators to end the filibuster.

The proposed compromise, based on a formula suggested by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), would require 60 votes for cloture.

Even if the rules change is adopted, a minority of the Senate would be able to keep a majority from acting—a power that has been used in the past by both liberals and conservatives. But the number of successful filibusters would presumably be less.

Last September for example, a labor-backed bill to set up an independent consumer protection agency was killed by a Senate filibuster. The vote to invoke cloture on Sept. 19, 1974, was 64-34. That was two short of the number needed under the two-thirds requirement of the old rule. But it would have been adequate under the proposed rules change.

IUE Locals Report 20% Jobless Rate

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced that a survey of its locals showed that more than 20 percent of U.S. workers represented by the union are unemployed.

IUE locals reported 56,254 workers on layoff, including 46,352 on indefinite layoff. A total of 304 locals, including the vast bulk of IUE's U.S. membership, responded to the survey, covering conditions in January.

As for future prospects, the survey indicated that 6,000 to 8,000 additional layoffs are likely by April, boosting the unemployment rate to more than 22 percent.

"An unemployment rate of over 20 percent is just sickening," IUE President Paul Jennings commented. "Jobs are an urgent, absolute must."

Key Economic Indicators Plunge, Jobless Aid Rolls Top 6 Million

economists a better measurement because it is adjusted to remove the effects of inflation. The Commerce Dept.'s index is unadjusted.

Seven of the nine indicators for which January data were available when the Commerce Dept. compiled its index showed unfavorable or declining trends. Two—stock prices and change in consumer installment debt—showed improvements.

The unfavorable indicators were the average workweek, initial claims for unemployment insurance, new orders for durable goods, plant and equipment orders, the ratio of price to unit labor costs, industrial materials prices and building permits.

Contributing most to the decline in the index were building permits, which were off 19.5 percent.

Reflecting the slump and the mounting joblessness accompanying it, the number of persons drawing unemployment insurance benefits has now topped the six-million mark, the Labor Dept. reported.

During the week ended Feb. 15, unemployment benefits were paid to 6,085,000 workers under regular state or special federal programs. Under state programs alone, a record 5,037,900 persons drew jobless aid during the week, an increase of 51,000 from the previous week.

The states posting the highest volumes were Pennsylvania, California, Virginia, Arizona and Louisiana. The unemployment rate for workers covered by state jobless insurance remained at 7.6 percent for the second week in a row.

A total of 605,200 new claims for unemployment benefits were filed under all programs for the week ended Feb. 22, the Labor Dept. said. Of this number, 564,300 initial claims were lodged with state employment offices.

Amid company announcements of more worker layoffs and production cutbacks, there were these other gloomy reports on the economy:

- Construction spending fell 2.7 percent in January to an annual rate of $128.1 billion, the lowest level since November 1972, the Commerce Dept. said.
- Both business and personal bankruptcies continued to spread. Dun & Bradstreet reported business failures rose 27 percent to 2,177 in the first two months of 1975, after increasing only 3 percent during all of 1974.
- The volume of help-wanted ads in the country's major newspapers fell 7.6 percent in January to 73 percent of the 1967 average, and was 34.2 percent under the year-earlier level. according to the Conference Board, a business-oriented research organization.
- As the recession deepened, more Americans enrolled in the food stamp program. The Agriculture Dept. reported an additional 700,000 persons participated in the program in January, bringing the total enrollment for the month to 17.9 million.

NEW STAMP COMMEMORATING the collective bargaining system will go on sale Mar. 13 at post offices across the country. The stamp's design features two overlapping circles to symbolize the cooperative partnership between labor and management.

$30 Billion Tax Cut Urged To Turn Economy Around

8.2% Rate Hides New Job Losses

The nation's unemployment rate in February—at 8.2 percent of the work force—remained unchanged from a month earlier, but behind the jobless rate were clear signs of "continuing deterioration" of the economy, AFL-CIO President George Meany observed.

"No one can take any satisfaction from these figures," Meany said of the latest monthly report on joblessness by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In an analysis of the February employment situation, Meany cited a loss of nearly 540,000 jobs over the month, bringing the decline in total employment since last September to a staggering 2.4 million.

"For an economy that needs an additional 2 million jobs a year just to keep pace with the growing work force," Meany said, "this is a disaster."

"America has not made progress in dealing with the problem of unemployment, and has not even reached a brief respite in rising joblessness," Meany declared.

Total employment in February declined for the fifth straight month, dropping to 84,027,000. The loss of jobs in the September-February period was the largest five-month cutback recorded since the end of World War II, BLS noted.

The fact that the unemployment rate remained unchanged last month was due to a statistical subtlety, not to any improvement in the economic picture.

The jobless rate is the percentage

Measure Cleared in 8 Days:

Speedy House Action Adds $6 Billion to Jobs Program

The House voted to pump an additional $6 billion in federal funds into job-creating programs. It approved by a veto-proof 313-113 margin an emergency appropriations bill put together by Democratic leaders and cleared for Senate action just eight days after it was initiated.

During the same week, the House rejected a request by President Ford that Congress cancel $1.2 billion in spending authority for an assortment of federal programs, most of them under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The budget rescission was rejected by a lopsided 371-17 vote after a Republican attempt to rescind a portion of the amount was defeated, 252-132.

Since the House rejected the budget cut, there is no need for the Senate to act on the President's request. Disapproval by either the House or Senate kills the plan.

In a last-minute concession, Ford asked Congress to appropriate $2 billion for public service jobs and a summer youth employment program — the biggest items in the Democratic emergency appropriations bill.

But that did not deter the House from voting the full $5.9 billion in the bill put together by its Appropriations Committee. Most of the money represents the difference between the spending ceilings that had been set by Congress for various programs and the money that had actually been appropriated.

Major provisions include $375 million for the job opportunities program of the Economic Development Administration, $465 million for construction and repair of public buildings; $443 million to purchase vehicles for the Postal Service and other agencies; $385 million in small business loans; $120 million for college work-study programs, and substantial funds for reclamation and flood prevention projects. There are also funds for work incentive job training and child care services.

Meany Asks Quick Vote By Senate

By David L. Perlman

A tax cut of at least $30 billion is needed to turn the economy around and start America on the road to full employment, AFL-CIO President George Meany testified.

Meany praised the $21.3 billion tax cut voted by the House last month as "a significant step" towards economic recovery. But he told the Senate Finance Committee that the nation is so close to economic collapse that a bigger stimulus is needed.

"Measures which seemed adequate a month ago or even a week ago are no longer sufficient," Meany testified.

The AFL-CIO proposals he presented to the committee would add more than $9 billion to the combination of refunds and tax reductions provided in the House-passed bill.

Like the House bill, Meany said, the Senate amendments should be targeted to give more purchasing power to low-income and middle-income Americans. And he expressed the AFL-CIO's sharp disagreement with the Ford Administration position that the biggest share of tax relief should go to those who already have the biggest incomes.

Meany scoffed at the claim by Treasury Secretary William E. Simon that tax relief for upper-income persons would be better for

Federally Funded Health Insurance Pressed for Unemployed Workers

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to provide health insurance coverage for workers who lose their jobs.

Labor's two-part program was presented by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman at hearings held by committees of both the House and Senate.

It called for:

- Continuation of the health insurance coverage that had been provided by a worker's last employer. Under a bill introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and other sponsors, the federal government would pay the cost of the premiums after employer payments ended.
- Automatic eligibility for Medicaid—without a means test—for jobless workers who did not have health insurance coverage in their last employment. The cost would be fully met by federal funds, without a state matching payment.

Seidman urged Congress to act without delay, noting that most of the 5 million persons on the unemployment compensation rolls have lost or are about to lose the coverage that went with their previous jobs.

It's hard enough for jobless workers to stretch their unemployment insurance checks to pay for food and shelter, Seidman said. "They certainly can't shoulder the high cost of the health insurance they lost."

Housing Spur Tied to Lower Interest Rates

By John R. Oravec

Housing starts in the depressed home building industry could rebound 50 to 100 percent by the end of the year if the Administration and Congress implement needed programs quickly, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

He said that a healthy housing industry would stimulate the nation's economic recovery and reduce unemployment.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the National Housing Conference, Meany renewed the AFL-CIO's call for subsidized 6 percent home mortgage rates and protections against foreclosures of unemployed homeowners.

JOB DEVELOPMENT proposals are outlined by New York Gov. Hugh L. Carey to delegates at the State AFL-CIO jobs and legislative conference. Carey also proposed increased jobless benefits for the state's unemployed workers.

N.Y. Labor's Campaign for Jobs Gets Strong Support of Governor

Albany, N.Y.—The New York State AFL-CIO's campaign for job development programs and increased unemployment benefits got a major boost from Gov. Hugh L. Carey.

Addressing the state federation's jobs and legislative conference here, Carey told the 1,000 delegates he was ready to propose legislation to raise jobless assistance payments 70 percent for workers with three dependents and 30 percent for single workers.

The two-day session was part of the AFL-CIO national effort initiated in January by the General Board's "Action Program to Put America Back to Work." Similar conferences have been scheduled by other state and local AFL-CIO bodies.

Citing the statewide unemployment rate of 9.3 percent, Carey said the main concern in America and the state is jobs. He assured delegates that new programs would be developed to meet the state's needs.

State AFL-CIO President Raymond R. Corbett called on delegates to step up the jobs campaign in their home localities by striving to expand support for labor-backed legislation in Congress and the state legislature.

Carey's proposal for increased unemployment compensation would raise the maximum weekly benefits for single workers from $95 to $125 and to $162.50 for workers with three dependents.

He also said the state is formulating a plan with hopes of receiving federal cooperation to permit the use of the unemployment insurance fund to supplement earnings lost by reduced working hours.

Such a plan, Carey said, would keep workers in contact with the labor force, with their unions and keep them qualified for fringe benefits. He said it was particularly essential that employers and workers cooperate to make the program work.

Carey said the court-ordered release of $1 billion in water and sewage treatment funds illegally impounded by the Nixon and Ford Administrations would be quickly translated into jobs.

"In normal times, that would mean 25,000 additional jobs for New York state," he said. "But these are not normal times and I have instructed the staff . . . to accelerate the use of these funds to create as many jobs as they possibly can in drawing up the construction contracts."

In all future programs, Carey said he would follow two basic principles: to cut through federal and state red tape wherever possible and to make every project as labor-intensive as possible.

Carey also called for a massive federal program of public service jobs, patterned after the Public Works Administration of the 1930s "to give meaningful work in building day care centers, community centers for the aged, neighborhood health centers and the kind of housing we can afford."

He also urged Congress to quickly enact the labor-endorsed legislation providing health insurance coverage for workers who have lost their jobs.

House Votes $6 Billion In Emergency Jobs Plan

AFL-CIO President George Meany had hailed the introduction of the emergency funding bill as "welcome news" to the unemployed and those fearing unemployment.

Any delay in its enactment would be "unthinkable," Meany said, and labor is pressing for the Senate to complete action on the bill before the Easter recess.

With its filibuster rules battle out of the way, the Senate was stepping up its legislative pace.

It took up, debated and passed a strip mining bill that would set environmental standards for surface mining and tax future coal production to pay for restoration of land already devastated.

President Ford vetoed a similar bill last year, but the 84-15 vote in the Senate for the new bill was substantially more than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto.

The House is expected to take up its version of strip-mining legislation shortly, with a wide variety of views reflected in statements by members of the Interior Committee.

The shaping of an alternative to the Administration's energy tax proposal continued in the House Ways & Means Committee. No effort was made in either the House or Senate to override Ford's veto of the bill to block any rise in oil tariffs for 90 days. The President's agreement to defer the second step of his planned increase was seen on Capitol Hill as a conciliatory step that made it unlikely the veto could now be overridden.

The House chose to send the veto message for consideration to the Ways & Means Committee, thus making it possible to mount an effort to override the veto if the President should try to revive his inflation-breeding oil tariff plan.

Claude Jodoin Dies at 61, First President of CLC

Ottawa—Claude Jodoin, first president of the Canadian Labor Congress, died at a hospital here at the age of 61, and the trade union movement in the United States joined the workers of Canada in mourning.

Jodoin had been president of the former Trades & Labor Congress of Canada and was elected president of the CLC at the founding convention in 1956.

"He gave his life for the working people of Canada," CLC President Joe Morris said in a tribute. "We remember him on the picket line . . . at trade union conferences, national and international. His working life was cut tragically short with a paralyzing stroke in May 1967, and he remained hospitalized for the rest of his life."

AFL-CIO President George Meany declared that "the cause of free, democratic trade unionism has lost a valiant fighter" in the death of Jodoin. The Canadian leader had often been a fraternal delegate to AFL-CIO conventions, Meany noted, "and all of us have lost a friend."

Jodoin, survived by his wife, Lily, worked in the garment shops of Montreal as a youngster and became an organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers in 1937 and manager of its Montreal Joint Board in 1947 after World War II military service. He was president of the Montreal Trades & Labor Council before his election as president of the national trade union federation in 1954.

Succeeds Seidman:

Irving Brown Joins ILO Governing Body

Geneva—Irving Brown, AFL-CIO European representative, has succeeded AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman as a member of the Governing Body of the International Labor Organization.

The changeover was effected on the eve of the recent session of the United Nations specialized agency. The worker members designated Brown to take the place in their ranks that Seidman had vacated after three years to give his full time to his social security post.

Under the 125-nation ILO's unique tripartite structure trade unionists and employers both have 12 seats on the 48-member Governing Body, while governments hold the other 24.

The key role played by collective bargaining in giving workers their say in management decisions was emphasized by Brown when addressing the executive group for the first time.

He praised as "going to the very heart" of the issue the report prepared on an ILO-sponsored meeting dealing with "worker participation" in industry matters.

While some European unions call for representation on company executive boards, the ILO report noted that collective bargaining by workers through their unions "is itself a form of workers' participation."

Such bargaining on wages, working conditions and other questions "makes what used to be in the past a unilateral decision on the part of management a joint decision," the report said.

Describing collective bargaining as "basic in the relationships between workers and management," Brown urged the ILO to give the report the "widest possible distribution in as many languages as possible."

The Governing Body dropped the Arab-introduced issue of granting the Palestine Liberation Organization observer status in the ILO by referring it without debate to the annual conference, the agency's general assembly, to be held in June.

This action avoided a repetition of the waste of many hours by the executive body at its preceding session on a question that can be decided only by the conference in any event.

Gideon Ben-Israel of Histadrut, the Israeli federation of labor, assured the Governing Body during a discussion on the situation of Arab workers in his country that "wages and social benefits are exactly the same for all."

"The Histadrut is strong enough to insure that every worker in Israel gets fair treatment," he said.

In a preliminary report to the Governing Body, a fact-finding commission of three jurists sent to Chile by the ILO found that the human rights of trade unionists had been "seriously impaired" since the present military government seized power.

As a result, the commission said, "important sections of the trade union movement have been crippled."

ILO officials were rebuked by Joseph Morris, chairman of the workers' group, for failing to take more effective action to secure the release of Beyene Solomon, president of the Ethiopian trade union confederation, who was arrested last September by the new military rulers of his country.

Doll, Toy Union Elects Serpico, Widens Board

New York — The Doll & Toy Workers elected two new executive officers and approved changes in the union's constitution at a special convention here.

John Serpico of Chicago was elected secretary-treasurer to succeed Milton Gordon, who resigned but will continue to serve as administration assistant to President Julius Isaacson.

Delegates also elected Andrew Arcuri executive vice president. He replaces Victor Failla, who resigned because of health reasons.

The constitutional changes, which include the expansion of the executive board to 18 members and the addition of a fifth vice president, were proposed by Isaacson to streamline the union's operations.

To fill an existing vacancy, Henry Harrison of Chicago was elected fourth vice president and Robert Fox was elected fifth vice president, a newly created office. Delegates also elected five new members to an expanded executive board.

NEW U.S. WORKER MEMBER of the International Labor Organization's Governing Body, Irving Brown, confers with his predecessor, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, left, at a recent ILO session. Brown is the federation's European representative. Seidman relinquished the ILO post to give full time to his departmental duties.

Protection Lags:

States Rated Poor On Safety Record

States with federally approved safety plans are not providing workers adequate protection on the job from injury and health hazards, an AFL-CIO analysis of state performance reports filed with the Labor Dept. concluded.

The study zeroes in on "the many areas of unevenness and inadequacy" of performance among the 26 state plans operating under Section 18 of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

That section of the law allows states to enforce their own safety and health programs if they are "at least as effective" as federal standards. The study, conducted by Neill DeClercq, staff assistant with the federation's Dept. of Research, finds that workers covered by the state plans are provided with "second-best protections."

Two major conclusions drawn from the analysis of state plans by DeClercq are:

- There is waste of money and manpower, which would have yielded better results if spent to meet federal responsibilities.
- Millions of workers are deprived of protections as effective as those under federal programs.

"The AFL-CIO summary is not our findings," DeClercq points out, "but rather a compilation of those by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration itself in semi-annual reports evaluating the performance of the state programs."

The study attributes much of the shortcomings of the state programs to the policies of the Nixon and Ford Administrations and finds that most of states even fail to meet the overly lenient guidelines set up by OSHA.

The AFL-CIO has consistently opposed OSHA's expansion of the state plan program, contending that federal funds used for that purpose should be used instead to improve federal programs.

For fiscal year 1976, the Administration has budgeted $48.5 million for state programs and only $48.05 million for federal OSHA programs.

But since the budget was submitted, New Jersey and Illinois have abandoned their state safety programs and requested OSHA to resume federal job safety and health enforcement in their states.

New York has until the end of March to adopt enabling legislation for its safety plan. But it too is expected to opt for federal enforcement.

With Illinois and New Jersey dropping out, and New York's anticipated pull-out, only 23 state plans will be left. Because of the millions of workers in the three states, the AFL-CIO has asked OSHA to reprogram its budget to provide more funds for federal enforcement.

George H. R. Taylor, the federation's job safety specialist, noted that by shifting 393 qualified compliance officers from the three states, the federal inspection staff could be enlarged to 1,500.

DeClercq's analysis was based on 18 of 26 state plans which submitted reports.

In all but three of the 18 states, the safety programs are understaffed. Nine of the states were reported to have too few health compliance officers and three others—Alaska, Hawaii and Nevada—had none.

Expenditures for safety and health programs in nine states were below the amounts originally appropriated, the study showed.

The reasons for the underspending included manpower shortages, slow development of programs in some states, lack of enabling legislation and inability to match federal funds.

The analysis also cites numerous deficiencies in enforcement, inspections and program development. In some states operations manuals were lacking or incomplete. In others, the inspection scheduling process was poor, or few health inspections were conducted. Follow-up inspections were often lacking, and state inspectors passed over violations which were later uncovered by federal inspectors.

In 10 state reports, there was a substantial lack of evidence of workers' representatives witnessing inspections, ignoring the federal safety law.

The average amount of fines assessed by the states, especially for serious violations, was substantially less than proposed by federal inspectors.

In Maryland, for example, penalties for nonserious violations averaged $2.90, compared with $15.57 for federal penalities. For serious violations, the Maryland penalty averaged $229, compared with $615 for federal fines.

In South Carolina, the average of state fines was $1.83 for nonserious violations and $253 for serious violations. But federal compliance officers in the state assessed fines averaging $19 for nonserious violations and $802 for serious violations.

IMMEDIATE TAX CUT of at least $30 billion is needed to point the economy toward full employment, AFL-CIO President George Meany tells the Senate Finance Committee. With him is Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Meany Asks $30 Billion Tax Cut To Give Quick Stimulus to Economy

the economy than putting income in the hands of those who most need the money. Simon's contention, Meany noted, is that the affluent would use their tax savings to buy high-priced appliances while the poor would fritter the money away on food and shelter.

Meany termed this "trickle-down economics with a "vengeance." An administration whose "disastrous economic policies" have cut so deeply into workers' buying power, he suggested, is in no position to contend that "the poor should not get a tax cut so that the rich can buy cars, color televisions and dishwashers."

The AFL-CIO statement called on the Senate to make these improvements in the House-passed tax bill:

- Provide for the sake of equity a tax reduction for a significant middle-income group that would not benefit from the increase in standard deductions in the House bill. The group affected is made up of families with annual incomes of $10,000 to $20,000 who itemize their deductions for reasons such as mortgage interest payments and unusually high medical expenses.

To help this group, Meany endorsed an amendment that has been proposed by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.). It would give taxpayers the option to claim a $200 tax credit instead of the present $750 personal exemption for themselves and each dependent.

A tax credit is deducted from federal income tax owed; the exemption is deducted from the amount of income subject to taxation.

Generally, families with incomes under $20,000 would benefit from taking the proposed $200 per exemption tax credit. The Mondale proposal would add $5.8 billion to the tax relief in the House bill.

- Reduce the tax rate for all taxpayers on the first $2,000 of taxable income. The AFL-CIO proposed that the present 14 percent tax on the first $1,000 of taxable income be dropped to 7 percent and that the 15 percent rate on the second $1,000 be reduced to 13 percent. It would reduce everyone's taxes and provide a maximum $90 savings for most taxpayers. It would add an estimated $3.5 billion to the House bill reductions.
- Raise the 10 percent business investment tax credit provided by the House bill to the 12 percent that had been recommended by the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee, with AFL-CIO participation. But Meany made clear the AFL-CIO's position that "as soon as this emergency situation is over, the investment credit should be repealed."

While that proposal would add $1.1 billion to the business tax relief in the House bill, the AFL-CIO also urged deletion of a House provision for an additional $1.2 billion in exemption from the corporation surtax.

Meany noted that the provision was supposed to provide relief for small business firms but most of the tax savings would go to "huge corporations which are already the prime beneficiaries of existing tax loopholes."

Generally, however, Meany praised the House bill as "equitable" and a sharp contrast to the President's proposal to give $1,000 rebates to the "elite" 2 percent of the population while "a $5,000 wage-earning family of four would receive $12—in two installments."

In questions and comments, members of the Senate Finance Committee indicated considerable agreement with Meany's testimony.

Meany repeatedly pressed the urgency of the legislation and the added damage to the economy and social structure that would result from delay in passing the tax cut.

He spoke of the heavy inner city unemployment, the joblessness facing young people entering the labor market and the economy's deterioration "with each passing day."

On the controversy over the House-passed repeal of the oil depletion allowance, Meany reiterated the AFL-CIO's belief that the allowance is a tax loophole that should be eliminated. But he said it would be "very, very unwise" to try to use this bill as a vehicle for repeal if it would result in a lengthy delay in the tax cut.

While the tax cut will head the economy in the right direction, Meany said, other actions and programs are still needed to create full employment and the AFL-CIO has a long "shopping list."

But the biggest single step, Meany suggested, would be to reduce mortgage interest costs to 6 percent to bring housing payments within reach of millions of families now priced out of the market.

And not even the Republicans on the committee spoke up in defense of Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns, who Meany considers the architect of the disastrous economic "game plans" of the Nixon and Ford Administrations.

Before Burns and his cohorts began putting their economic theories into practice, Meany recalled, the inflation rate was about 4 percent and unemployment closer to 3 percent.

Burns tried to apply the "classical" economics he learned in college 40 years ago, Meany suggested. But while he learned his lessons well then, "he hasn't learned a damned thing since."

Taxes and Jobs

THE AFL-CIO IS HERE TODAY because America is in the worst economic emergency since the Great Depression. The situation is frightening now and it is growing more ominous each day.

The tax cut legislation before this committee was initiated and developed as a means to check the drastic downslide in the economy, to restore economic growth and move the nation closer to full employment.

It is our view that the House bill represents a substantial step in that direction—but only a step. Unfortunately, with each passing day, the economy's deterioration becomes more pronounced and more widespread. Events are rapidly overtaking all of us and measures which seemed adequate a month ago or even a week ago are no longer sufficient.

We therefore urge this committee and the Congress to build upon the House action and to cut taxes by at least $30 billion to stimulate the economy and create jobs.

An injection of purchasing power of at least that amount—targeted primarily to low- and middle-income Americans—is essential to help halt the downward spiral and move the economy from depression and the brink of disaster. Just as important, such a tax cut would provide a vitally needed signal to all Americans that their government is aware of the emergency and has the capacity and the will to take decisive and effective action.

Consumer purchasing power has fallen so sharply that it would now require some $60 billion to bring the average buying power of every man, woman and child in America merely back to the pre-recession level of the July-September quarter of 1973.

This drop in buying power and sales has resulted in huge inventories and an alarming drop in industry's operating rate. The nation's factories were operating at three-fourths of capacity in the fourth quarter of last year, according to the Federal Reserve Board. And sharp and protracted reductions in the real volume of business investment in plants, machinery and equipment are expected. Moreover, every cut in weekly work schedules and every additional week of layoffs, results in further drops in buying power and further declines in sales, production and employment.

THE NATION'S JOB SITUATION is far more serious than the official statistics indicate.

Last Friday the Labor Dept. reported that 7.5 million workers, 8.2 percent of the labor force, were unemployed. In just two months the number of jobless workers increased by almost 900,000. Since August 1974 unemployment has increased by 2.6 million. And since October 1973 unemployment has gone up by 3.4 million.

If you add together the officially unemployed, the hidden unemployed, and the under-employed, you get a total of 12.7 million American workers—13.7 percent of the labor force—who are suffering serious job and earnings problems. That's more than one out of every eight workers.

It is clear to us that the economy has reached a point where unemployment is feeding on unemployment and the economy's downward slide is gaining momentum. This is not just another "recession" for it has no parallel in the five recessions in the post-World War II period. America is far beyond the point where the situation can correct itself. Massive government action is needed.

Revisionists Distort U.S. Role In Debate on Cambodian Aid

By John P. Roche

WITH OMINOUS HEADLINES about the imminent collapse of Cambodia dominating the news, there has also been a great deal of flagellation about the nefarious role played by the United States in dragging the friendly, peaceful little country into the war. It is not uncommon to rewrite yesterday's history to suit today's needs, but the Cambodian instance is just a bit too much.

The fact is that we no more "enlarged" the war to include Cambodia than Gen. Eisenhower "enlarged" the war when he invaded Normandy in June 1944. For almost a third of a century the Indochinese Communists (as they once called themselves) have been fighting a war for Indochina. Not just for both Vietnams, but for Laos and Cambodia as well. Ho Chi Minh's clear objective, followed by his successors, was to establish a Communist successor state to French Indochina.

As early as the Geneva Conference of 1954 the Cambodian delegate was bitterly complaining about North Vietnamese aggression. Hanoi maintained the fiction that the trouble in Cambodia was caused by autonomous rebels, but when the time came to sign the military agreements (the only things signed at Geneva), he signed for the so-called "Red Khmers." As the war in Vietnam began to heat up in the early 1960s (particularly after the North Vietnamese ignored the Laos neutralization accord of 1962), Hanoi, with its characteristic ruthlessness, moved to consolidate its power along the Laotian and Cambodian borders of the Republic of Vietnam. Several Cambodian provinces (virtually unpopulated) were integrated into the Ho Chi Minh Trail, and sanctuaries were set up for the benefit of Communist troops in Vietnam.

The then ruler of Cambodia, Prince Norodom Sihanouk, began an intricate game designed to maintain the independence of the Khmer kingdom, an ethnic enclave of some five million surrounded by traditional enemies: Thais and Vietnamese. It would take a volume, preferably fiction, to convey the extent of Sihanouk's efforts. One consequence was his willingness to put the telescope to his blind eye when American bombers went after the Cambodian sanctuaries—as long as he had no official knowledge, he would not complain.

But while the Prince was working one side of the street, his wife Monique (a Vietnamese) was working the other. The simplest way to get stuff to the North Vietnamese troops in the South was by boat to Sihanoukville and thence overland to the sanctuaries—the so-called "Sihanouk Trail." For years, top American military figures wanted to cut this line by a limited invasion of (already Communist-invaded) Cambodia, claiming that (if memory serves) Hanoi's forces were getting about 6-8 million tons of equipment a year via that route. The State Dept., opposed to any incursion, downgraded this estimate to some 3-4 million tons. To get ahead of the story, when Sihanouk was toppled and a thorough investigation launched, it turned out that Monique, using the Cambodian army to run her transport, had probably set up the biggest arms-running operation in history, delivering some 10-12 million tons a year. Cambodia had become an arms syndicate that issued postage stamps.

In the spring of 1970 an event occurred which took all hands by surprise. In a sudden convulsion, triggered by the conviction that Sihanouk was selling out his people, the Cambodians threw out the Prince and established a republic headed by Gen. Lon Nol. Initially there was enormous popular enthusiasm for this coup, particularly among nationalist students, and Sihanouk wandered off to Peking.

Unfortunately, in terms of American war-weariness, the change was about five years late. Thus, in asking military aid for the Cambodians, Sec. of State William Rogers flatly told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "Administration officials have said repeatedly that the furnishing of aid to the government of Cambodia does not constitute a commitment to see that the government survives."

Quickly passing over the years intervening, three things are now quite clear. First, the Cambodian government is going down the tubes under concerted and heavily supplied Communist assault. Second, we did not enlarge the war—Hanoi did—and our later invasion of the sanctuaries was a perfectly legitimate riposte done at the request of Lon Nol. Third, on the record we have no legal commitment to Pnom Penh: They can sink or swim. The real question, then, is on another level: Do we want the Khmers to be enveloped by Communist totalitarianism? Is Congress capable of looking at the issue on this moral level?

Rights Gains Threatened:

Faltering U.S. Economy Breeds Atmosphere of Social Tension

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany on accepting the National Brotherhood Citation of the National Conference of Christians and Jews at a dinner in Washington, D.C.

HUMAN RIGHTS RESTS ON human dignity, on a common recognition of the worth of the human personality. If we lose that sense of self-worth—of dignity—we become careless of the rights of others and we fail to claim our own rights as well. Before we know it, we have passively acquiesced in our own enslavement.

It is not surprising, therefore, that totalitarian governments must rob their citizens of dignity.

The business of dictatorship is to dictate—to control all the way—including the thought processes of its victims. In carrying on its business, it destroys the dignity of all those under its control.

But dictatorship is not the only enemy of human dignity. Poverty, hunger, disease, unemployment—these are also things that demean the human personality.

That is why a man who is out of work—a man who can not properly feed or clothe or shelter his family—does not feel like a whole man, and the same goes for women who bear like responsibilities.

And, I believe, the labor movement has done more than any other single force in American life to enhance the economic security of the great mass of America's working people. I also believe it has done more than any other segment of our society to build the broad base of dignity that supports the human rights we often take for granted.

In this sense, the labor movement is a human rights movement—no less than the National Conference of Christians & Jews or the NAACP.

And yet, much of what we do in the field of human rights does not carry a human rights label. It is a natural byproduct of our day-to-day role in the world of work.

For example, we do not recruit to the ranks of organized labor on the basis of race, creed, sex or ethnic background. We do not have quotas in the labor movement.

We don't ask a man where he comes from or what his political views are before he joins a union. All we want to know is—does he work here and what kind of work does he do. If he works for a living, we feel he belongs in the union.

And, despite all of the anti-union propaganda that has been beamed into the black community, the latest studies show that black workers are more prone to join a union than are white workers. And, no wonder. The earnings of unionized black workers are, on the average, substantially higher than among their non-union counterparts.

I contend that when you substantially raise a man's earnings, especially if he is a poor man, you don't just put more meat on his table; you help him hold his head a little higher.

But, these days, we must admit our job is getting more difficult each day, and you all know the reason.

It is not because we have stopped trying. It is because the policies of the Administration that has been in power in Washington since January 1969 have thrown this nation into an economic crisis.

I believe that we are sitting on social dynamite. As the recession deepens—and all signs point in that direction—racial and social tensions are bound to rise, posing a threat to the real accomplishments of organizations like the National Conference of Christians & Jews and so many others that have labored so hard to eradicate bigotry and prejudice from the land.

The point I want to make is that all of us who are deeply concerned about human rights and human relations must turn our attention to the economy, because if it continues to go downhill it can become the breeding ground of ugly social impulses and emotions, among them the ancient curse of anti-Semitism.

TODAY WE HAVE an additional danger. Not only does our deteriorating domestic economy provide an all-too-rich soil for scapegoating and demagoguery, but we are faced on the international scene with powerful waves of anti-Semitism emanating from the Middle East.

Make no mistake about it, the Arab fanatics are not just anti-Israel or anti-Zionist. They are anti-Jewish. They are plain, old fashioned anti-Semites in the spirit of Adolph Hitler. But the most outrageous thing is that the venom with which they have poisoned their own societies they now seek to inject into our society.

I think President Ford is to be commended for speaking out so clearly against the Arab blacklist. The idea that any foreign investors would discriminate against Americans who are Jewish or who do business with Israel is a monstrous abomination.

But what is worse is the fact that there are American governmental agencies that cooperate in this despicable practice. Imagine! The Army Corps of Engineers admits that it goes along with the demands of the Arab states that no Jews be sent into their countries.

I think we have to go farther than the President's statement. I think we have to let the whole world know that in the United States of America, that in our country, human rights still take priority over the dollar.

I think we should tell the Arabs that any would-be investors from any country who subscribes to the blacklist are henceforth barred from doing business in the United States. There is some business we don't need.

Bills Pending in Congress:

Registration by Mail Would End Barriers to Election Process

ENACTMENT OF A federal voter registration-by-mail law would end the arbitrary and needless barriers blocking many citizens from taking part in the election process, Richard Murphy of the Service Employees declared on Labor News Conference.

Stressing that low- and moderate-income citizens can't afford to take time off from work to go to the city hall or other registration offices, the SEIU legislative and COPE director charged that harsh registration rules have "de facto disenfranchised" a great number of Americans.

Narrow and strict laws add up to a built-in poll tax, he declared, and have no place in a political system that draws its strength from the widest possible citizen participation.

Murphy said chances are very good that Congress will pass the voter registration bill this year. He pointed out that the measure was adopted by the Senate last year, despite a Republican-led filibuster, and lost by only four votes in the House on a procedural motion.

Murphy turned aside contentions that voter registration by mail would increase the work load and costs of state registrars and open the door to massive fraud. Pointing out that several states already have registration by mail, he said that the experience in those states shows no administrative havoc or increase in fraud since the laws were adopted. He added that the federal measure spells out severe penalties for fraud, and anyone trying to skirt the law would end up in very serious difficulties.

Stiffest opposition to registration by mail has come from Republicans, he said, who fear that making it easier for the poor and blue-collar workers to register will add a large proportion of Democrats to the rolls.

Murphy was questioned by Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD, with its independent monetary powers, has come increasingly under attack for the tight money policies that have led to the current recession-inflation crisis.

Under the chairmanship of Arthur F. Burns, a Nixon appointee, the seven members of the Board of Governors of the "Fed" pretty much determine interest rates and money supply and, as a result, the health of the economy.

Members of the board are appointed by Presidents and must be confirmed by the Senate. Their term of office is 14 years.

With the Fed playing such a critical role in the lives of each citizen, every worker and his family should know more about this agency.

The Federal Reserve System—a cherished achievement of the Woodrow Wilson Administration—was established in 1913, largely a result of the 1907 panic which had produced many bank failures and a painful depression. A lengthy study of the nation's monetary system, dominated by private commercial banks at the time, convinced Wilson and Congress that a more orderly and responsible system was needed.

The Federal Reserve System was the result. It operates under a Board of Governors of seven members. The board presides over 12 Federal Reserve Banks, each located in one of the 12 regions into which the country has been divided. These banks hold the reserve balances of their member commercial banks and the deposit accounts of the U.S. Treasury. They perform a number of services for their member banks including loans and check clearance.

The job of the system is to regulate the nation's money supply and banking system in such a way that production, consumption and employment are maintained at a high level. In addition, the system is expected to maintain the stability of the dollar.

The board has a number of techniques by which this is supposed to be accomplished.

- It can buy or sell government securities in the open market to maintain a proper money supply and stabilize the bond market.
- It can determine the discount rate, that is the rate at which member banks can borrow from the system.
- The board can determine what reserves must be maintained by member banks which, in turn, determines how much they can lend out. A one-point change in the ratio of reserves to loans can make a huge difference in the availability of money.

A POWERFUL OPERATION of the Fed is its Open Market Committee. It is made up of the members of the Board of Governors plus five representatives of the Reserve Banks who are elected annually. The committee buys and sells securities in the open market to supply the banks' reserves to support the credit and money needed for its long-term operations.

The board has not always carried out its mission with distinguished success. It failed to halt the Great Depression of the '30s, for example. And while its supporters can point to national fiscal policies over which it has no control—that is whether the federal government balances its income and expenditures—it obviously is one of the nation's basic economic determinants.

A growing challenge to both the power and the independence of the Fed is taking place in Congress and among some of the nation's most recognized economists. AFL-CIO President George Meany has labeled Burns a "disaster."

The Fed's relentless policy of pushing up interest rates until they reached levels unequaled since the Civil War, opponents charge, blazed the path for the devastating recession-inflation crunch.

There are serious questions about interest rates, about money supply and the influence that the central bank has had over money and credit through the Fed.

Applying Labor Solutions:

Education Role Held Critical in Slump

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told a group of union educators their help is urgently needed in applying labor solutions to the current economic crisis.

Addressing the federation's annual education conference in Washington, D.C., Biemiller told 100 delegates from across the nation that the AFL-CIO's action program to halt the recession must be promoted back home as well as in Washington.

The place to start, he suggested, is with their elected members of Congress.

"Even though they had labor backing, they aren't automatically going to vote for labor's program," Biemiller reminded his audience. "You're going to have to keep after them."

Citing a labor-backed proposal to set federal unemployment insurance standards—"a bill that has been kicking around for years," Biemiller said "here's a real opportunity" for union educators to assist.

"There's no question the unemployment insurance system is falling apart. It needs revamping," he said. "If it's going to be overhauled, you're going to have to keep after your congressman." And this approach can be multiplied by educating rank-and-file members on the need for federal standards.

Biemiller was preceded earlier in the three-day conference by economist Stanley Ruttenberg, former director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, who told the educators "it's going to take bold leadership—and I see that leadership coming out of the labor movement—to avoid a 1929-style crash."

Ruttenberg called for "serious economic planning" to prevent recurrences of the kind of inflationary recession the country now finds itself in.

He said the current "anti-inflation induced recession" resulted from the economic philosophy inherent in the Nixon Administration. This "upside-down economic thinking" is being perpetuated in the Ford Administration, he charged.

"What we need is hard, effective leadership," Ruttenberg declared. "We're not getting it from the White House, and little of it from Congress."

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, urged the union educators to work for changes in the National Labor Relations Act to protect the working poor who are being frustrated by its cumbersome, complicated provisions.

He noted that one of the most frequent unfair labor practice charges is that alleging discriminatory firing. By the time the National Labor Relations Board has heard the charge and resolved the matter one way or another, the victim has lost wages he can never make up, Kistler pointed out.

Kistler also urged the educators to train young unionized workers to organize young non-union workers, noting they tend to identify with their problems more than older organizers.

Other approaches to economic education for trade unionists were explored during several workshops. A main objective of the conference was to overcome "economic illiteracy" among some trade-unionists, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis observed.

Delegates focused on a variety of education programs connected to the economic situation, including ways of handling in-plant problems created by job layoffs. They also heard a report on labor's role in forthcoming bicentennial celebration activities.

During the conference, the educators toured the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in Silver Spring, Md.

IAM Aerospace Strike Begins Second Month

The strike of nearly 20,000 aerospace workers employed at seven McDonnell Douglas Corp. facilities entered its second month with little reported progress in resolving the dispute.

The Machinists' walkout is aimed at achieving a new contract in line with settlements elsewhere in the aerospace industry. It began Feb. 10 when picket lines went up at the firm's giant headquarters outside St. Louis. IAM members struck simultaneously at five McDonnell Douglas plants in California and at the firm's Cape Canaveral, Fla., facility.

All but the company's plant at Long Beach, Calif., shut down as the union reported high morale and a solid front among the striking workers. Talks guided by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service broke down Mar. 6, and no further meetings are scheduled.

Affected by the walkout are more than 12,000 IAM members at St. Louis, another 7,000 in California, and a unit of 200 at Cape Canaveral.

The union's previous contract expired last October and IAM members rejected a substandard offer from the company last month, charging that it was particularly deficient in the areas of wages and pension benefits.

Besides the plant at Long Beach, the firm's other California plants involved in the walkout are at Torrance, Santa Monica, Palmdale and Huntington Beach.

The strike was beginning to have an impact on the company's Long Beach plant where members of the Auto Workers continued to work under a new three-year contract ratified at the end of February. The firm said it will lay off 6,000 workers over a two-week period because of a shortage of parts.

At the company's big St. Louis plant, members of the strike coordinating committee at IAM District 837 headquarters were assisting strikers with transportation, food stamps, communications and other necessities.

Temple Award Cites Philadelphia Leaders

Philadelphia—President Edward F. Toohey of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO was presented the Rerum Novarum Award from Temple University's School of Business Administration.

Toohey was cited for his contributions toward improving social conditions of Philadelphia workers. Dr. Seymour L. Wolfbein, dean of the school, presented the award.

80-Day Transit Strike Settled in New Orleans

New Orleans—The Amalgamated Transit Union worked out a compromise agreement on a two-year contract to end an 80-day strike by bus and street car operators here. Members of ATU Division 1560 ratified the agreement by a vote of 593 to 27 before returning to their jobs Mar. 10.

The settlement provides for increasing basic wages to $4.41 an hour, union dues checkoff and improved hospitalization and life insurance coverage. The wage package, however, is subject to arbitration, along with vacations, holidays and spreadtime pay—the waiting time between morning and evening rush hours.

The agreement, retroactive to July 1, 1974, is the first the ATU negotiated since it regained representation of the New Orleans transit system in September after a lapse of 35 years. In the interim, the 800 operators had been represented by a company union.

New Orleans Public Service, Inc., which operates the transit system, is a subsidiary of a conglomerate company that has vast holdings in gas, electric and transit companies in the South.

Earlier efforts of the ATU to negotiate a settlement had been rebuffed by management, the union said, until the agreement was reached with the assistance of federal mediators and city officials.

The American Arbitration Association will determine the final provisions covering wages and fringe benefits. The contract will expire June 30, 1976.

Machinists Ratify New TWA Pact

Machinists at Trans World Airlines approved a new 26-month contract giving them their first wage increase in over two years. The pact, covering 12,000 workers across the country, was ratified by about a 3 to 1 ratio.

The agreement is retroactive to Sept. 1, 1973, when the workers' previous contract with TWA expired. The accord raises a top-rated mechanic's base pay in steps from $6.60 to $7.77 an hour as of May 1. The increase includes a 10-cent hourly cost-of-living adjustment for 1974.

The base pay of a mechanic is expected to rise another 10 cents to $7.87 an hour on Sept. 1 when another COL adjustment is made. Proportionate wage increases are provided for workers in other classifications.

The COL provision in the contract calls for increases of 1 cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of a point in the consumer price index, up to a maximum of 10 cents a year, with payment made Sept. 1 of each year.

The last time IAM members at TWA got a raise was on Jan. 1, 1973. Negotiations on the newly approved contract strung out over the past 18 months. The new pact expires on Oct. 31.

Besides wage increases, the agreement provides for the following improvements:

- Retirement benefits are raised. Past service theretofore earned retirees $8 a month times the number of years' service. Under the new pact, benefits are raised to $10.50, $12 or $15 per year of service, depending on an employe's income group.
- Dental and major medical benefits are increased by 35 percent. Hospital and life insurance benefits also are improved, the latter by $2,000.
- Premiums for licensed mechanics are doubled. Mechanics licensed by the Federal Aviation Administration to work on airframes and power plants will receive an hourly premium of 10 cents up to a maximum of 20 cents. Premiums under the old agreement were 5 cents up to a maximum of 10 cents an hour.

Other contract gains included an additional paid holiday, four weeks' vacation after 12 years instead of 15, fully paid parking, and increased severance pay.

Consumer Agency Bill Gains with Senate Shift

The Senate Government Operations Committee approved a bill to establish a consumer agency, and last November's elections plus this month's rules reform greatly enhanced its prospects.

Last September, at the tail end of the 93rd Congress, supporters of an independent consumer agency were unable to muster the two-thirds majority then needed to limit debate and break a filibuster.

The closest they came was a 64-34 vote for cloture, two short of the number needed.

Of the group of senators most active in fighting against establishment of a consumer agency, an analysis by Congressional Quarterly magazine showed, only Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.) is still in the Senate. Six of his key supporters on the issue retired or were defeated for re-election.

Allen was the only member of the Government Operations Committee to vote against sending a new bill to the floor, but his filibuster weapon has already been whittled down.

The new Senate rules allow 60 senators—three-fifths of the total membership of the Senate—to invoke cloture and halt a filibuster. Such a rule would have meant passage of the bill last year.

The Senate bill would establish an Agency for Consumer Advocacy, headed by an administrator appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. (The previous title of Consumer Protection Agency was dropped because certified public accountants were concerned at possible confusion over the CPA initials.)

The agency would be authorized to intervene in proceedings before federal agencies, such as regulatory bodies, to speak up for consumer interests. It would also act as a clearinghouse for consumer information and complaints.

The current strategy of opponents appears to be to burden the bill with amendments that would lose the legislation the support of groups allied with the consumer interest.

Thus, in committee, foes of the bill sought to delete a section barring the agency from intervening in labor-management proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board.

That attempt to scuttle the bill was rejected by a single vote, but will probably be proposed again when the legislation reaches the Senate floor.

8.2 Percent Rate Continues:

540,000 More Lose Jobs As Total Workforce Drops

of the total labor force that actively seeks work but is unable to find it. In February, the recession had so discouraged many Americans that they gave up looking for employment, believing jobs were not available to them.

A worker who stops looking for work drops out of the work force as measured by BLS and is no longer considered unemployed.

The result in February was a 580,000 decline in the labor force, which had been rising steadily since last November. Last month the labor force numbered 91,511,000—only 960,000 above the year-earlier level.

If the labor force had not shrunk as it did, the February unemployment rate would have been about 8.8 percent since a loss of 90,000 jobs is roughly the equivalent of an increase of one-tenth of 1 percent in the jobless rate.

As it was, there were 7,484,000 workers out of jobs last month, virtually the same number as the month before. The jobless rate of 8.2 percent in January and February was the highest since the end of World War II.

The two major sectors of the economy hardest hit by unemployment in February again were construction and manufacturing.

Factory jobs declined by 427,000 over the month to a total of 18.3 million, the lowest total since September 1965. The February decline raised the factory jobless rate five-tenths of 1 percent to 11 percent.

The increase in the manufacturing unemployment rate was the ninth consecutive monthly rise in this category. A year earlier, the rate was 5.2 percent.

The jobless rate for construction workers rose from 15 to 15.9 percent over the month, as the industry slipped even further into depression. The year-earlier level was 8.2 percent.

Other indications of economic deterioration:

- Nonfarm payrolls dropped 600,000 from January for the fourth straight monthly decrease. At a seasonally adjusted 76.6 million, the number of payroll jobs in the whole economy outside agriculture was 2.3 million lower than last October.

- The average number of hours worked per week again declined in February. "Consequently," BLS noted, "total man-hours, the most comprehensive measure of labor activity, continued to drop sharply."

The average workweek for all workers on nonfarm jobs fell by one-tenth of an hour to 36.1 hours, seasonally adjusted. Compared with February 1974, the workweek was down seven-tenths of an hour.

Total man-hours fell by 1.8 percent in February, following declines in the previous four months, BLS noted. Since last September, total man hours declined 6 percent.

- The number of workers unemployed 15 weeks or more—the long-term unemployed — rose by 300,000 to a total of 1.8 million. The average length of unemployment among the jobless rose from 10.7 to 11.7 weeks.

- The number of persons who lost their jobs due to layoffs, rather than because they quit voluntarily, increased 200,000 over the month.

Since last August, BLS noted, layoffs have accounted for 80 percent of the overall increase in joblessness, and job losers now comprise 55 percent of the total unemployed. This compares with 41 percent in August and about 33-35 percent in good times.

- The number of persons working part time because they were unable to find full-time jobs remained high, at 3.7 million. Thus, there were more than 11 million persons without full-time employment.

Summarizing his analysis of the February jobs situation, Meany pointed out that the high level of unemployment is equal to the total work force in the 16 states of Alaska, Wyoming, Vermont, Nevada, Delaware, North and South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, New Hampshire, Hawaii, Rhode Island, Maine, New Mexico, Utah and Nebraska.

"If the President and the Congress looked at unemployment figures this way, maybe there would be more progress on the necessary programs to get America back to work," Meany said.

White House Press Secretary Ron Nessen, conceding the February jobs report indicated "continuing significant weakness in labor markets," predicted "some additional increase in unemployment rates . . . in the immediate future."

Since last August, when unemployment began its rapid upswing, the jobless rate has risen 2.8 percentage points, the sharpest surge for any comparable period since the Great Depression of the 1930s. The number of unemployed persons since last August has increased by 2.6 million.

While unemployment rates for most of the major work force groups varied little from January to February, the rate for household heads continued to climb steadily—up by two-tenths of 1 percent, and 2.4 percent above the year-earlier level.

The jobless rate for adult men went from 6 to 6.2 percent while that for women remained unchanged at 8.1 percent. The rate among teenagers dropped from 20.8 to 19.9 percent.

At 7.4 and 13.5 percent, respectively, the rates for white and nonwhite workers were essentially unchanged over the month.

Harry Flannery Dies, Radio 'Voice' of Labor

Los Angeles—Harry W. Flannery, retired radio coordinator for the AFL-CO and an editor of the AFL News-Reporter before the merger of the federation died Mar. 10 after a long illness. He was 74.

Flannery, a pioneer in radio journalism, retired in 1967 following 12 years of service with the federation and four years with the AFL.

While with the AFL-CIO, Flannery produced three radio shows a week—Washington Reports to the People, As We See It and Labor News Conference — with an audience running in the millions.

AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in a message to Flannery's wife, Mary, that they were saddened on the news of his death.

"For many years, he was the radio 'voice' of the labor movement, bringing our message of social action and humanitarianism to millions," Meany and Kirkland noted.

He was a charter member and a president of a St. Louis local of the Television & Radio Artists and in addition held cards in the Newspaper Guild, Screen Actors Guild and the Radio Writers Guild.

Flannery began his long journalism career at age 16 at the Hagerstown (Md.) Mail as a reporter and later as sports editor. He worked at several other newspapers throughout the country before entering radio journalism in the early 1930s.

Prior to World War II, he was a correspondent for the Columbia Broadcasting System in Berlin, and during the war served as a CBS correspondent in the China-Burma-India theater.

Throughout his career, Flannery was closely associated with the union and social action movements. He was a former president of the Catholic Association for International Peace and a founder of the Catholic Labor Institute, Leo XIII School of Social Action.

Flannery was the author of four books, including "Assignment in Berlin," and was a frequent contributor to national magazines. He earned his journalism degree in 1923 at the University of Notre Dame, where he was founder and the first editor of the Notre Dame Daily as well as editor of other university publications.

Besides his wife, survivors include one daughter. Services were held in Los Angeles Mar. 14.

Sabatine Gets Number 2 Post In Oil Workers

Denver — B. J. Schafer has retired as secretary-treasurer of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the union's executive board named Vice President Anthony C. Sabatine to succeed him.

Schafer has been OCAW secretary-treasurer since 1965 and was a vice president for 14 years before then. He worked at refineries in Illinois and Indiana and joined the Oil Workers International Union in 1933.

Sabatine was first elected vice president at the same OCAW convention that elected Schafer secretary-treasurer. He had helped form the Gas, Coke & Chemical Workers — a breakoff from the former District 50 of the Mine Workers — that merged with the Oil Workers 20 years ago to form OCAW.

To fill the new vacancy as one of the union's two vice presidents, the OCAW board elected Robert Goss, chief administrative assistant to OCAW President A. F. Grospiron.

Terms of all officers expire this year.

B. A. Gritta Dies, Headed AFL-CIO Metal Trades

Coral Springs, Fla.—Bowen A. Gritta, president-emeritus of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., died at St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital in Houston following surgery Mar. 6. He was 68.

Gritta served as an executive officer of the department for 19 years, both as secretary-treasurer and president, before retiring in 1969. He began his trade union career in 1926 as a member of the Sheet Metal Workers.

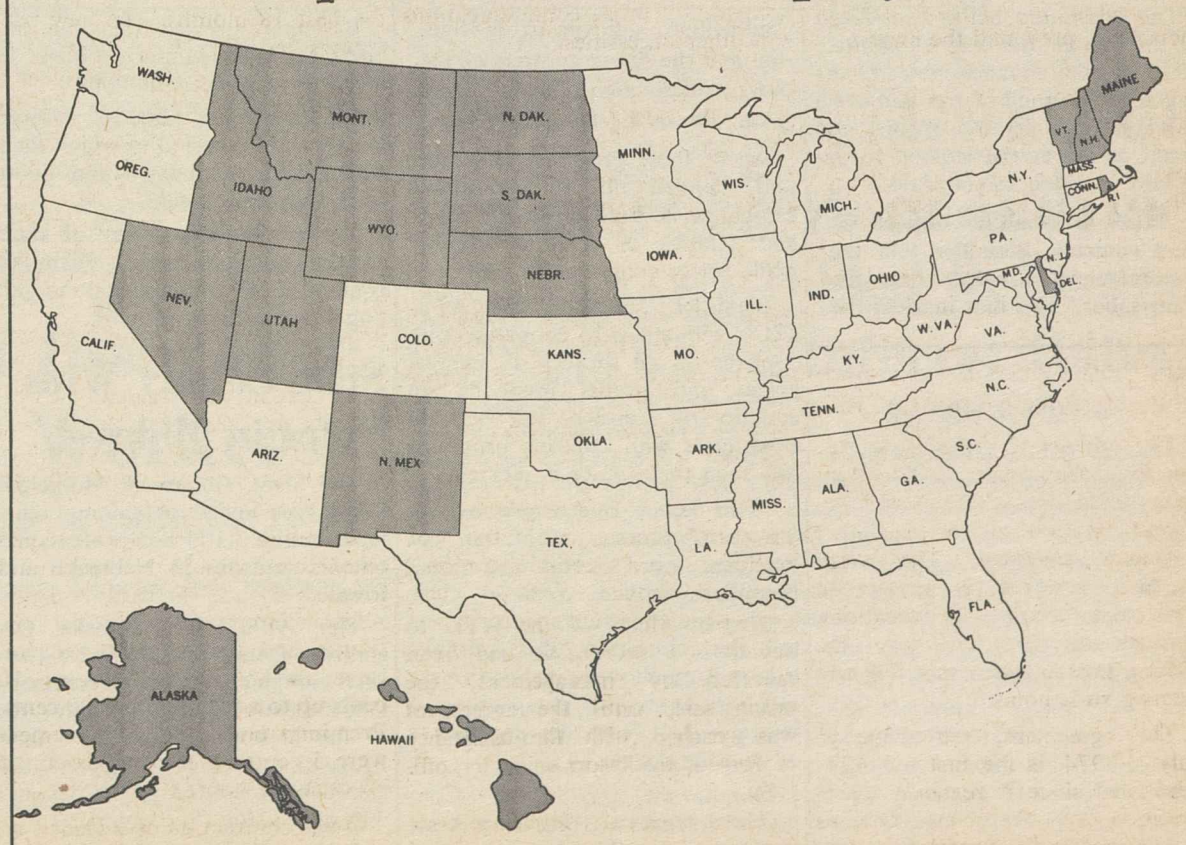
In a message to Gritta's wife, Mary Alice, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that "his hard work and leadership over nearly half a century earned him respect and affection in and out of the labor movement."

Gritta became business agent of Sheet Metal Workers Local 144 in Galveston, Tex., in 1927 and president of the Galveston Central Labor Union in 1935. He also served as a business agent for the Galveston Metal Trades and Building Trades Councils.

In 1949 he was appointed a general representative of the Metal Trades Dept. and elected its secretary-treasurer a year later. He served in that post for 12 years until his election as president of the department in 1962.

Beside his wife, survivors include two sons, two daughters and seven grandchildren. Services were held Mar. 10 in Margate, Fla., and interment was at Tamarack, Fla.

A Perspective on Unemployment



Joblessness increased last month to a level equal to the total labor force in the 16 states shaded in gray above. The number of Americans without jobs was nearly 7.5 million, and growing.

Full Implementation Urged:

Meany Presses Programs To Spur Housing Rebound

Meany traced the severe drop in housing starts to faulty economic and monetary policies and a deliberate phase-out of federally assisted home construction programs for low- and moderate-income families. He also accused the Administration of merely presenting a facade on federal housing programs while failing to make needed funds available to deal with housing problems.

"We know that when housing production falls sharply, so does the rest of the economy—inevitably and rapidly," he said, noting that a drastic decline in residential construction always has been a major element in producing economic depression.

"Yes, America is in a depression," Meany declared.

"When the unemployment rate is 8.2 percent, representing nearly 7.5 million people without jobs, it is time the Administration stop kidding itself and trying to kid the people. It is time that appropriate policies be adopted to reverse the decline; time for measures more immediate and far-reaching than any the Administration is contemplating."

Meany warned that in coming months there could be an avalanche of home foreclosures reminiscent of the 1930s as supplementary unemployment benefits run out for thousands of workers and insured jobless compensation is exhausted by many others.

"Wholesale foreclosures could cause a domino effect of declining property values that could erode lender confidence and dry up mortgage credit," he observed.

That tragedy can be avoided, he advised, by enacting legislation pending in Congress that would provide for temporary payment of mortgages of jobless homeowners. He also urged that the Home Owners Loan Corp. be reinstated to purchase delinquent mortgages and work out needed financing with the homeowners.

Exploring the ripple and multiplier effects of the depressed housing industry, Meany noted that other sectors of the nation's economy fell victim to the Administration's errors.

"There is an underlying policy which got America into the depression and which would prolong the economic hardships of millions of unemployed Americans for several more years," he said. "That is the policy of trying to fight inflation by using methods which have failed in the past and will fail again."

He charged that the tight money, high interest rate policies of the Federal Reserve Board brought the nation six serious economic declines since World War II. And the vigorous pursuit of this policy by FRB Chairman Arthur Burns in the last half of 1974 resulted in the worst economic collapse since the Great Depression, Meany said.

"Soaring interest rates became a significant factor contributing to inflation. They were passed on—directly and indirectly—to consumers, home buyers, small business, public utilities and government itself."

The nation now needs policies and programs that will provide millions of jobs and restore health to the economy this year, Meany stressed, not four or five years from now.

"Yet, the Administration has not shown any sign of taking the necessary course of action. The President and his economic advisers seem to prefer a protracted depression in housing and the economy.

"The rationale for the Administration policy is that if large federal deficits have to be financed by borrowing after economic recovery is underway, it could spark an increase in the rate of inflation; there would also be a rise in interest rates, and housing and economic recovery would be aborted."

The tight money policy that would follow, Meany suggested, would result in a new cycle of housing declines and economic failure.

He said the White House has largely ignored the national housing goals established by Congress in 1968 through the Nixon-initiated moratorium of federally assisted housing programs. The effect is that the production of low- and moderate-income housing has been cut back by more than 300,000 units between 1971 and 1974.

"From both a housing policy and economic policy viewpoint, the last two years were the worst possible time to cut back on assisted housing production," Meany stressed, pointing out that unassisted housing production also declined drastically over the same span.

Total housing starts between January 1973 and January 1975 dropped from about 2.5 million to below a million. In January of this year building permits were issued at an annual rate of 661,000.

"Both housing and public works construction programs are needed and should be supported," Meany emphasized. "The economic decline is growing like a snowball going downhill, at a much faster rate than anybody anticipated."

He said there are enough unemployed construction workers available to handle both programs and stressed that there is a vital need to immediately raise the level of residential construction for social as well as economic reasons.

An alternative approach, in a bill sponsored by Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen (D-Tex.) and others, would provide Medicare hospitalization insurance for persons receiving unemployment compensation, but not the Medicare Part B provisions for doctor payments.

Seidman said the AFL-CIO prefers the combination of continuing job-related health coverage plus Medicaid for those unprotected as the least controversial approach and therefore the one most likely to be speedily enacted. He noted that hospitals and private health insurors have also endorsed the approach of the Kennedy bill.

If Congress should choose the Medicare approach, Seidman said, it should cover the unemployed by both the basic Medicare benefits and the supplementary physician services.

He noted that a recent Bureau of Labor Statistics study found that 40 percent of workers covered by health insurance as part of their employment would continue to be protected for at least one month after a layoff, but only about 20 percent would be protected for three months or longer.

Without a federally funded program, he stressed, jobless workers would have to exhaust their resources and apply for Medicaid when they become ill—"putting an increasing burden on the states when they are already hard pressed to meet their financial obligations."

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Caspar W. Weinberger opposed both the Kennedy and Bentsen bills and said that next year the Ford Administration will again be proposing its version of comprehensive health insurance. But he conceded under questioning that even if Congress were to enact it in 1976, no benefits would be paid for two years thereafter.

Anyway, Weinberger said, health insurance is just "a small piece of a big problem" and he claimed that economic recovery will be retarded if government spending programs are added to tax cuts.

Seidman, appearing before two House and two Senate panels, stressed the AFL-CIO's continued commitment to national health security legislation and noted that there would be no need for special legislation for the unemployed if health security had been enacted earlier.

But the special jobless benefits legislation must be passed promptly, he said, because "we have an emergency that needs to be dealt with now."

Because of varying committee jurisdictions affecting provisions of proposed legislation, hearings have been held by subcommittees of the House Ways & Means Committee and the House Commerce Committee, and the Senate Finance Committee and Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee.

Labor Opposes Revival of Controls Under Federal Wage-Price Council

American workers had a bitter taste of inequitable economic controls under the Nixon Administration and the AFL-CIO told Congress that labor wants no part of any revival of controls.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller warned that a bill to expand the power of the Council on Wage & Price Stability "opens the door to the same kind of unfair restrictions" on the workers' pay that marred the earlier programs.

The legislation being considered by the Senate Banking Committee would require advance notice to the wage-price council of pay and price increases affecting large groups, and would empower the council to delay any increase for 60 days.

While it wouldn't impose direct controls, Biemiller told the committee, it would continue the "zap-labor" bias that marked the "guidelines, guideposts, jawboning and the direct controls of the late, unlamented Nixon game plan with its freezes and phases."

All of these programs, Biemiller said, "ended up as government campaigns to hold down the wages and salaries of working people" while prices continued to rise.

Biemiller reiterated the AFL-CIO's willingness to cooperate with controls on all sources of income, prices and profits involving an equality of sacrifice. But he said experience with controls programs has been that equity is lacking.

"This belief is strengthened by the pro-business orientation of President Ford's Administration," Biemiller testified. Without challenging the President's sincerity, he told the committee, "this Administration is much more inclined to see inflation from the perspective of business than from the perspective of working people."

Despite the intentions of Congress, he suggested, "any wage-price monitoring by this Administration is going to be more sympathetic to the needs of business than to the needs of workers and consumers."

Biemiller stressed that the nation's key economic problem is "jobs and the need for jobs."

Workers have already suffered the brunt of a period in which their wages were held down and living costs shot up, he said.

The purchasing power of their catch-up wage increases, Biemiller contended, is "fundamental" to getting America back to work.

State-County Wins Votes in Midwest

The State, County & Municipal Employees added bargaining units representing 3,100 non-professional school employes in Nebraska and Iowa.

The AFSCME Nebraska Organizing Committee capped a two-year campaign to win a representation election for 2,600 employes of the Nebraska Dept. of Public Instruction. More than 1,300 members voted for AFSCME and 499 voted for "no union."

In Des Moines, Iowa, the 500-member School Building & Service Employees Association voted 230 to 29 to affiliate with AFSCME.

Senate Confirms Dunlop As Secretary of Labor

The nomination of John T. Dunlop as Secretary of Labor was confirmed by the Senate and he will be sworn in Mar. 18 to succeed Peter J. Brennan.

Dunlop becomes the fourth new member of President Ford's cabinet this year. The others are Sec. Carla Anderson Hills of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, who was sworn in this week, Attorney Gen. Edward H. Levi and Sec. William T. Coleman, Jr., of the Dept. of Transportation.

Dunlop, 60, has taught economics at Harvard University since 1938 and served as chairman of the Economics Dept. and Dean of the Faculty of Arts & Sciences.

He also has wide experience as a labor-management mediator and consultant, and as an arbitrator of disputes on the Alaska oil pipeline project. Dunlop also was director of the government's Cost of Living Council and chairman of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee.

Mrs. Hills, 41, was an assistant attorney general when she was nominated to replace James T. Lynn as the head of HUD.

Levi, 63, former president of the University of Chicago, replaced William B. Saxbe as attorney general. Saxbe resigned to become ambassador to India. During earlier government service, Levi headed the Justice Dept.'s Antitrust Division in the 1940s and was chief counsel to the House subcommittee on monopoly power later.

Coleman, 54, was a lawyer in Philadelphia when he was named to succeed Claude S. Brinegar as secretary of transportation. He also was president of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and is the second black to hold a cabinet post.

Rising Joblessness Grips 74 Metropolitan Centers

Tax Slash Nears Vote In Senate

By David L. Perlman

The Senate moved towards passage of a tax cut and refund package that would inject about $30 billion in job-creating purchasing power into the economy this year.

Details of the bill were being shaped and reshaped on the Senate floor as the AFL-CIO News went to press, but its overall thrust appeared in line with the proposals Federation President George Meany had made to the Senate Finance Committee.

The amount of money released into the purchasing stream would almost certainly be greater than the House version, as the AFL-CIO had urged. And the Senate change also retained the labor-endorsed emphasis in the House bill that the bulk of tax savings should go to low- and middle-income Americans.

By contrast, the Ford Administration tax plan would have made persons in the highest income brackets the chief beneficiaries of a tax refund.

Among the unresolved issues in the Senate bill was a final decision on repeal of the oil depletion allowance—a loophole that allows 22 percent of oil company profits to go untaxed.

The House voted for outright repeal. The Senate initially approved a compromise that would deny big multinational companies the depletion allowance but leave it in effect for the smaller "independents."

That amendment was one of several that were wiped out through a technicality when the Senate gave tentative approval to a substitute bill proposed by Majority Leader Mike Mansfield.

Also sidetracked by the parliamentary maneuver were two amendments sponsored by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) that had been taken from the labor-endorsed Burke-Hartke trade bill.

As initially approved by the Senate, oil companies would no longer be able to deduct royalties paid to foreign governments from taxes owed to the United States. The royalties would be treated merely as tax deductions, like other business expenses. The other Hartke amendment would close a loophole that allows firms to avoid paying taxes on profits of overseas operations until the money is brought back into the United States.

Mansfield's substitute bill included one major new feature—a $100 payment to every person

SHEET OF NEW ISSUE STAMPS commemorating collective bargaining is presented to President Ford by U.S. Postmaster Gen. Benjamin F. Bailar. Joining in the ceremonies are Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger and President Floyd E. Smith, front right, of the Machinists and Theodore W. Kheel, rear, director of the Institute on Collective Bargaining & Group Relations.

Continuing Trend:

Real Wages Down, Living Costs Climb

The purchasing power of the average American worker's paycheck shrunk again last month while living costs jumped another six-tenths of 1 percent, or at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 7.2 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Real spendable weekly earnings for a worker with three dependents in February averaged only $87.87, the lowest for any February since 1964 when BLS began keeping such records on a monthly basis. Real spendable earnings are take-home pay expressed in 1967 dollars. The average worker's gross weekly earnings in February—before tax deductions and without adjustment for inflation — were $159.56.

Since October 1972, when they stood at $97.96, real spendable weekly earnings have plummeted $10.09. This represents a 10.3 percent decline in the average worker's standard of living over a 28-month period, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research calculated. In contrast, average gross weekly earnings over that period went up $19.68.

Last month's weekly average of $87.87 for real spendable earnings was 42 cents less than the January figure and $4.62 below the year-earlier level. In terms of percentages, February real spendable earnings fell five-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month and were down 5 percent over the year.

In its report on retail price changes, BLS noted that the six-tenths of 1 percent rise in its consumer price index meant the cost of living still was 11.1 percent higher than a year earlier.

The February increase in the CPI was the same as in January, and raised the index to 157.2 percent of its 1967 level.

Price increases in a wide range of goods and services—especially utilities, medical care, rent, houses, clothing and fresh fruits and vegetables—accounted for the February CPI rise, BLS said.

While consumer prices have moderated somewhat over the past three months, they haven't yet reflected steadily dropping wholesale prices over the same period.

Ford Hails Success of Bargaining

Collective bargaining is essential to building a better America and to resolving the nation's vital concerns, President Ford declared as a new U.S. postage stamp commemorating collective bargaining was issued.

Ford related collective bargaining to the strength of democracy, stressing that "history has shown that only where there is free collective bargaining is there a free society."

"The fact that we have developed a strong, flexible collective bargaining system stands as a tribute to the millions of men and women of both labor and management who have devoted themselves to building a better and better America," he said.

The new 10-cent stamp was issued by the Postal Service Mar. 13.

Aid Rolls Rise Above 6.3 Million

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment continued to spread throughout the nation as the Labor Dept. added seven more metropolitan areas to its list of major job centers with "substantial" unemployment and reported the number of persons receiving jobless insurance benefits had ballooned to more than 6.3 million.

There are now 74 major labor markets on the substantial unemployment list—the highest total since August 1961 when there were 85.

Substantial unemployment is defined by the department as a jobless rate of 6 percent or more, discounting seasonal factors, which is expected to continue for at least two more months. In February, the following were added to the list of high jobless areas:

Syracuse, N.Y.; Tampa-St. Petersburg, Fla.; Columbus and Macon, Ga.; Rockford, Ill.; Portland, Me., and Lorain-Elyria, Ohio. Factory layoffs in most of the areas were responsible for the increased jobless rates.

In Columbus and Macon, textiles and apparel led the employment downturn. The principal job losses in Syracuse were in steel and electrical machinery. Higher unemployment in Rockford resulted chiefly from cutbacks in the auto and fabricated metals industries.

Recent job losses in the apparel, electrical machinery, food products, leather and paper industries were largely responsible for the jobless rise in Portland.

In Lorain-Elyria, the unemployment increase stemmed primarily from losses in manufacturing,

Rubber, Oil Unions Okay Merger Plans

Executive boards of the Rubber Workers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have approved a preliminary merger agreement, and committees of the two unions hope to draft a constitution and merger plan that can be acted on at conventions this year.

The current series of meetings is being held at Akron, Ohio, headquarters of the 200,000-member United Rubber Workers. The OCAW, based in Denver, has about 180,000 members.

Under the "first step" agreement approved by the boards of the two unions as the basis for continuing discussions, the merged union would have four general officers—a president, a secretary-treasurer and two vice presidents. Under the terms of the agreement, the Rubber Workers will designate the president and one vice president while the OCAW will name the secretary-treasurer and a vice president.

OCAW President A. F. Grospiron and Vice President E. D. Swisher have announced plans to retire if the merger is consummated. On the URW side, Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold also announced his intention to retire if final agreement is reached on the merger. All three took part in the negotiations and recommended approval of the first-step agreement.

Direct Federal Loans Urged for Mortgages

Labor pressed for direct government financing of home and apartment purchases by middle-income families as the best means of bringing down excessive mortgage interest rates.

AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Driector Henry B. Schechter said a bill sponsored by Senate Banking Committee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) would accomplish the goals sought by a pending House bill, without the undesirable side-effects.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the House was preparing to vote on a bill that would provide a partial interest subsidy for persons who buy homes or apartments, subject to ceilings on both the purchase price and the family income of the buyer.

For purchases that qualify, the government would pay the amount of the mortgage interest above 6 percent for the first three years, with an additional three-year phase-out in which the interest rate paid by the buyer gradually rises.

Schechter told a Senate sub-

Postal Stamp Sought to Mark Women's Year

The AFL-CIO has urged the U.S. Postal Service to issue a stamp in 1975 commemorating International Women's Year.

"Issuance of such a stamp would be entirely appropriate and desirable," AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a letter to Postmaster General Benjamin Bailar.

Noting that other nations have issued such commemorative stamps, Meany said he hoped the U.S. would join in the observance.

"Women of the United States and of the other democratic nations of the world were in the forefront of the effort to establish International Women's year, and are in the forefront of the effort to make full equality for women a fact of life," Meany observed.

IWY is dedicated to achieving full participation by women in every aspect of national life. Meany cited a statement adopted by the federation's Executive Council last month renewing the AFL-CIO's commitment to "true equality for all Americans, without regard to race, religion, color or sex."

The council also pledged to continue its campaign for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Thirty-four states already have ratified the ERA; only four more must do so for it to become law.

Meany also urged Bailar and the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee, which is currently considering issuance of the commemorative stamp, against "a lesser form of recognition" of IWY. He noted the committee was considering an IWY postcard or some other device to draw attention to the observance.

"It would seem to me better to do nothing than to confirm all of the worst fears of U.S. women's groups by relegating our observance of International Women's Year to second-class status," Meany said.

Social Democrats Honor Abel with Debs Award

New York—Steelworkers President I. W. Abel, cited for his "devotion to social reform," was presented the annual Eugene V. Debs Award by the Social Democrats USA at a dinner here.

The award is given each year to a figure from labor, civil rights or public affairs who has demonstrated a commitment to the cause of working people in the Debs tradition.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in presenting the award, praised Abel's "pioneering leadership, solid achievement, and unbending commitment to democracy in his union in America and throughout the world."

Kirkland specifically cited the addition of 500,000 new members since Abel was elected president of the Steelworkers in 1965, a 100 percent increase in wages during that period, the conclusion of three important mergers and advances in industrywide bargaining. He noted that the USWA's Experimental Negotiating Agreement with the steel industry was responsible for saving 50,000 jobs.

Kirkland said that Abel typifies the "kind of leadership that has made the American labor movement strong and independent, always ready to cooperate in seeking solutions to problems, yet equally ready to demand and command whenever its interests or democratic values are under attack."

And they are under attack now, he observed, both "at home and abroad." Domestically, they are threatened "because two consecutive administrations have managed this country straight down the chute toward depression." On the international scene they are threatened "because throughout the world economic blackmailers, political terrorists, and totalitarian dictators have taken the initiative."

Kirkland said that few in America, aside from labor, had demonstrated a willingness to defend freedom and democracy in the world. In this regard, he said the Social Democrats had "earned the respect of the labor movement" for having upheld "a universal standard of domestic justice and international integrity."

Abel said he was honored to receive an award named for a man who had distinguished himself as a political leader of working people and as a leading force in the early drive for industrial unionism.

"Eugene V. Debs believed that to serve the working class was the highest calling a man could aspire to . . . . He fought an unyielding crusade against corporate greed. He made a profound difference in this century."

The Social Democrats also honored the dancers Galina and Valery Panov with the Norman Thomas Freedom Award. The Panovs emigrated from the Soviet Union to Israel last year after several years of harassment and imprisonment.

While the Panovs were unable to attend the awards ceremonies because of an artistic engagement in England, another Soviet dissident artist, poet and singer Aleksandr Galich, performed several of his works at the banquet. Galich recently left Russia after having been subjected to official harassment because his songs joked about the Soviet regime.

Spur to Buying Power:

$30 Billion Tax Cut Nears Senate Vote

on the social security rolls. That would benefit a large group of elderly poor that has been hurt by inflation but wouldn't be helped by a tax cut.

Earlier, when it appeared that debate over a long list of amendments might throw off the timetable for Senate action before Easter, an attempt was made to limit debate. The majority for cloture was 59-38, only one short of the 60 votes needed under the Senate's new rules. It came so close, however, that a future attempt was likely to succeed if the bill ran into undue delay.

The bill originally sent to the Senate floor by the Finance Committee included the same refund on 1974 federal income taxes provided in the House bill—between $100 and $200 for most taxpayers, or the total tax paid in 1974 if less than $100.

The Senate committee also wrote into the bill a labor-supported provision that would benefit a substantial number of families earning less than $20,000 a year.

Everyone would have a choice between the present $750 deduction for the taxpayer and each dependent or a $200 tax credit. This would substitute for a rise in the minimum standard deduction in the House bill and would enable moderate-income families who itemize deductions to share in the 1975 income tax reduction.

The Senate panel also adopted a modified version of another AFL-CIO proposal that would have the effect of reducing nearly every tax bill by $40 a year.

Even after the Senate acts, a House-Senate conference committee will have to reconcile the two bills and submit the final version for approval by both bodies.

The House, meanwhile, approved a farm subsidy bill after trimming back the level of price supports that had been voted by its Agriculture Committee.

Labor and consumer groups generally supported amendments that would prevent a sharp rise in prices for cotton and milk and supported passage of a modified bill as a safeguard to farmers against losses.

Earlier, the House voted decisive approval to a labor-endrosed strip mining bill similar to the measure President Ford vetoed last year. The Senate has already passed a comparable bill.

The House vote of 333-86, following the Senate vote of 84-13, demonstrated such strong congressional aproval that President Ford may not veto the measure again.

It would require coal companies to return land torn up by open-surface mining to its original contours and condition, and it would tax the industry to pay for reclamation of already despoiled land.

State University Must Negotiate with Union

Jefferson City, Mo.—The Missouri Supreme Court ordered the University of Missouri to bargain with the Laborers, which represent more than 1,500 workers on two campuses.

The ruling upholds the decision of a circuit court judge who last year directed university officials to abide by a state law that gives unions the right to negotiate with public employers.

Representatives of Laborers Local 45 and 1272 have been seeking a first contract with the university for a decade. The state high court's decision stems from a suit the university brought against the LIU Local 45 following a 1972 strike.

In effect, the ruling declared that the university could not have its legal cake and eat it too.

Before the strike, the university refused to bargain with the Laborers, contending that the state public employe relations law did not apply to the university on the ground that the state constitution gave the board of curators control over the university.

Yet, the university also argued that the workers could not strike because they were public employes subject to the restrictions of the law. The university obtained a court injunction ordering the striking Laborers back to work, which the union obeyed.

But even after the union honored the injunction and returned to work, the university ignored a section of the injunction which directed it to negotiate with the union on wages, hour and other conditions.

The lower court ruling, upheld by the supreme court stated that "The university cannot selectively take these provisions, the prohibitions against the right to strike . . . and use them as a basis for seeking an injunction (against striking) and reject other provisions which set up a procedure, hopefully, for the resolving of labor disputes and grievances."

The state supreme court, noting that the university never questioned the union's majority representation of the more than 1,500 employes, added in its affirmation that "the public body or its designated representative must acknowledge such (bargaining) proposals and grievances and must discuss them with the bargaining representative."

Following the ruling, Laborers President Peter Fosco said in Washington that the union would immediately seek to bring the university to the bargaining table and "press for an agreement that will provide union wages and conditions."

The Laborers represent the university's maintenance, food service, custodial, health care and other employes on the Columbia, Mo., campus through Local 45 and on the Kansas City campus through Local 1272.

Bargaining Process Called Vital to Nation

Two overlapping circles depict the cooperation derived from negotiations. Superimposed over the circles are the words: "Collective Bargaining—Out of conflict . . . accord."

In the search for social and economic progress in America, Ford said, the nation's people cannot live on islands of self-interest.

"We must build bridges and communicate our agreements as well as our disagreements. Only then can we honestly solve the nation's problems," he observed, adding that "one of the longest and sturdiest bridges in this land is collective bargaining."

Ford also suggested that the interests of three parties are involved in negotiations—labor, management and the nation's welfare—urging that the two principal parties use responsibility and restraint in their deliberations with a special consideration for the national interest.

William W. Winpisinger, a vice president of the Machinists and president of the Institute on Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, noted in an address at the ceremonies that American workers have made more progress since they were given collective bargaining rights 40 years ago than in any other period of the nation's history.

Yet despite great advances in human dignity, Winpisinger said, much remains to be done for those who are outside the collective bargaining process.

"Lest we become too smug and self-congratulatory, let us note that in 19 states right-to-work-for-less laws continue to keep unions weak and collective bargaining off balance," he said.

Other barriers to progress in collective bargaining Winpisinger cited were the airlines' mutual aid pact to prolong strikes, token negotiating rights for federal employes, and delays in the administration of the National Labor Relations Act.

House Confirms Elections Panel

Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel since the federation was formed, was confirmed by the House as a member of the Federal Elections Commission, which will oversee the new campaign reform law.

The Senate was scheduled to act shortly on the nomination of the six members, selected by the President and by the House and Senate leadership. Harris will leave the AFL-CIO to take the post.

Also confirmed by the House were four former members of Congress appointed to the commission—Republicans Thomas Curtis of Missouri and Vernon Thomson of Wisconsin and Democrats Robert Tiernan of Rhode Island and Neil Staebler of Michigan, and Joan Aikens, a Pennsylvania Republican.

Martin J. Bond Dies, COPE Director for D.C.

Martin J. Bond, COPE director of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council for the past 16 years, died after a heart attack while at work Mar. 18.

Bond, 56, also was a member of the Virginia AFL-CIO executive board since 1959 and the former first vice president of the central labor council. He began his trade union career as a member of the Amalgamated Transit Union in 1941, serving as secretary-treasurer, president and business agent of ATU Local 1131 during the 1940s and early '50s.

Message Spread at Grass Roots:

Labor's Program for Jobs Pressed in State Capitals

Labor's "put America back to work" message is being heard in state capitals as well as in Congress and the White House.

The AFL-CIO "action program," adopted by the federation's General Board in January, has become the framework for follow-up activity by state labor councils. Seventeen states have already held conferences, rallies or other special activities to press for job-creating programs. Nineteen other states have activities scheduled for the weeks ahead.

At the same time, AFL-CIO city and county central bodies have been focusing on measures to deal with the human tragedy of unemployment—often in cooperation with the job opportunity focus of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute or the family-aiding resources of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

A single week's schedule of state jobs rallies and conferences brought pledges of cooperation from governors, legislators and congressional delegations in California, Minnesota and New York.

At St. Paul, Minn., an all-day legislative conference in support of the AFL-CIO's action program drew more than 900 delegates from all sections of the state.

Labor's call for lower interest rates as a stimulus to the depressed housing industry and economic growth generally was echoed by Gov. Wendell R. Anderson, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey and other members of the state's congressional delegation.

An end to the recession-breeding tight-money policy, the governor said, would "put union members to work building houses and roads and sewage facilities and other things that help people."

Humphrey called for labor, consumer and farm representation on the Federal Reserve Board, and Minnesota State AFL-CIO President David Roe told the conference that Federal Reserve Chairman Arthur Burns "must go."

At Sacramento, 2,500 workers rallied at the California state capitol in a drizzling rain.

"We want jobs now," they chanted. The State AFL-CIO's executive officer, John F. Henning, and other union leaders presented labor's program for state as well as federal action to halt the depression that has left a million Californians jobless.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown enlisted labor's support for legislation to provide $450 million for low- and moderate-income housing and endorsed both unemployment insurance and collective bargaining for farm workers—"the most exploited workers in our state."

State AFL-CIO President Albin J. Gruhn, Building & Construction Trades President James S. Lee, and top officers of AFL-CIO affiliates and the unaffiliated Auto Workers and West Coast Longshoremen & Warehousemen addressed the rally.

Sen. John V. Tunney told the gathering that he backed labor's call for a $30 billion tax rebate and cut "to kick this economy in the rear end and get it going again."

At the state level, the AFL-CIO program presented to the California governor and legislature called for a large-scale state housing and public works construction program. It asked for improved unemployment insurance benefits, a higher state minimum wage and a comprehensive state health program.

Across the continent, at Albany, N.Y., Gov. Hugh L. Carey told 1,000 delegates to a two-day AFL-CIO legislative conference that he will propose higher unemployment insurance payments to ease hardship.

As Congress and the courts succeed in forcing the Ford Administration to release funds for water and sewage plants and other public works, Carey pledged that the money will be swiftly translated into jobs.

State AFL-CIO President Raymond Corbett called on the delegates to continue the drive for labor's action program in their home communities, just as labor at the state level is backing the national AFL-CIO program.

AFL-CIO regional directors, helping to coordinate state programs through the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services, have reported major programs during the past month in Georgia, Maryland, Maine, New Jersey, Kentucky, Rhode Island, West Virginia, Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, North Dakota, Nebraska, Oregon and Vermont.

In many communities, previously-scheduled trade union functions were quickly converted to emphasize the follow-up to labor's action program. That was the case in Springfield, Mass., for example, when the AFL-CIO jobs program was the focus of the annual conference of the Springfield-Chicopee-Westfield Labor Council attended by 400 local union leaders representing 40,000 union members.

U.S. Jobless Rate Worst In Industrialized World

The United States has the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized nation in the world, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics study.

BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin reported to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that the average 6.6 percent U.S. jobless rate for the fourth quarter of 1974 compared with rates of 1.6 percent for Japan, 2.9 percent for Germany, 3.2 for the United Kingdom, 3.3 for Italy, 5.4 for France and 5.7 for Canada.

Jobless rates for January 1975 were available for only four countries, in addition to the United States. The U.S. rate of 8.2 percent for that month compared with rates of 6.7 percent in Canada, 6.1 percent in France, 3.4 percent in the United Kingdom, and 2.8 percent in Italy.

The same BLS study reported the U.S. inflation rate during the last three months of 1974 was lower than four of the six other major industrial nations, but higher than the other two.

Prices in the U.S. rose at a 12.1 percent rate, compared to 12 percent in Canada and 6.5 percent in Germany. Fourth-quarter inflation rates for the remaining industrial countries were 15 percent in France, 18.2 percent in the United Kingdom, 23.4 percent in Japan, and 24.7 percent in Italy.

In January 1975, preliminary estimates indicated that prices in Germany were 6.1 percent above the same month a year earlier, compared to 19.9 percent in the United Kingdom, 12.1 percent in Canada, and 11.7 percent in the United States. Data for the other three countries were unavailable.

New Pamphlet Analyzes Record of 93rd Congress

A detailed report on the record of the 93rd Congress on 85 legislative issues important to the labor movement is now available from the AFL-CIO.

The 147-page report, Labor Looks at the 93rd Congress, was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, headed by Andrew J. Biemiller. It includes a special section on the resignation of President Nixon and the impeachment articles voted by the House Judiciary Committee.

A foreword to the legislative report terms the record of the 93rd Congress "better than most" and suggests that the record achieved by the new 94th Congress will answer whether Congress has succeeded in re-establishing itself "as a co-equal branch of government."

Single copies of Labor Looks at Congress, Publication 77P, are available free. Larger quantities are 40 cents each or $35 for 100 copies. Orders should be sent to the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., NW., Washington, D.C. 20006.

2 Rail Accords Reached, Clerks Slate Strike Vote

Two more unions reached agreement with the nation's railroads on new wage and fringe-benefit improvements but others remained deadlocked and one, the Railway & Airline Clerks, ordered a strike vote taken.

The Machinists and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers agreed to three-year contracts similar to those previously signed by five other rail unions. Retroactive to Jan. 1, the agreements provide increases in wages and benefits valued at about 41 percent over the life of the contract.

BRAC President C. L. Dennis called for the strike authorization vote after the union reached an impasse with the industry. Talks between the union and the carriers had been conducted under the auspices of the National Mediation Board since Jan. 10.

"Assuming a favorable vote on the strike ballot," Dennis said, "we will be legally free to strike as of 12:01 a.m., Friday, Apr. 18."

Under the Railway Labor Act, a Presidential Emergency Board could be established to investigate the dispute, a move that would head off a strike for about 60 days.

Dennis described the industry's latest offer as "insufficient" to offset inflation. He also charged the carriers with failure to provide protection against layoffs during the current economic slump.

While the Locomotive Engineers ratified their accord, the Machinists put their agreement to a membership vote, a procedure expected to take about three weeks.

Talks between the industry and the shopcraft unions that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept. broke off, and the unions awaited the start of active mediation under the supervision of the NMB.

The Yardmasters continued their negotiations with the carriers. The Railway Supervisors, which bargains with individual carriers instead of on a national basis, reported agreements with four units of the Norfolk & Western.

Unions which earlier had ratified agreements with the industry include the United Transportation Union, the Waymen, Sheet Metal Workers, Dispatchers, and Signalmen.

Labor Board Caseload Up

The caseload of the National Labor Relations Board during the second quarter of its fiscal year, October through December 1974, increased 12.7 percent over the level of the year-earlier quarter.

A total of 10,911 cases were filed with the board, a record number for an October-December period. The total included 7,604 unfair labor practice charges by employers or unions, an increase of 1,202 above the same quarter the preceding year.

Petitions for employe representation elections, union-shop deauthorization polls and other actions totaled 3,307, up 39 from a year earlier.

During the most recent quarter, the NLRB conducted 2,411 secret-ballot collective-bargaining elections petitioned for by unions, employers and individuals.

JOBS CONFERENCE sponsored by the New York State AFL-CIO brought labor's program before Gov. Hugh L. Carey and members of the legislature at this Albany rally. The state's unemployment rate is a staggering 9.3 percent.

AT BALTIMORE, where the Maryland AFL-CIO sponsored a "Put America Back to Work" rally, public officials joined with union delegates in the discussion. Meetings and rallies are being held from coast to coast.

The Continuing Crisis

BACK IN JULY 1969 President Nixon announced that the nation was facing a crisis in health care. Health care personnel were not only in short supply, they were maldistributed. Health care costs were rising twice as rapidly as the consumer price index. Americans were spending more for health care every year—$63 billion in 1969—but not feeling any healthier for it.

Since that time Congress has passed legislation to improve health planning, train more personnel in the health care field and encourage the formation of prepaid health groups, but the basic problems that prompted Mr. Nixon to declare a crisis in 1969 are still with us in 1975, and more so.

Five thousand communities have no doctor. Health care costs rose at an annual rate of 18 percent after price controls were lifted last Apr. 30. Americans spent $104 billion for health care in the 12 months ending June 30, 1974.

That the private health insurance industry has failed to alleviate the crisis can be seen from the fact that private insurance pays only 40 percent of the total health care bills of those it covers; that it pays less than one-third of all health care costs, and that about 40 million persons have no health insurance of any kind. The obvious solution is and has been for many years a system of national health insurance, such as every other industrialized nation in the world enjoys, and the one that appears best to us is the plan formulated by the Committee for National Health Insurance and the AFL-CIO.

Introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the insurance system would be financed with a payroll tax and federal general revenues. For workers, the payroll tax would be 1 percent for earnings up to $20,000 and for employers it would be 3.5 percent, also up to $20,000. Whatever amount this raised would be matched by an appropriation from general revenues. Unlike its numerous rivals, the plan would cover almost all medical services without a co-insurance or deductible feature. To keep costs from rising unreasonably, as they did after passage of the Medicare legislation, a Health Security Board would issue regulations for all health care providers and approve the amount and allocation of funds.

President Ford has already put the Congress on notice that he opposes any health insurance legislation this year, ostensibly because of the impact it would have on the mounting federal deficits, which are developing because of the recession.

However, the argument has no application in the case of the Kennedy legislation because if it were enacted this year the payroll tax would not go into effect until Jan. 1, 1977, and the program itself would not be implemented until July 1, 1977.

The nation can well afford comprehensive national health insurance. What it cannot afford is to continue denying access to medical care to millions because they cannot pay for it and to allow hundreds of thousands of others to bankrupt themselves when beset by a health disorder that requires prolonged or unusual treatment.

A Word Edgewise:

'Curse of Nixon' Haunts Ford, Erodes His Position as Leader

By John P. Roche

WHILE SOME SARDONIC Washington observers have baptized the present Congress "Nixon's Revenge," I am afraid that the former President's most appalling benefaction to the republic was the effective destruction of executive power. Like the "Curse of Cromwell" that hangs over Ulster, the "Curse of Nixon" haunts the conduct of Administration policy, particularly in the areas of national security, intelligence and the conduct of foreign relations.

I have never been an advocate of what is called by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and others the "Imperial Presidency," but I have never wanted to see the United States with an impotent chief executive. What is necessary is an equilibrium of power between the Hill and the White House founded on mutual respect and tempered by mutual distrust.

Let us take for example the current, semi-hysterical campaign against the intelligence community. One would think from the clamor that Congress never had any say in the activities of the Central Intelligence Agency or the FBI. However, the record clearly indicates that there were instruments for congressional oversight and that these bodies were inert. At the time of the Bay of Pigs debacle I urged a full-scale discreet congressional inquiry into "black" activities, but President Kennedy was off the pole like a shot and appointed an in-house body of investigators headed by Gen. Maxwell Taylor.

With all respect to the late President and to Gen. Taylor, where I come from you don't appoint burglars to investigate its origins. But Congress just sat there, and the report of the Taylor inquiry is still classified.

Now, to atone for past sins, there is a likely chance that eager legislators will engage in overkill and virtually destroy the CIA. A strong President could intervene with a most persuasive case: The abuses of authority must be unearthed and eliminated, but in a world full of wolves an effective intelligence agency is essential.

The "Curse of Nixon," however, has made it impossible for President Ford to do more than emit some sad bleats. If he made a strong stand, particularly with the Nixon pardon file, the President would immediately be accused of launching a whitewash, organizing a cover-up, etc. Congress could have restrained the late J. Edgar Hoover any time it wanted to, notably when the FBI budget came up. But he had the whammy on them: Who knew what the director's secret files contained?

Similarly, because President Nixon took a strong position on national security, that viewpoint must be wrong. In my judgment, Sec. of Defense James Schlesinger is extraordinarily able (so talented indeed that Sec. of State Kissinger—basically an insecure man—feels compelled to knife him about once a month), but who has read his recent defense posture statement? It is a hard, realistic analysis of our strategic position, ominous reading on a subject that should concern Congress and all Americans.

Even allowing for "submarine sightings" (in the old days, just as the Navy budget was before Congress, mysterious, unidentified submarines would be sighted off California), Schlesinger has made a compelling case that we are in bad trouble. But he can not exorcise the "Curse of Nixon."

YET THE WORST IMPACT of the "Curse of Nixon" has been the erosion of the President's position as an opinion leader. For poor Gerald Ford, the presidency has not been Theodore Roosevelt's "bully pulpit."

When you realize that even Franklin D. Roosevelt could not generate a sense of urgency among the American people about the threat of Hitler (in October 1941 the draft bill was extended for a year by a one-vote margin in the House of Representatives), President Ford's efforts to arouse the nation from its post-Vietnam withdrawal syndrome seem doomed.

With Congress following the people, because they are its leaders, and the President's initiatives overpowered by the "Curse of Nixon," the ship of state seems dead in the water. Thus, when George Gallup indicates that eight out of 10 Americans oppose further aid to Indochina, and nine out of 10 oppose any military intervention to save Israel, those of us who refuse to believe the Cold War is over but, rather, think that we are losing, find ourselves paralyzed by the "Curse of Nixon."

'Let Us Not Forget...':

Collective Bargaining Progress Reveals Key Problem Areas

The following remarks were made by Machinists Vice President William W. Winpisinger at a dinner in Washington marking the issuance of a stamp on collective bargaining.

CONSIDERING HOW SLOWLY the mills of bureaucracy grind we should rejoice that it only took 40 years from the time the Wagner Act was passed until the federal government gave collective bargaining a stamp of approval.

Despite recurring cycles of boom and bust, including the present depressed state of the economy, the working people of America have made more progress since the Wagner Act codified the workers' right to bargain collectively than at any equivalent period in the almost 200-year history of the republic.

When I look around this hall I realize how far we've come from Homestead and Pullman, from Marion and Gastonia, from Bayonne and Ludlow and all the other places across the land where workers bought the right to bargain with their blood.

Yes, we've come a long way since a typical 19th Century autocrat named Jay Gould boasted that the best way to keep labor in its place was to "hire one half of the working class to kill the other half."

Human dignity has made great strides since a spokesman of the nation's coal operators disdainfully dismissed a presidential offering of mediation in a coal mine strike by stating that "The rights and interests of the laboring man will be protected and cared for, not by labor agitators, but by the Christian gentlemen to whom God in his infinite wisdom has given control of the property interests of this country."

We've seen a lot of changes since the constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World proclaimed with uncompromising bluntness that "The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. . . . It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism."

The art of employe relations has improved considerably since Tom Girdler of Republic Steel set out to nullify the bargaining rights of his workers with a force of 370 thugs armed with 552 pistols, 245 shotguns, 64 rifles, 143 gas guns, 2,707 gas grenades, 178 billies and 232 night sticks.

Yes, we've advanced a long way from the rhetoric of the class struggle and the wretchedness of the open shop.

However, lest we become too smug and self-congratulatory, let us note that in 19 states, right-to-work-for-less laws continue to keep unions weak and collective bargaining off balance.

Let us remember that in no other sector of federal law enforcement is justice more likely to be delayed than in the administration of the National Labor Relations Act. Let us recognize that time after time the union's thrust toward collective bargaining is thwarted by willful violations that net anti-union employers no more than a slap on the wrist. Let us not forget that even today the collective bargaining rights of 345,000 workers in the air transport industry are systematically being subverted by an employer scheme, known as the Mutual Aid Pact, that makes it more profitable to lock out employes than to bargain with them. Let us not forget that since this pact came into being the average duration of airline strikes has gone from 15 to 102 days.

Let us remember that despite the success of collective bargaining in private industry the federal government has not been willing to give its own employes more than token rights to bargain.

YES, WE'VE COME A LONG WAY and the men and women of the labor movement appreciate and applaud the issuance of a stamp acknowledging the role of collective bargaining in the progress we've made.

But when Congress really becomes serious about collective bargaining it will do more than issue a stamp. It will repeal Section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act. It will prohibit the airlines Mutual Aid Pact. It will speed and strengthen the administration of the National Labor Relations Act. It will replace ineffective executive orders with a bona fide Federal Employees Labor Relations Act.

When collective bargaining is finally strengthened in the 19 states where it's now the weakest, when it's restored to the air transportation industry, when the National Labor Relations Act asserts real protections against unfair labor practices, and when federal employes enjoy bargaining equality with their brothers and sisters in private industry, labor and management will lay the class struggle finally to rest. And the way will indeed be cleared for less conflict and more accord in the relations between management and labor in America.

Unions Pitch In:

Job Corps Helps Half-Million Needy Youths in First Decade

THE JOB CORPS rounded out its first decade by helping nearly a half-million disadvantaged young workers find new and solid work careers, Reese Hammond, director of education and research for the Operating Engineers, reported.

The Job Corps has been an effective tool for affirmative action, Hammond said, pointing out that the program's two-pronged approach of remedial education and skill training has centered on minority group youngsters from urban areas.

He said that more than two-thirds of the enrollees scored below the sixth grade reading level when they entered the Job Corps, but those who have stuck it out have built new potentials for their futures.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Hammond said that although the Job Corps did survive the Nixon Administration's attempts to gut the program, its operations were severely cut back. And, he added, the current economic crisis and severe unemployment make it hard to commit to any large expansion of training programs in the construction industry at this time.

"Our concern right now," he said, "is to make sure that we place all of the graduates that come out this spring."

Hammond said that several unions in addition to the Operating Engineers have involved themselves and a great deal of time and money and effort in Job Corps centers and training programs. He said that the unions' involvement has stemmed from a determination that something should be done for these youngsters and the feeling that the unions are probably better equipped than anyone else to provide the education and training the Job Corps enrollees need. He said that some excellent trade unionists have also come out of the program.

He said the Job Corps, as a skills training program leading to a work career, is much different from the Civilian Conservation Corps of the Depression, which was primarily designed to ease the problem of youth unemployment. He said that while conversion of the Job Corps to a CCC-type program is a possibility, he knows of no such plan now under consideration.

Hammond was questioned by Charles Flinner of United Press International and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public service program is aired Tuesday over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

"IT IS HELL TO BE OLD in this country. The pressures of living in the age of materialism have produced a youth cult. Most of us are afraid of getting old. This is because we have made old age a wasteland. It is T. S. Eliot's walking on broken glass. It's the nowhere in between this life and the great beyond. It is being robbed of your eyesight, your mobility, and even your human dignity."

Those are the sorrowful words of Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah) who, in more than a dozen years of coping with the problems of the people who "walk on broken glass," has come to realize that their greatest single dread is confinement to a nursing home.

Back in 1960 a Senate subcommittee on aging concluded that "acceptable" nursing homes in the United States are in the minority. Studies have continued in Congress ever since then and conditions in nursing homes have deteriorated until a Senate subcommittee on long-term care for the aging has flatly concluded that:

"American nursing homes have become almost synonymous with death and protracted suffering before death."

This year, Moss, who has headed the subcommittee since 1962, Chairman Frank Church (D-Idaho) of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, Rep. Edward I. Koch (D-N.Y.), and others are trying to convince Congress that some firm standards for and controls over the $3.2 billion nursing home industry must be enacted.

Moss, Church and Koch have joined in sponsoring legislation. Rep. Edward Beard (D-R.I.), a member of the Painters union elected to Congress last year, has introduced a similar bill.

There are likely to be other bills introduced. None has reached the hearing stage. Organized labor and the National Council of Senior Citizens are studying the various measures and will make their voices heard because they have been among the forerunners in exposing nursing home abuses.

Unions like the Service Employees; Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; State, County & Municipal Employees; Laborers and others have fought long and hard for representation at nursing homes, improved conditions, better training for employes and more adequate pay.

Congress has tussled with nursing home abuses in the past. But if anything, its actions have aggravated the situation, though not intentionally. Studies show that the industry has grown like a swampfire mainly because operators of homes qualify for federal assistance. They get big sums from Medicare and Medicaid.

IN 1971, PRESIDENT NIXON introduced a highly-touted "nursing home reform" program. The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has issued some standards, but consumer groups, health representatives and lawmakers charged they have been ineffective and watered-down. They also charge that enforcement, left to the states, has been almost nonexistent.

The infrequent physician visits and a shortage of trained nurses, the Senate subcommittee on aging points out, has resulted in thousands o nursing homes where physical examinations are non-existent, where patients receive insulin with no diagnosis of diabetes and digitalis with no diagnosis of heart disease, where there are no blood pressure readings, where up to 50 percent of all medications are given in error.

If that isn't shocking enough, the reader will learn of "not isolated but widespread" abuses such as unsanitary conditions, poor food, numerosu safety hazards, lack of dental care, misappropriation of funds and thefts, reprisals against complaining patients, over-prescription of tranquilizers, and profiteering and cheating by owners of the homes—many of whom are doctors.

Moss concludes realistically that the nation's collective conscience must be "stirred far more than is now the case" to get Congress to act. Until that happens, nursing home placement for the millions of older citizens will only confirm fears that their destiny is loss of health, liberty and human dignity.

A HALF-MILLION young workers have found solid careers through the Job Corps since it was created ten years ago as part of the Johnson Administration's War on Poverty, Operating Engineers Research & Education Director Reese Hammond, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Charles Flinner of United Press International.

Key Rollcall on Emergency Job Funds

The House on Mar. 12 voted $5.9 billion in emergency funds for programs intended to create jobs for the unemployed. It rejected, 315-109, a Republican motion to send the bill back to the Appropriations Committee with instructions to cut the funds in half.

On the AFL-CIO scorecard, right votes (R) were cast by the 272 Democrats and 43 Republicans who voted against recommittal. Voting wrong (W) were 100 Republicans and 9 Democrats.

Continuing Trend:

Over the last three months, retail prices have increased at the seasonally adjusted compound annual rate of 8.1 percent.

Food prices last month rose at a slower rate than in January, but price increases for nonfood commodities were larger.

In February, the food index increased one-tenth of 1 percent while the nonfood commodities index rose eight-tenths of 1 percent for food and six-tenths of 1 percent for nonfood items.

The slowdown in food prices was chiefly due to declines in beef, pork, poultry and sugar prices, BLS pointed out. Prices of sugar-based products continued to rise sharply, however, and prices of most other grocery store items—as well as the cost of eating out—increased over the month.

A large part of the increase in the food index was due to higher prices of fresh fruits and vegetables, which rose more than seasonally, and large increases in prices of bakery products and other sugar-based items. Prices of dairy products also rose.

Prices for processed fruits and vegetables declined slightly. Egg prices also decreased but much less than is usual for the month.

About two-thirds of the increase in the nonfood commodities index —which normally declines a bit in February—stemmed from higher prices for houses, clothing, housekeeping supplies and alcoholic beverages.

New cars posted sizable increases over the month after registering declines in December and January. The increase reflected higher prices for imported autos, BLS said. Used car prices continued to decline but less than in December or January.

Clothing prices also rose following two months of decline, reflecting higher introductory prices for spring items. Prices of most other nondurable goods, such as textile housefurnishings, toilet goods, drugs and prescriptions, tobacco, gasoline and fuel oil also increased.

The average price for regular gasoline in urban areas last month was 53.3 cents a gallon, up one-tenth of 1 percent from January. The average premium grade price was up two-tenths of 1 percent at 57.4 cents a gallon.

The services index increased eight-tenths of 1 percent in February, about the same as in each of the previous four months. About a fourth of the rise resulted from higher physicians' fees and hospital charges.

Charges for all types of household services increased except mortgage interest rates. Gas, electricity, and water and sewerage rates rose sharply.

Among other services, there were large increases in charges for auto repairs and dry cleaning services and in taxi fares.

While the rate of inflation has apparently abated somewhat, the February CPI rise of six-tenths of 1 percent still was higher than historic norms.

E. L. McCabe, Shipbuilders Leader, Dies

Eugene L. McCabe, president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, died Mar. 19 in a suburban Washington hospital after a lengthy illness. He was 58.

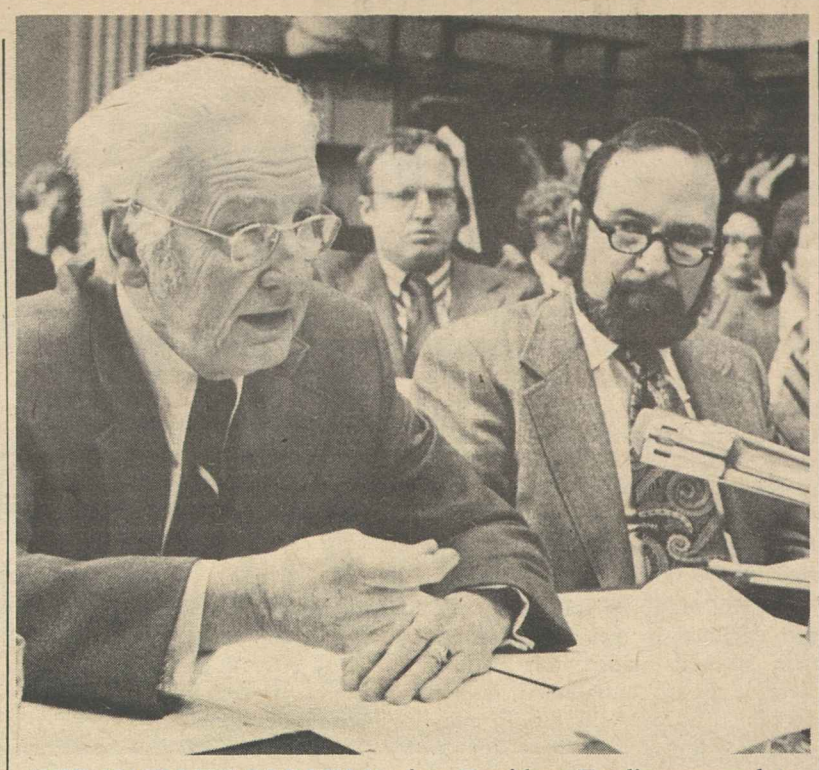
McCabe became a member of the union in 1941 while working at the Staten Island Yard of Bethlehem Steel. He held numerous offices until he became a national union representative in 1947.

In 1951, McCabe was appointed director of the union's New England region and held that position until 1970 when he was elected vice president. He was elected president in 1972.

In a telegram of condolence to his wife, Lucille, AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that McCabe "had justly earned a reputation for honesty, hard work and dedicated service to his union. His many friends in the labor movement shall miss him greatly."

In addition to his wife, he is survived by his mother, Mrs. Gertrude McCabe of Denville, N.J., and two children by a former marriage.

Funeral services were scheduled for Mar. 24 in Boston.



THE NATION'S ELDERLY view President Ford's proposal to limit this year's scheduled cost-of-living increase for social security recipients to 5 percent as "disastrous," President Nelson Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens tells a Senate committee. Testifying with him was Jack Ossofsky, executive director of the National Council on Aging.

Senior Citizens Assail Ford on Benefits Ceiling

President Ford's proposal to limit this year's scheduled cost-of-living increase for social security recipients to 5 percent would be "disastrous" for the nation's elderly, President Nelson H. Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens told Congress.

Testifying before the Senate Budget Committee, Cruikshank charged the President's proposal "has caused incalculable fear and worry" among those dependent on social security.

Under a law enacted by Congress in 1972, social security recipients receive COL increases geared to upward changes in the consumer price index. As matters now stand, recipients of social security are slated to receive an 8.7 percent increase in July for the nine-month period between July 1974 and March 1975.

"While we believe that the projected 8.7 percent increase may well be too small and too late to help thousands of financially repressed seniors, the President's planned lid of 5 percent would be disastrous," Cruikshank told the Senate committee.

Cruikshank noted increasing support among lawmakers for the National Council of Senior Citizens' position that what is needed is a cost-of-living boost of between 11-13 percent, payable July 1 and covering a full year since last July.

Last year's 11 percent social security boost actually represented a 4.2 percent shortfall as runaway inflation lifted the CPI at the rate of 15.2 percent, Cruikshank observed.

"In addition to this shortfall, there is a long wait until July 1975 when the next cost-of-living increase is due under the law," he pointed out.

"The staggering increases in the cost of food, health care, shelter and transportation—which normally take up about 80 percent of the older American's budget—make it imperative that the elderly poor get help as quickly as possible."

He said that the President's plan, if Congress goes along with it, would allow the Administration to use the improved financial position of the social security trust funds to offset part of the deficit in the overall budget—thus making the general budget appear better than it is in fact.

"Surely the President must realize that this proposal is seen for what it really is—an attempt to balance his budget on paper while dipping into the pockets of workers and simultaneously denying benefits to senior citizens," Cruikshank said.

"This plan to deny older people some $2.5 billion in fiscal year 1976 benefits doesn't save workers a cent since there is no plan to reduce workers' contributions to social security," he said.

"It's nothing more than a double ripoff aimed at the older retiree and the younger worker who makes the contribution."

Advisory Panel Explores Changes In Jobless Compensation Program

The Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Insurance has launched a study of possible changes in the present method of financing benefits and administration of the nation's shaky unemployment compensation program.

A three-member committee will examine several proposals referred to it by the full council and report back to the 17-member advisory body within 60 days.

James R. O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, will serve on the panel with the Rev. Joseph M. Becker of Georgetown University, the public member and chairman, and employer member Samuel E. Dyer, vice president of Federated Department Stores, Cincinnati.

The committee will study proposals to amend the Federal Unemployment Tax Act. One proposal would increase the taxable wage base from the present $4,200 to $6,000 in 1977 and to an estimated $7,000 in 1978. Another alternative would raise the tax rate by .05 percent to a total effective rate of .55 percent of payrolls.

The panel also will study proposals to improve the loan fund procedures by which states now borrow from the Federal Unemployment Account in the Unemployment Trust Fund.

The financing of the unemployment compensation system has been an area of concern to the AFL-CIO for many years. At its recent winter meeting, the federation's Executive Council stressed that financing of the program should be placed on a firm and adequate tax base.

The council said the taxable wage base should be increased in a series of steps to a level equal to the taxable wage base used to finance the nation's social security program, currently a maximum of $14,100.

The advisory council met at a time when mounting joblessness has placed the country's unemployment compensation program under its greatest strain since the Great Depression. Several states already have exhausted their reserve funds, and have applied for loans from the federal government to meet unemployment insurance payments.

The council, established by Congress in 1970 to advise the Secretary of Labor on the unemployment insurance program's effectiveness, also recommended appointment of a national commission to re-examine all phases of unemployment compensation. The commission would have a life of two years.

O'Brien noted that labor has no quarrel with the creation of such a commission, but said "it shouldn't be used as a device to delay improvements in areas we already know are deficient."

CONVENTIONS

The Florida AFL-CIO's 1975 convention will be held Sept. 29-Oct. 2 in Jacksonville.

The Utah AFL-CIO convention will be held Aug. 13-15 in Salt Lake City.

The Nebraska AFL-CIO convention will be held Aug. 18-20 in Scottsbluff.

The Massachusetts AFL-CIO convention will be held Sept. 30-Oct. 3 in Boston.

Rubber Union, OCAW Shape Merger Plan

At the same meeting that acted on the agreement, OCAW Sec.-Treas. B. J. Schafer retired and Vice President Anthony C. Sabatine was named by the board to succeed him. Robert Goss, administrative assistant to Grospiron, was then elected a vice president to fill the vacancy.

URW President Peter Bommarito noted that both unions negotiate with several of the same companies and have been interested in the potential strength that a merger would bring. Bommarito and Grospiron are both AFL-CIO vice presidents.

Grospiron said the OCAW has cancelled plans for holding its convention in Denver, starting Aug. 4, and would reschedule it to coincide in date and city with the URW convention.

The URW had planned to meet at Anaheim, Calif., starting Oct. 13. But the problem of accommodating both union conventions in the same city may result in changing the location or dates of the convention.

If a final merger agreement is reached and endorsed by the executive boards of the two unions, it will be submitted to each of the union conventions.

A majority vote for ratification at each convention will complete the merger, the two union presidents said, and the delegates would then be able to meet jointly as a merged union.

'Jobs Now Rally' Planned by IUD

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has announced that it will hold a "Rally for Jobs Now" at Robert F. Kennedy Stadium in Washington, Apr. 26.

IUD President I.W. Abel and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman said that large numbers of working people are expected to attend the rally. It is scheduled for three hours starting at 1 p.m.

The IUD plans to invite all members of Congress to the rally.

Court Backs UFW Stand On Short Hoe

Sacramento, Calif. — The California Supreme Court ruled that the state may prohibit the use of the short-handled hoe in agricultural work because it could cause serious back injuries.

The Farm Workers had long sought to ban the hoe, used extensively in crop cultivation, but the now-defunct State Industrial Safety Board refused to issue a regulation against the use of the hoe on the grounds that it was not inherently dangerous.

However, the court declared that "any tool which causes injury, immediate or cumulative, when used in the manner in which it was intended to be used, may constitute an unsafe hand tool within the meaning of the regulation."

The court's decision instructed the board, which has been succeeded by the California Occupational Safety & Health Standards Board, to reconsider the case for banning the tool. The hoe has a handle about one-foot long and requires constant stooping when used.

Physicians testified at hearings last year that prolonged use of the hoe could cause ruptured spinal discs, torn back ligaments and arthritis of the spine.

Benefit Rolls Surge:

Job Losses Spread, Key Areas Stricken

chiefly in autos; shipbuilding, metals and machinery.

A year ago, only 33 areas had substantial unemployment.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. reported 6,380,700 workers drew unemployment insurance benefits of one type or another during the week ended Mar. 1. Of the total, 5,173,100 were receiving regular state unemployment insurance benefits.

The jobless rate for those covered by state unemployment insurance programs remained unchanged from the previous week at 7.9 percent. A year earlier, the rate was 4.1 percent when the volume was 2,589,800.

In addition, 610,000 new claims for jobless insurance benefits were filed in the week ended Mar. 8.

The new figures reflected the sharpest plunge in economic activity since the 1930s.

There were other developments:

● Housing starts in February dropped to their second-lowest rate on record while new building permits fell to a record low. The Commerce Dept. reported new starts were down 1.9 percent to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 977,000 units. Permits declined 1.3 percent to a seasonally adjusted rate of 673,000 units.

● The nation's industrial output declined in February for the fifth straight month, the Federal Reserve Board announced. The 3 percent drop over the month compared with a 3.6 percent decline in the previous month. The January drop was the sharpest monthly decline since December 1937.

● Capacity utilization of the nation's factories, mines and utilities plunged to 78 percent in the last three months of 1974, the Commerce Dept. reported. The sharp drop—a decline from 84 percent in the third quarter—was the steepest since the government began the survey in 1968.

Industrial production slid further in January and February of this year, the Commerce Dept. said, noting the decline will show up as further drops in capacity utilization.

On the brighter side was the first monthly decline in business inventories in four and one-half years. The $148 million decrease in inventories in January indicated businesses were moving unsold goods built up due to slackened demand resulting from the recession.

Wholesale prices in February fell at a seasonally adjusted rate of eight-tenths of 1 percent, the third consecutive month of decline.

And the Federal Reserve Board lowered its discount rate half a percentage point to 6.25 percent, a move that led the country's major lending institutions to trim their prime rates.

The discount rate is the interest rate that Federal Reserve banks charge member commercial banks for loans. The 6.25 percent rate is the lowest since June 1973.

Taking their cue from the Fed, the nation's commercial banks pared their prime lending rates to 7.5 percent generally. Two large New York banks cut their prime rates to 7.5 percent. That is the lowest rate the industry has seen in 21 months.

The prime is the interest rate big banks charge their most creditworthy corporate customers for short-term loans. Steady drops in the prime rate usually show up eventually in other interest rates.

Airline Unions Shift Drive to 'Scrap MAP'

The Supreme Court declined to review an appellate court ruling upholding the airline industry's so-called Mutual Aid Pact, but unions in the industry promised to continue the fight to "scrap MAP" in Congress.

Under the pact, any signatory airline is eligible to collect 50 percent of its normal operating expenses during the first 14 days of a strike. The figure drops in steps to 35 percent after four weeks. The money comes from non-struck carriers which are parties to the 17-year-old agreement.

Airline unions, backed by the AFL-CIO, have sought for years to end the agreement, pointing out it has prolonged strikes while giving struck carriers an unfair edge.

The Supreme Court's decision denying a review of MAP's legality means the arrangement will remain in force until Congress takes action to outlaw it. The Senate Commerce Committee has scheduled hearings Apr. 23-24 on bills to do away with the pact.

Organized labor groups had appealed a 1974 decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia which had upheld the Civil Aeronautic Board's approval of MAP a year earlier.

In another action, the Supreme Court agreed to decide whether an Atlanta area shopping mall owner had the right to bar striking workers from picketing at the entrance to a store inside the enclosed mall. The court agreed to hear oral arguments in the case in its next term.

Congress Urged to Take Active Roll on Budget

Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO to look at the federal budget in terms of the nation's needs and as an opportunity to reshape national priorities.

The federation asked the new House Budget Committee to make its review of the President's proposed budget more than a decision as to the surplus or deficit to be sought within an arbitrary time period.

Waste should be eliminated and funds spent efficiently, the AFL-CIO said in a statement submitted to the committee, but Congress should avoid "competing" with the Ford Administration in seeking to economize by dismantling or underfunding essential programs.

Labor's statement asked Congress "to view its new role in the budget process as an opportunity to help assure a balanced, full employment economy with rising real incomes, expansion of badly-needed public facilities and services. . . ."

The federal government should use its vital power to tax and spend, the AFL-CIO said, to promote steady economic growth and to fill "vast unmet public needs" for jobs, housing, transportation, education, health care and other goals.

Although the law passed last year does not obligate Congress to follow the new budget review procedures in full until next year's budget is submitted, the House and Senate budget panels plan to bring out a resolution in cooperation with legislative committees that would set targets for appropriations and spending in various areas.

The AFL-CIO statement stressed that the economy has deteriorated to the point where unemployment feeds on unemployment and "massive" government action is needed.

It said the Administration "blueprint for America," as spelled out in its budget proposals, "would not in any way halt the downward spiral or move the economy from depression and the brink of disaster."

It asked Congress to use its power "promptly and wisely" to turn the economy around.

Speed Asked In Processing Food Stamps

The Meat Cutters have called on Congress to provide the means for speeding up the food stamp application process, reduce food stamp prices, and reject any new efforts to cut off strikers from food stamp eligibility.

Meat Cutters Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer on behalf of Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman submitted the union's statement during Senate Agriculture Committee hearings on food stamp legislation.

"Our union has long been concerned with the food stamp program," the statement said. "We believe it is an essential and vital government effort to prevent millions of Americans from suffering hunger and malnutrition.

"It is literally preventing some of our fellow citizens from starving and it is especially important now, while our nation is going headlong into a depression. The program is also important to the health of the food industry since it permits some 17 million persons to purchase an adequate amount of food through normal distribution channels."

The union urged that the committee "act decisively to ensure that all food stamp applicants are fully processed within 15 days of their initial contact with the food stamp office" by providing both statutory instructions and money to hire the needed people.

Waits of from four to ten weeks for appointments to apply for stamps are being increasingly reported, while another month can pass before the applications are processed, the union said.

In addition, the union said, the price of food stamps should be reduced significantly to offset the effect of inflation.

Direct Loans Sought To Cut Home Costs

committee that such an approach would tend to perpetuate the current high levels of mortgage interest. And he warned that some families, encouraged to buy homes by the temporary 6 percent interest rate, might find it hard to meet the rise in monthly payments after the subsidy runs out.

Under the House bill and most of the companion measures, families eligible for interest subsidies could not have an income greater than 120 percent of the median income in the metropolitan area or other community designated by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. Only homes valued at under $38,000 would be eligible for mortgage subsidies, except in designated high-cost areas where the purchase price could go as high as $42,000 in the 48 contiguous states, and even higher in Alaska and Hawaii.

Another provision of the House bill would allow HUD to substitute a life-of-the-mortgage 7 percent rate for the temporary 6 percent subsidy.

Schechter said the Proxmire bill would tend to bring mortgage rates down instead of propping them up, as in the House bill.

It would establish a fund to purchase mortgages bearing a 6 percent mortgage interest rate. The mortgages would not be resold in the private market to yield a higher rate — thus eliminating another source of upward pressure on non-subsidized mortgage rates.

Under the Proxmire bill, the assistance program would be triggered when there was a combination of relatively high unemployment — above 6 percent — and relatively low housing starts—below an annual rate of 1,750,000. At least 75 percent of the homes purchased with government-assisted mortgages would have had to be constructed within the previous 12 months.

Schechter also urged the subcommittee, headed by Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.), to approve legislation that would prevent foreclosure of homes being purchased by families whose income suddenly drops because of unemployment or other financial disaster.

The bill that comes closest to the need, he said, would provide for HUD payments of not more than $375 a month for not more than two years to cover the principal, interest, taxes and necessary insurance payments.

The funds advanced would be a loan, repayable under terms to be set by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

"The relief payments are needed now," Schechter said, "since unemployment insurance benefits are inadequate" to cover mortgage costs as well as essential family living expenses.

On another bill before the Senate subcommittee, Schechter endorsed development of national minimum standards for insulation and other energy-conserving measures in construction. And he expressed the AFL-CIO's support, also, of grants to help winterize dwellings of low-income persons and particularly the elderly.

Tax Cut Bill Sent to Ford To Aid Dragging Economy

An Editorial by George Meany

The Bitter Fruits of Detente

WITH THE COLLAPSE of Secretary Kissinger's latest Middle East mission, the policy of detente lies in ruins.

No less sweeping indictment can be made by sober and reasonable men. And Israeli security is not the only potential victim of this disastrous policy. The wreckage is global.

As if to cover up the consequences of its policies, the Administration is apparently passing the word that it holds Israeli "intransigence" mainly responsible for the failure of Mr. Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy.

Of what does this "intransigence" consist? Israel's refusal to give up the Sinai passes and oil fields without an Egyptian pledge of nonbelligerence. In other words, the Israelis wanted something tangible in return for their territorial concessions, not just vague guarantees by Dr. Kissinger.

As trade unionists, we know a little something about bargaining, and we know you don't give away something for nothing. We are also quite familiar with the techniques of unfair intimidation that can be brought to bear on the bargaining process. Certainly, to suggest that the U.S. will "reassess" its policies toward an ally of a quarter of a century, if that ally does not make more concessions to enemies sworn to destroy her, is an unmistakable threat.

The result of this disgraceful policy is that the United States appears to be striking a neutral pose in the Middle East, while the Russians are giving full backing to the Arabs. The Israelis have half an ally, while the Arabs have one and a half.

President Ford should indeed undertake a reassessment—not of U.S. relations with Israel, but of our recent actions in the Middle East and of the entire Nixon-Kissinger policy of detente, which has produced disillusionment everywhere and success nowhere.

Whatever reassessment the President may undertake, the AFL-CIO here and now reiterates its support of Israel and its deep solidarity with Histadrut in this critical hour.

In our opinion, the Israelis were right not to rest their future on "guarantees" by Henry Kissinger. No doubt they, along with our

1974 Profits Up 17% Despite Economic Sag

American business and industry turned in another good year in 1974 despite the most severe economic contraction since the 1930s, posting after-tax profits totaling $85.4 billion—up 17 percent from 1973, the Commerce Dept. reported.

While the percentage increase lagged behind that of the two previous years, it matched that for 1971 when the nation was beginning its recovery from the 1969-70 recession.

Net profits in 1973 were $72.9 billion, or 26 percent above the year before when they totaled $57.7 billion. The profits rise in 1972 was 25 percent.

Corporate performance last year proved steady even though profits in the October-December period fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $81.1 billion, down $13.2 billion from the record $94.3 billion in the third quarter.

The 17 percent slide in fourth-quarter reported earnings was due "almost entirely to a substantial reduction in inventory profits," the Commerce Dept. said.

This drop in inventory profits resulted from bookkeeping changes many firms resorted to in the last half of the year to reduce their tax liabilities.

The switch to the LIFO (last-in, first-out) accounting technique enabled hundreds of companies to inflate their reported costs, thus lowering reported profits. This meant a reduction in taxes while cash flow increased.

Until mid-1974, most businesses employed the first-in, first-out approach under which it was assumed the oldest goods in stock are those used in current production. The FIFO method more closely reflects actual costs and profits.

Despite Ford's Reluctance:

Anti-Recession Bills Gain on Capitol Hill

Congress continued to go beyond the Ford Administration's proposals in its effort to create jobs and revive the economy.

Despite Administration hostility, bills dealing with mortgage subsidies, funds for social programs, health insurance for the unemployed and home foreclosures moved up on the legislative ladder.

The House voted 259-106 approval of a bill intended to spur homebuilding by providing a partial subsidy of mortgage interest rates for middle-income families who buy newly-constructed homes.

The House bill would enable families who qualify to pay less than the current market rate of interest under one of two options—a temporary subsidy that would reduce the mortgage rate to 6 percent for three years with an additional three years of phase-in before the regular market level is reached, or a level 7 percent rate for the life of the mortgage.

While the Administration opposed any form of interest subsidy, the AFL-CIO has urged the Senate to improve on the bill by a federal loan program that would help bring all interest rates down.

Both the House and Senate continued to rebuff the bulk of President Ford's request that Congress rescind billions of dollars in appropriations as an economy move.

In the latest series of actions, Congress approved $260 million in budget rescissions requested by Ford—most of it in Defense Dept. funds.

But it refused to approve nearly $2 billion in other cutbacks proposed by the President. The Administration therefore will have to allocate funds it didn't want to spend for the National Cancer Institute, drug abuse and mental health programs, for educating the handicapped, higher education and li-

Jobs Boost Chief Goal Of Measure

By David L. Perlman

Congress voted final approval of a job-creating tax cut and refund package that is substantially greater than President Ford had sought but short of the total urged by the AFL-CIO.

The White House said President Ford would take "several days" to decide whether to veto the legislation or allow it to become law.

All segments of the population, and business firms as well as individuals, would benefit from the nearly $25 billion in reductions and rebates voted by Congress. The largest share, however, would go to the lower- and middle-income families that have been hardest hit by the shrinking purchasing power of the dollar.

Their purchases, quickly pumped into the spending stream, are counted on to stimulate the economy and generate employment. If the bill is signed by the President, checks for 1974 rebates would start going out by May, and the 1975 reductions would be translated into lower withholding from paychecks this year.

By contrast, Ford's original proposal would have given far bigger refunds to the wealthiest taxpayers and what AFL-CIO President George Meany had termed "peanuts to the poor."

While tax reductions and cash payments in the bill total an estimated $24.8 billion, the Treasury would recoup $2 billion of that amount through a significant nar-

Bid to Shift Financing Of Medicare Assailed

The AFL-CIO took "strong exception" to a proposal for financing social security benefits that would have the effect of making the Medicare program entirely dependent on year-to-year congressional appropriations.

Federation President George Meany said the Advisory Council on Social Security took the wrong road to avoiding a future deficit in the program. The council proposed to drop the Medicare portion of the social security payroll tax and raise the tax rate for the basic Old Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance by an equivalent amount. Medicare benefits would then be financed out of general tax revenues, not related to earnings.

Meany warned that financing Medicare "totally from general revenues without any worker contribution would undermine the social insurance principle of benefits as a matter of right." He said it would lead to income and means tests, transforming Medicare into another welfare program.

Labor Pushes State Drive to Scrap Inferior Occupational Health Plans

AFL-CIO efforts to establish exclusive federal enforcement of job safety and health standards received a temporary setback as a federal judge denied the federation a motion to disallow further development of state safety plans with Labor Dept. approval.

Organized labor is continuing to press, however, for the abandonment of inferior state safety programs at the state level while considering an appeal of the decision by Judge John L. Smith, Jr., of the District Court in Washington.

AFL-CIO safety specialist George H. R. Taylor said efforts would also be intensified to upgrade federal safety and health programs which the court decision held are the yardstick for state plans.

In a suit brought by the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Illinois AFL-CIO, the Labor Dept. was accused of approving state safety plans that did not meet the standards of the federal Occupational Safety & Health Act.

The key wording in the section of the law that provides for the development of state safety plans is that they be "at least as effective as" the federal standards.

But the labor lawsuit contended that the Labor Dept. and Occupational Safety & Health Administration regulations for state plans "are arbitrary and capricious."

It charged that the regulations merely parrot the language of the federal statute, establish no rational criteria and guidelines for evaluating the state's commitment to effective inspection and enforcement, and have resulted in non-uniform state plans with wide disparities in manpower commitments and fund allotments.

Judge Smith observed in his ruling that the yardstick for state standards, enforcement personnel and funding is determined by the federal safety program and should reflect the effectiveness of OSHA's performance.

However, this part of the ruling also suggests that should the federal standards and enforcement be under par, the state programs could be equally shoddy.

Attorneys George H. Cohen and Lawrence Gold, who are handling the federation's lawsuit, said this section of the ruling could form the basis for an appeal.

When the suit was filed a year ago, 26 state safety plans had been approved by the Labor Dept. That number has since dropped to 23 as three large manufacturing states—Illinois, New Jersey and New York—have pulled out of the program and switched to federal enforcement.

Several other states had withdrawn safety plans earlier, including Pennsylvania, Georgia, Mississippi, New Hampshire and North Dakota. Other major states which have chosen federal enforcement include Texas, Missouri, Massachusetts and Louisiana.

Only six states with large numbers of workers are participating through their own state plans. They are California, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Carolina. But labor-endorsed legislation is pending in Indiana and Wisconsin that would block further participation in the state plan effort.

In addition to administering their own programs, states must provide half of the funds and adopt other enabling legislation for manpower, training and safety and health standards.

The entire administration and funding is borne by the federal government in states that do not operate their own programs.

N.Y. Governor Shifts To Federal Safety Plan

Albany, N.Y.—Gov. Hugh L. Carey announced that New York state will abandon its occupational safety and health plan and develop an agreement for federal administration.

His move was greeted by State AFL-CIO President Raymond R. Corbett as "a significant victory for workers."

Carey made known his intention in a letter to John H. Stender, assistant secretary of labor.

In a public statement, Corbett noted that Carey had put special emphasis on the matter of protecting the jobs of the several hundred state safety inspectors in working out the agreement for federal administration of the program.

At the 1973 and 1974 sessions of the state legislature, the State AFL-CIO and its affiliates successfully opposed attempts to enact a bill to set up a state occupational safety and health plan. Labor stressed that the state proposal was not, as required by the federal law, "at least as effective as" the federal OSHA.

In mid-February, Carey met with Stender, State Industrial Commissioner Louis L. Levine, Corbett and State AFL-CIO Research Director Ludwig Jaffe to review the entire picture. At the conclusion of that meeting he directed that a proposal be drafted for federal job safety administration.

Carey pointed out in announcing his decision that the money savings resulting — $2.5 million the first year, $3.5 million annually thereafter—would make possible a job safety and health program for public workers "for the first time" and said the state would also set up a consultative service to aid employers both in federal and state jurisdictional areas.

The governor emphasized that there would be no lessening of the state's safety program in areas not under federal control, such as underground mines and certain types of radiation, and said that bills to maintain state licensing of operators of cranes and lasers and blasters would be proposed to the legislature.

Concerning the state job safety inspectors, Carey said that "in addition to retaining personnel to help develop and maintain the new programs which we will initiate, I will work with the U.S. Dept. of Labor in expediting the transfer of as many state enforcement officers as possible to the federal program."

He said he would see to it that New York would assume "a position of leadership in strengthening the federal program, and through our congressional delegation, I plan to press for the most effective federal program possible and for adequate funding for implementation of such program."

Carey urged that steps be taken to have the federal program operational by next June 30.

Financing Shift Opposed:

Medicare Proposal Called Wrong Road

But Meany also criticized the Ford Administration for suggesting "even worse" methods of avoiding a future deficit, such as holding social security benefit increases below the rise in living costs and cutting back on Medicare.

President Ford said he is opposed to any use of general revenue funds for either the basic social security program or for Medicare.

Meany stressed that the AFL-CIO's position is that there should be a contribution to both programs out of general revenue, but that payroll taxes paid by workers and their employers should remain a key part of the program.

"A major factor in social security's popularity is the absence of a welfare stigma," Meany said. "The public looks upon benefits as an earned right because workers have made contributions during their working lives."

Meany criticized the council for rejecting the alternative of gradually raising the taxable wage base from the current $14,100 of earnings to a maximum of $28,000. He noted that only 15 percent of workers would pay a higher amount under this system, and they would receive higher benefits as a result of the higher wage base.

The advisory council also "totally ignored the inadequacy of social security benefits and the need to improve them," Meany said. At present levels, he declared, "the retirement years will continue to be ones of bitter desperation for millions of elderly citizens."

Meany said the dissent by one of the advisory council members, Rudolph Danstedt, "closely represents the views of the AFL-CIO."

Danstedt, who is assistant to the president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, suggested as one means of improving social security financing that the employer share of the tax be made applicable to the company's entire payroll, not just to the portion of earnings now subject to the social security tax. He noted that the employer payroll tax is actually less than was contemplated in the original Social Security Act.

On the proposal to abolish the Medicare portion of the payroll tax, Danstedt commented:

"If Medicare is to be supported entirely by the general taxpayer rather than in significant part by earmarked contributions from those who are to benefit from the protection, the question in the future will inevitably arise as to why general funds should go to pay for the hospitalization and physicians' bills of a selected group in the population—the elderly and disabled—regardless of whether or not a particular elderly or disabled person is entirely able to pay for the services on his own. Thus I fear that the recommendations of the majority could over time transform the Medicare social insurance program into a relief program."

Further, he suggested, a switch away from contributory financing would make it more likely that in times of budgetary restraint benefits for the elderly would be reduced and they would be required to pay a bigger share of health costs.

While an increase in the taxable wage base, a tax on the employer's total payroll and other adjustments would meet the short-range funding problems, Danstedt noted that an eventual government contribution may be needed by the last decade of the century.

He suggested restoration of language that was in the Social Security Act from 1944 to 1950, authorizing Congress to appropriate "such additional sums as may be required to finance the benefits."

For the long run, Danstedt anticipates "a social security system covering both cash benefits and health insurance financed partly by employer contributions, partly by employe contributions, and partly by contributions from the government in recognition of society's stake in a well-functioning social insurance program."

Transit Strikers Gain New Philadelphia Pact

Philadelphia—Transport Workers resolved an 11-day strike against the area's transit authority by approving a new two-year contract providing basic wage increases of $1.10 an hour in addition to other improvements. Members of TWU Local 234 ratified the agreement 2,704 to 2,051.

The 5,500 TWU operators, mechanics and cashiers employed by the Southern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority will receive a 60-cent-an-hour wage increase retroactive to Mar. 15, another 15 cents Dec. 15, and 35 cents next Mar. 15.

A cost-of-living escalator will go into effect next Mar. 15, providing for a 1-cent-an-hour adjustment for each increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in the Philadelphia area cost of living index. The first COL adjustment will be made in September 1976 with a maximum payment of 12 cents an hour.

Other improvements in the agreement call for an additional paid holiday, for a total of 10 annually, and increased contributions by the transit authority to the employes' pension plan.

Workers with 30 years of service will for the first time be able to retire with full pension benefits regardless of age.

The agreement also provides for a pharmaceutical plan under which members will pay only the first $1 for a prescription; increased payments by the transit authority for medical and insurance programs, and improved sick leave benefits. Weekly sick pay is raised $10 to $115 a week for the first 28 days and $5 to $100 a week for the remaining 122 days of coverage.

The union's negotiating team was headed by TWU President Matthew Guinan and Sec.-Treas. Roosevelt Watts, along with Local 234 President Ned LeDonne and Executive Vice Pres. James F. Horst.

Rubber Workers Name New General Counsel

Akron, O.—Harley M. Kastner was named general counsel of the Rubber Workers to succeed George V. Vasko, who resigned to enter private practice. Kastner, 25, has been the URW assistant general counsel since November 1973.

Congressional Report:

Ford Policies Point To 10% Joblessness

Unemployment in the United States could go as high as 10 percent by late this year if the Ford Administration's economic proposals were to be adopted, a report of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress warned.

The nation's jobless rate in January and February hung at 8.2 percent of the work force, the highest in 34 years, and is expected to show a further increase when the government releases its report on March employment on Apr. 4.

The committee report, issued as a response to the Economic Report of the President submitted to Congress earlier this year, also warned the Administration's economic strategy would result in a "staggering" decline in output—$1.5 trillion between now and the end of this decade.

"The above assessment, pessimistic though it may sound, is not the worst possible case," the committee declared. "It assumes a moderately easy monetary policy, some recovery in housing starts and some pickup in automobile sales.

"Should the Federal Reserve pursue a restrictive monetary policy, this—together with the restrictive impact which the President's energy proposals would have in 1976—could well serve to make 1976 the third successive year of declining output.

"Unemployment could rise above 10 percent," the committee observed. It noted national unemployment is now expected to go to 9 percent or above in the third and fourth quarters of 1975, and added:

"The outlook is even bleaker if we consider that in June of this year almost 4.5 million young men and women will graduate from high school, college and professional schools."

The committee offered its own "emergency economic recovery program" to stop the deterioration of the economy and get the nation back on a growth path. The plan includes personal and business tax cuts totaling $32-$35 billion, increased and expanded unemployment insurance benefits, grants to state and local governments, more public service jobs, quick aid to the housing industry, and tax reform.

The committee's report containing the tax reduction proposal was issued before congressional conferees moved to reconcile the differing tax-cut measures adopted by the House and Senate.

The joint committee said its recomendations are "designed to combat the most grave economic emergency in the postwar era."

It said adoption of its proposals would bring unemployment down to a range of 7.8 to 8.1 percent by the end of 1975—"compared to 9.2 to 9.5 percent under the President's program"—and 6.5 to 6.8 percent by the fourth quarter of 1976.

"In terms of jobs, an estimated 2 to 2.5 million more people would be working at the end of next year under the committee's program than under the President's," the majority report panel observed.

UNION WITNESSES told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that unemployment has reached the crisis stage and faster action is needed on job-creating legislation. Union Sues City Officials For Food Stamp Denial Danville, Va.—The United Textile Workers are suing Danville city officials for $2.1 million for illegally denying food stamps to UTWA members who were on strike last summer.

The suit filed in federal district court here charges that the civil rights of 6,000 UTWA members and supporters were violated by Danville's city manager, mayor, social services director and city council members. It accuses the officials of conspiring to withhold the food stamps to strikers in violation of federal law.

The union is seeking $600,000 in actual damages, $1.5 million in punitive damages and a permanent injunction against any future such illegal conduct by the municipal officials.

Food stamps were withheld from UTWA Local 248 members while they were engaged in a 1974 strike against the Dan River, Inc. textile firm.

Last December, the Virginia Board of Welfare found Danville guilty of denying the food stamps to the Dan River strikers on the instructions of City Manager James Lord. The state imposed a remedial penalty on the city by having state-reimbursed administrative costs withheld for two months. This amounted to a loss of $2,400 in city revenues.

The union pointed out that its suit is not against the city or its taxpayers, but rather against the individual municipal officials who it charged conspired to illegally withhold the food stamps.

UTWA President Francis Schaufenbil expressed regret that a lawsuit is necessary to assure that its members are treated as "first-class citizens."

"But whatever it takes," Schaufenbil declared, "we'll do it to protect our membership and their legal rights."

UTWA Sec.-Treas. Philip Salem said that the penalty for the violation should be borne only by the defendants.

"Any judgment we recover in this case will be paid by the individual defendants," he declared. "The good taxpayers of the city, and they include UTWA members, are not guilty parties here."

Youth Debates Set For Bicentennial

Nationwide speech competition for younger citizens commemorating the nation's bicentennial sponsored by the Speech Communication Association will begin in September and continue through June 1976.

The Bicentennial Youth Debates, supported by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, will be held on local, district, sectional, regional and national levels, with winners advancing to the next higher level. Debate topics will focus a number of national issues, including the role of workers and organized labor.

AFL-CIO President George Meany is a member of the advisory council for the youth debates. The program was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in urging union members to take part in the nation's 200th anniversary celebration.

Aerospace Strikers Vote Offer Down

Los Angeles—Striking Machinists employed by McDonnell Douglas Corp. overwhelmingly rejected a company contract offer, and continued their walkout at the firm's facilities in California and Cape Canaveral, Fla.

IAM Vice President Robert Simpson noted the company proposal was rejected by almost 75 percent of those voting at the Los Angeles Convention Center Mar. 23. About 5,000 of the 6,000 IAM members in the Los Angeles area turned out for the ratification meeting.

The giant aerospace firm proposed a three-year package providing for wage increases of 3 percent each year, along with a cost-of-living adjustment, and improvements in a number of fringe benefits.

Simpson said no new talks between the firm and IAM's District 720 were scheduled. Negotiations between IAM District 837 and the company at its corporate headquarters in St. Louis continued, however.

About 7,000 Machinists at five McDonnell Douglas plants in California and at Cape Canaveral are represented by District 720. Another 12,000 are represented by District 837 in St. Louis.

The strike began nearly seven weeks ago at all the McDonnell Douglas plant locations where the Machinists represent employes. IAM's contracts with the firm expired last October. The union now has twice rejected company settlement offers on grounds they failed to meet agreements reached earlier with other aerospace firms.

W. A. Copeland Dies, Retired Organizer

Pensacola, Fla. — William A. Copeland, retired AFL-CIO field representative, died here Mar. 9. He was 76. Copeland retired in 1963 after 21 years on the organizing staffs of the federation and the CIO before the 1955 merger.

He had been associated with the Newspaper Guild since its founding days and had served as a local president in Memphis, Tenn., and as a vice president of the international. Copeland also had been president of the Tennessee CIO state council and the state political action director. He aided several unions in organizing campaigns.

Union Leaders Press For Jobs Legislation

A panel of union officials sought to impress on the Joint Economic Committee of Congress the gravity of the nation's economic crisis and the human tragedy behind the unemployment statistics.

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., reported on an industry that has suffered "double-digit unemployment for nine consecutive months" and has more than 225,000 of its workers unemployed for 15 weeks or longer.

President George Hardy of the Service Employees told the House-Senate joint committee that nearly half of all workers who have lost their jobs are in service occupations—and that most of these were in the lowest pay brackets, have no cushion of savings and are entitled to only minimum unemployment benefits.

Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts termed the economic collapse "the inevitable consequence" of a big business bias by this Administration and its predecessor.

He warned that "rampant recession and soaring unemployment are creating a potential powder keg of social dynamite." This could lead to "the ugliest mass emotions," he said.

Watts urged "a massive public service jobs program" and "authentic tax reform" including a $30 billion tax cut. He called for an energy policy aimed at achieving self-sufficiency and "social justice" to avert "a tragic waste of human resources."

Hardy told the congressional panel that in most states workers who had been receiving the federal minimum wage will get only about $40 a week in unemployment benefits.

He told the joint committee that it should be hearing from people like a nurses' aide laid off at East Los Angeles Hospital who has two children she was solely supporting, or the mother of five who lost her job "mopping floors in a building."

He said the Service Employees favor a cut in the workweek and strong curbs on overtime as a way of spreading employment.

Georgine said the construction industry is the chief victim of the high interest, tight money and impoundment policies of the Administration and the Federal Reserve Board.

In major cities, Georgine said, construction unemployment is above 25 percent and "the taxes lost to the federal government from unemployed construction workers is now close to $650 million."

He told the committee that "only massive emergency measures can halt the downward spiral, turn the economy around, put Americans back to work and restore public confidence in the government's ability to correct the economy's difficulties."

GE Workers Certified for Trade Act Aid

The Labor Dept. has certified 1,100 New York state workers eligible for trade adjustment assistance because their jobs were wiped out by increased imports of electronic components.

The affected workers, members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Machinists, were employed at General Electric Semiconductor Products Dept. plants in Syracuse and Auburn, N.Y.

Both the IUE and the IAM filed petitions with the International Trade Commission — the successor agency to the U.S. Tariff Commission — appealing for assistance for their members under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962.

The commission found that the imports were the major factor in the layoffs of workers engaged in the production of transistors and diodes at the two GE facilities.

Cash allowances, testing, training, job placement and other benefits are provided in the trade adjustment assistance. The workers can receive up to 65 percent of the national average weekly wage. Benefits will rise to 70 percent of the average wage after Apr. 3.

The Bitter Fruits of Detente

other allies, were watching the horrible tragedy unfolding in Vietnam—another fruit of detente.

In January 1973, Dr. Kissinger arranged a cease-fire in Vietnam and a withdrawal of American troops. This, we were told, with great fanfare, would bring an end to the killing. Mr. Nixon took credit for ending the war.

But the following year, more South Vietnamese soldiers were killed than in any other year of the war, save two. Then we were told, by leading members of Congress, that the way to stop the killing was to cut off military aid to South Vietnam.

No sooner did it become clear that Congress intended to do just that than the North Vietnamese launched a full-scale invasion of the South. We are now witnessing one of the most massive migrations of human beings in modern history—roughly a million Vietnamese fleeing south. (They are not, be it noticed, rushing to the workers' paradise in the North but to the "repressive" and "corrupt" regime in the South. They are voting with their feet.) And as these men, women and children flee, they are being fired upon by the advancing Communist troops.

Is this the kind of peace agreement Henry Kissinger has in mind for the Middle East? And what about those members of Congress who profess support for Israel but would withhold from another small country struggling for survival against Communist aggression the aid she needs to survive?

The question here is not whether Israel and Vietnam are the same but whether the dishonorable abandonment of our commitment to one ally will strengthen the credibility of our commitment to another. The AFL-CIO does not think so, and the Middle East debacle, coming in the midst of the Indochina tragedy, is powerful evidence to the contrary.

The "domino theory" is supposedly out of fashion, but events are reasserting it with a vengeance. We see before our horrified eyes plain and simple proof that the fate of the Western world rests on a series of interlinking alliances and relationships which cannot be damaged at one point without weakening the whole chain. This—rather than any oversimplified notion of adjacent countries toppling over each other—is what links Israel, Vietnam, and for that matter, Portugal.

There can be no doubt that the bold Communist push for power in Portugal is fed by an awareness of declining American power in the world. That decline has to do with the disarray of the Western economies and resulting political instability. It also has to do with America's deteriorating military position vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. But it also has to do with the belief, widespread in the world, that the rhetoric of detente masks a loss of nerve, a lack of will to bear any longer the burdens of defending freedom in the world.

Everywhere communism is on the march. Everywhere the West is in retreat. Such are the fruits, the bitter fruits, of detente.

A Word Edgewise:

Properly Supervised CIA Vital To Best Interests of Nation

By John P. Roche

BEFORE OPENING this column, I feel it necessary to fulfill current standards of journalistic sanctity by a full disclosure of my relationship with the Central Intelligence Agency. In line of duty at the White House I visited CIA headquarters several times and once had lunch with two Vietnam experts in the cafeteria (I do not recall who picked up the check). Once in Santo Domingo I had dinner with a chap who turned out later to be a CIA man (though I thought he was from Graham Greene's cast of characters). Since we were introduced by Juan Bosch, president of the Dominican Republic at the time, I was a wholly unsuspecting dupe—besides which I had to pick up the quite substantial tab.

Finally, in retrospect, I am convinced that the Vietnamese kid who, in May 1966, threw a rock at me on the Gia Long in Saigon was inspired by the agency, which took a dim view of my attitude toward some of its operations. He missed, probably leading to the establishment of a CIA training camp in rock throwing which produced the guy who bounced one off Mexican President Luis Echeverria recently. I have indeed heard rumors of such a camp, located in New Caledonia, but that is purely hearsay. So much for the confessional.

To get down to serious business, I think that Congress—caught up in that incredible Washington echo chamber—and a number of journalists and commentators have wholly misread the mood of the American people on the subject of intelligence operations. I doubt, for example, if the news that the agency raised part of a sunken Soviet nuclear sub left the average citizen in an enraged mood.

So, in the best of all worlds, we should have given it back and, perhaps, nice letters should have gone off to the Soviet next of kin. But my hunch is that the populace 1) thinks the exploit absolutely miraculous (salvage 17,000 feet underwater is no task for scuba divers); 2) believes that whoever dreamed it up should get a medal; and 3) hopes that no time will be wasted going after the rest of the hulk.

Americans, to emphasize an often overlooked point, are not under the illusion that those submarine missiles were to be targeted on Rwanda. Moreover, while some of the pundits have poohpoohed the possibility of gaining any advantage from outdated code books, they miss the entire point. Of course, the Soviets change their codes, as we do, with some regularity.

But possession of the code books, and the intercepts from that era, can provide the U.S. Navy anti-submarine experts with invaluable information on the Soviet drill; that is, on how they run their program. You can change codes, but you can't—without a whole retraining program—change standard orders of procedure. In other words, you can get invaluable insights into how Soviets think about their strategy.

To take another area, it is true that no wholesome church-going American would overtly approve of the murder of foreign dictators. On the other hand, there are some 12 million of us who—perhaps at the risk of our eternal souls—wish that somebody had set off a landmine under Adolf Hitler.

AGAIN TO ESCAPE from the level of pious abstraction, I certainly wish that the CIA, or some intelligence agency, had maintained surveillance over Lee Harvey Oswald and Sirhan Sirhan. If you could ever see (as I have) the mass of letters that flow into the White House from psychopaths, you would hardly be surprised that the Secret Service has a rather extensive file. That is, unless—in this crazy country where anybody can buy a gun—you believe there should always be open season on Presidents of the United States, candidates for President, and other leading political figures.

To say this is not to "whitewash" any agency. As I have noted here before, any covert agency needs close supervision from the elected officials. Cicero observed long ago that a key problem for any society is "who guards the guardians?" And in realistic terms that is a task at which both President and Congress have failed.

Also, such agencies have a peculiar attraction for certain personality types who belong in comic strips, not in serious intelligence work. Lenin, who never took his eye off the essentials, once ordered that the Ochrana, the Czarist secret police, be infiltrated, but added, "If anyone volunteers, expel him from the (Bolshevik) party instantly." The point was that a volunteer for such work must be inherently unstable. Unfortunately, in my judgment, the CIA and other agencies have too often ignored Lenin's insight.

Goals Unrealized:

Economic Barriers Thwart Social Progress for Blacks

The following is excerpted from an address by Vivian W. Henderson, president of Clark College, Atlanta; to the annual meeting of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

THE BLACK PERSON'S fundamental problem in 1975 and for the foreseeable future is a hard core economic class problem generated by rapid advances in technology, changes in the industrial and employment structure, escalation of occupational requirements, growing differentials in the distribution of income, and such public policy forces as increasingly regressive tax structures at local, state, and national levels.

What we have today is two faces of the same coin: improvements in education, more blacks in middle income groups, a strong and highly concentrated Negro market all on one side, and on the other side, entrenched poverty, growing rigidity in class difference, unemployment and underemployment, and increasing welfare. The great question is whether the masses of blacks will become a permanent underclass in America. This is why it is so important to recognize the role of economic class in contrast to race, per se, as critical to the problem and as a primary target in race relations strategy today.

Large proportions of blacks still have not experienced tangible benefits from civil rights gains of the '50s and '60s and expectations of the black masses in the areas of economic security, employment, and income have fallen short of fulfillment. At the very least, blacks should enjoy the same distribution as others.

Thus open school enrollment means nothing to the family or child whose life is confined to the racial ghetto. Open housing occupancy means nothing to the man whose status in the job market denies him the means with which to acquire a house in the first place. Equal job opportunity is an empty promise unless enough jobs of the right kind, at decent wages, are available for those who need them; and the best consumer program has little or no significance to the income recipient who enjoys little or no discretion in the use of his or her income, particularly under conditions of high prices, high interest rates, tight money and credit.

There are sharply focused voids and vacuums between opportunity, access, and outcome, between the few who are making it and the masses who are not. There is a sharp delineation between remedies emanating from law and a prevalence of hard core realities associated with economically and socially victimized people. These factors describe the new and profound stage in race relations—the most difficult and urgent stage—it is one facet of a very important question: Black America, What Now?

Development of a high sense of black self-respect and racial pride is highly desirable and certainly black folks ought to have their own agenda in the war on race, poverty, and economic class. But the question is, how far do good intentions in these respects go toward diverting efforts and attention from realities associated with the economic and political process and liberation of black people by way of that process?

For example, every professional organization in social and political fields and in higher education now has a black caucus and not a single black caucus can reconcile its own limited resources with pursuit of a variety of objectives which are seldom agreed upon. Another example is the situation in our central cities where the brothers have been yelping about ghetto economic development and black capitalism.

The fact is that ghetto economic development ought to occur for its own sake and because racial ghettos need economic and social development. Ghetto economic development alone cannot solve the economic problems of black folks or even make a serious dent in the problem of economic class. Likewise, blacks should be encouraged and helped to be entrepreneurs and businessmen not because of the mistaken notion that this will solve the economic problems of blacks, but because we need more blacks in business.

Blacks need blacks who know how to negotiate the system. Blacks need a substantive managerial class as part of the population profile of black people. The danger today is the preoccupation of blacks with retaliation against whites rather than getting on with the matter of generating public policy to get at the fundamental economic problems of the society and the underclass.

THE SUCCESS OF BLACKS will rely less and less on conventional wisdom regarding civil rights and, increasingly, blacks will turn their old and new organizations into collective groups and union-type movements to press demands for a better stake and benefits from the gross national product of the nation. The working poor will become better organized to get a better piece of the action. Even the professional and white collar workers in black institutions will organize.

In other words, there will be increased realization that if all racial prejudice and discrimination and all racism in America were erased today, all the ills brought by the process of economic class distinction and economic depression of the masses of black people would remain.

The answer is found in public policy where tax laws should be made more progressive and less regressive; where jobs are guaranteed and at decent wages; where there are not moratoriums on housing construction but policies to stimulate housing construction; where education and health are not secondary to defense spending, but are of first priority on the national agenda; and where full employment is a realized and continuing achievement.

As Millions Lose Coverage:

Administration Tactics Delay Health Care Plan for Jobless

DELAYING TACTICS of the Ford Administration on emergency health care for jobless workers during the current economic crisis were denounced by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman as "irresponsible and heartless."

The Administration wants to completely ignore the plight of millions of workers and their families who have been suddenly cut off from health care plans as the economy sags, layoffs spread and unemployment tops post-World War II levels, Seidman asserted. He pointed out that three of five workers who have job-related health insurance lose the protection the day they go off the payroll, and only one-fifth have coverage for three months or more after a layoff hits.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman said quick congressional action on emergency health care for the unemployed is likely, despite White House opposition. The AFL-CIO strongly favors the Kennedy bill, he said.

Seidman pointed out that the Kennedy approach to a short-term emergency program financed by a "straightaway provision for a federal appropriation" has also drawn the support of the American Medical Association and insurance groups—organizations most often at odds with the labor movement on health care issues.

Seidman acknowledged that the emergency program won't correct the serious flaws in the nation's health care system, such as lack of cost controls, quality and efficiency incentives. He stressed that it "simply mirrors what's in the existing private health insurance system," and that the long-range solution is National Health Security.

But, he declared, "you can't get the Health Security program enacted and . . . into operation overnight," while the immediate need is to "do something fast" for the millions who have been suddenly cut off from health care coverage.

THE EMPLOYMENT-UNEMPLOYMENT statistics released monthly by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics assume critical proportions during periods of economic decline. Statistics for February are a good case in point.

The unemployment rate remained at 8.2 percent. However, there was a decline of 535,000 employed workers from the previous month and 580,000 others left the labor force, many discouraged over not finding a job. A by-product of the February report was confusion and dissatisfaction with the statistics.

BLS acknowledges there are possibilities of error in the survey estimates; information-gathering is not a perfect science. It would be impossible to undertake a house-to-house survey each month so sampling is essential. And vast improvements have been made on its techniques even if improvements are still needed.

Sampling is of rather recent history. Before the 1930s, aside from attempts in some of the decennial censuses, no direct measurements were made of the number of jobless persons. However, with unemployment mounting in the Great Depression, urgency developed over the need for direct measurement. Initially, everybody got into the act—state and local governments, research groups and others.

In 1940 the Works Progress Administration (WPA) adopted a new set of classifications for the national sample survey of households. The household survey was transferred to the Bureau of the Census in 1943 and became a Monthly Report on the Labor Force.

In 1948 the survey title was changed to its present Current Population Survey. And in 1959 the responsibility for analyzing and publishing CPS labor force data was transferred to BLS, although the Census Bureau has continued to collect and tabulate the statistics.

CPS now collects each month from a probability sample of approximately 47,000 households. The sample, designed and selected by the Bureau of the Census, is comprised of 461 areas which include 924 counties and independent cities, covering some areas in every state and the District of Columbia. Each month one-fourth of the households in the sample are replaced so that no family is interviewed more than four consecutive months.

BLS said in 1973 that "the chances are 90 out of 100 that the estimate of unemployment from the sample is within 150,000 of the figure obtainable from a total census. Since monthly unemployment totals have ranged between 2.5 and 5.5 million in recent years, the possible error resulting from sampling is not large enough to distort the total unemployment picture."

Today, however, unemployment stands in excess of 7.5 million, which increases the chance of error.

A SPECIAL GROUP of 1,000 trained and experienced Census Bureau employes interviews the 47,000 households each month. They get information on jobholding, jobseeking or no-labor force activities during the preceding week of all civilian household members 16 years of age and over.

The total numbers are then "weighted" or adjusted to independent estimates (based on decennial census results). The weighting takes into account the age, sex, color and urban-rural distribution of the population so that these characteristics are reflected in the proper proportions in the final estimates.

There are sources of errors in the survey estimates, some by the interviewers and some by respondents, or by both. Responses are not obtained from 3 to 5 percent of the respondents. Also errors may be made in the independent population estimates.

Possibly of even greater concern is the fact that current reports do not adequately reflect discouraged unemployment, those who have stopped looking and are no longer considered in the labor force. And though there are some measurements of the underemployed—those working at shorter hours or below their skills—there is, in effect, no full picture of the severity of unemployment in this country.

ATTEMPTS of President Ford to stall emergency health care for jobless workers during the current economic crisis were branded "irresponsible and heartless" by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

VIETNAMESE LABOR LEADER Tran Quoc Buu's recent visit to the United States began with AFL-CIO President Meany, and proceeded at the State Dept., on Capitol Hill and with members of the press. Clockwise, from top left, Buu and Meany chat at the AFL-CIO president's office; the Vietnamese trade union leader confers with Daniel Parker, administrator of the Agency for International Development; briefing for reporters on the grave situation in Vietnam; discussions with Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Accompanying Buu was Nguyen U. C. Dat, director of CVT's international affairs department, who served as his interpreter. The AFL-CIO has cooperated with the CVT on joint programs for years, channeling assistance through the federation's Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

Vietnamese Union Leader Warns Of Communist Reign of Terror

The head of the free trade-union movement in South Vietnam, Tran Quoc Buu, warned that Communist takeover of his country would mean brutal repression of workers and their leaders.

When the North Vietnamese occupy an area, the 61-year-old president of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) told newsmen in Washington, one of the first things they do is to search out leading trade unionists. When they find them, they either jail or assassinate them.

Buu, who came to the United States to appeal for military and economic assistance for South Vietnam, reported that a Catholic CVT cadre member had been crucified by his Communist captors.

Buu spent 10 days in Washington at the AFL-CIO's invitation. While not a political supporter of the Thieu government, he appealed for aid on humanitarian grounds in behalf of the 17 million South Vietnamese who face subjugation if the North Vietnamese succeed in overrunning their country.

When Buu arrived in the United States on St. Patrick's Day, he learned of the new Communist drive in South Vietnam. North Vietnamese tanks and troops have since occupied nine of the nation's 44 provinces.

Buu founded the strongly anti-Communist CVT 25 years ago to help bring economic progress and social justice to South Vietnam and its people. Today, headquartered in Saigon, CVT has over a million members, including railroad workers, farm workers, dock workers, fishermen and transport workers.

Speaking through an interpreter, Buu detailed the plight of hundreds of thousands of South Vietnamese who have been forced to flee the northern and central provinces of the country to escape the advancing North Vietnamese troops.

"These are poor, working people," Buu declared. "We must take care of them as a labor organization."

Upon his return to Saigon, Buu will take charge of cadres of trade unionists to aid the streams of homeless refugees pouring into the south. Threatened several times with assassination in the past, Buu gives secondary consideration to his own personal safety.

During his visit in Washington, Buu conferred with AFL-CIO President George Meany, State Dept. officials, several senators and congressmen and other government leaders. As a member of a South Vietnamese parliamentary delegation, he also met with President Ford.

Buu's plea was the same wherever he went: "Give us sufficient aid to survive. Do not let us die slowly, agonizingly."

While receiving a sympathetic ear from most of the congressmen with whom he spoke, Buu told newsmen later he was "disappointed by the attitude of Congress" toward his appeal for emergency aid funds and previously authorized assistance.

Ford promised to make a "maximum effort" to persuade Congress to vote additional aid to South Vietnam, White House Press Sec. Ron Nessen said following the President's meeting with the South Vietnamese delegation. But the outlook was not very optimistic.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting expressed strong support for military and economic assistance authorized but not fully appropriated by Congress for South Vietnam. Meany told reporters during the council meeting that the South Vietnamese "should get the additional commitment in order that they can have something left to try to fight for their liberty."

Buu's meetings with top government and congressional leaders were arranged by the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs. They included discussions with Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.)

Also on Capitol Hill, Buu met with Representatives Donald M. Fraser (D-Minn.), Bella S. Abzug (D-N.Y.), John J. Flynt, Jr. (D-Ga.), and William V. Chappell, Jr. (D-Fla.)

At the State Dept., Buu talked with Daniel Parker, administrator of the Agency for International Development; Philip C. Habib, assistant secretary for East Asian and Pacific affairs, and Robert S. Ingersoll, who was acting secretary of state while Henry Kissinger was in the Middle East.

In his meeting with newsmen, Buu noted that one million people have fled to the South since the partition of Vietnam in 1954.

"They have come to us for a better way of life," he said. "This is proof these people want freedom."

Despite the worsening military situation in South Vietnam, Buu said, the morale of the people is very high and they believe "some day they will again occupy their land."

But, he warned, his 40 years' experience battling communism tells him "the Communists will never give up their scheme of controlling the world."

He declared, too, that with or without U.S. aid the South Vietnamese will never give up their struggle against the North Vietnamese Communists.

"We have no choice," he said.

Under Social Security:

Sex Bias Invalidated In Survivor Benefits

Widowers with young children are entitled to social security benefits equal to those of widows with surviving children, the Supreme Court ruled in a unanimous decision.

The ruling found a provision of the Social Security Act unconstitutional on the grounds that it discriminated against women wage earners who must pay the same payroll taxes as male workers but receive less protection for their survivors.

Section 402 (g) of the act, which was written into the law in 1939, provides benefits based on earnings of a deceased husband and father to both the wife and the couple's minor children. However, when the deceased worker covered by social security was the wife and mother, only the children received benefits. There was no provision for benefits for the surviving husband.

Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., writing for the court, said that the distinction drawn by the provision is based on an "archaic and overboard" generalization that earnings of male workers are vital to the support of their families, but that the earnings of female workers do not significantly contribute to that support.

The high court's decision could have wide ramifications on a number of suits in the lower courts challenging other provisions involving sex discrimination under the social security law.

The 8-0 decision affirmed a three-judge federal district court ruling that found Section 402 (g) in violation of constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection for men and women.

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., declared: "When the mother is a principal wage earner, the family may suffer as great an economic deprivation upon her death as would occur upon the death of a father wage earner."

The social security provision was challenged by Stephen C. Weisenfeld, whose wife died during childbirth in 1972, leaving him to provide sole care of their infant son. Mrs. Weisenfeld's earnings as a teacher were substantially higher than those of her husband, a self-employed consultant.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare granted survivors' benefits for Weisenfeld's son under Section 402 (d) of the act, but the widower was told he was not eligible for benefits because Section 402 (g) provided benefits only for women.

Weisenfeld filed a suit in New Jersey federal district court in 1973, seeking to have the provision declared unconstitutional on the ground that HEW's denial of benefits was based solely on sex. The district court panel ruled in his favor.

Justice Brennan said the high court's ruling was governed by its earlier decision, Frontiero vs. Richardson, which held that a woman in the military service is entitled to the same dependency allowance as a man.

"Section 402 (g) clearly operates, as did the statutes invalidated by our judgment in Frontiero, to deprive women of protection for their families which men receive as a result of their employment," the court said.

"Indeed, the classification here is some ways more pernicious."

The decision held that not only did Mrs. Weisenfeld fail to receive the same protection for her family as a male worker would, "but she also was deprived of a portion of her own earnings in order to contribute to the fund out of which benefits would be paid to others."

"Since the Constitution forbids the gender-based differentiation premised upon assumptions as to dependency made in the statutes before us in Frontiero, the Constitution also forbids the gender-based differentiation that results in the efforts of women workers required to pay social security taxes producing less protection for their families than is produced by the efforts of men," the court said.

The justices rejected the government's argument in the case that the law was designed to compensate women beneficiaries as a group because of the economic difficulties they face in seeking to support their families and themselves.

The court found that the provision was intended to permit women not to work, if they choose, and to devote themselves to the care of their children. It concluded, however, that the gender-based distinction of Section 402 (g) was "entirely irrational."

"It is no less important for a child to be cared for by its sole surviving parent when that parent is male rather than female," the court said.

HEW has estimated that it will cost the social security fund about $20 million annually to equalize benefits for widows and widowers with children. The fund pays out nearly $70 billion a year in benefits including Medicare payments.

Teachers Get Montana Law On Bargaining

Helena, Mont. — Gov. Thomas L. Judge signed legislation giving teachers the same collective bargaining rights that apply to other public employes under a state law that permits strikes.

The measure, sponsored by Rep. Duane Johnson, a member of the Paperworkers, narrowly passed the House but sailed easily through the state Senate.

Teachers had been specifically excluded from the Public Employees Bargaining Act adopted in 1973. The new law classifies Montana teachers with all other public employes for the purposes of collective bargaining.

The Montana Supreme Court ruled recently in a decision involving highway workers that the language of the act permitted "concerted activities" which include the right to strike.

Representatives of organized labor hailed the legislation as a major step forward for teachers in the state.

James J. McGarvey, executive director of the Montana Federation of Teachers, said the legislation does away with the old "meet-and-confer" language of the Professional Labor Relations Act "and gives us the right to bargain meaningful contracts with leverage."

James W. Murry, executive secretary of the Montana AFL-CIO, said it is obvious that the state legislature felt that teachers should have the same rights and privileges as other public employes.

Three-Part Program:

Community Services Dept., Agencies Map Aid to Jobless

A three-part program to better coordinate services for jobless workers and their families was agreed upon following a day-long meeting of 21 national public, voluntary and private agencies, sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, Director Leo Perlis reported.

The program, Perlis said, is aimed at increasing the effectiveness of local efforts to provide assistance to the unemployed. It calls for:

- National agencies to alert their local units to work with AFL-CIO Community Services personnel to set up local programs on services for the unemployed.
- The issuance of guidelines by these national agencies on how to meet the urgent needs of the unemployed, with the guidelines to be made available to local Community Services staff.
- Creation of ad hoc task forces in local areas to expedite services to the unemployed.

"While the AFL-CIO is fighting for its comprehensive legislative program to create jobs, there are unemployed workers who can't wait until the Congress and the Administration act or until economists agree; they need help now," Perlis stated.

Help for the jobless is not confined to unemployment compensation, public assistance and food stamps, Perlis emphasized. He noted that many of the unemployed are veterans and are therefore entitled to benefits under the GI Bill.

Mortgage foreclosures and debt payments are a major problem confronting the unemployed, requiring action to obtain credit extensions from retailers, banks, mortgage companies and other lenders, Perlis observed.

Health care and legal aid are often unaffordable necessities to an unemployed worker's family, and ways have to be found to obtain these services, he continued.

Perlis also pointed out two problems that are not commonly thought of as related to unemployment—Red Cross counseling for military personnel and Travelers Aid.

He explained that increasing numbers of minorities are joining the military because of increased pay brought about by the volunteer army. But with high unemployment at home, many minority service personnel are being called upon to aid their families, thus reducing their own income. As a result, there is an increased need for Red Cross counselors.

Also, many unemployed have taken to the road in search of jobs. Frequently, when they arrive at their destination there are no jobs available, and Travelers Aid must provide emergency help.

In developing programs to meet the needs of the unemployed, Perlis said, the AFL-CIO is working with some organizations whose policy on legislative matters is frequently at odds with that of the AFL-CIO—such as the American Medical Association and the Bar Association.

"We agree to disagree on those issues," he said. "but we work together to provide help to people who are in need."

Perlis said that the conference also reached a consensus on two recommendations:

- Greater utilization of public service job funds to create positions in those agencies handling claims from the unemployed. "Many of these agencies are swamped with applicants and need increased personnel to certify the applicants with the dignity they deserve as human beings." He added that agencies were urged to use union halls as certification centers.
- Establishment of one-stop centers where the unemployed would be able to obtain needed services under one roof "without having to run all over town."

Among the agencies represented at the Washington conference were:

From the federal government—the Assistance Payments Administration of HEW; Food Stamp Division of the Agriculture Dept.; Office of Loan Management of HUD; Veterans Administration, and ACTION.

From private and voluntary agencies — American Public Welfare Association, Mortgage Bankers Association, National Foundation for Consumer Credit, Council of Better Business Bureaus, Blue Cross Association, Blue Shield, ABA, Family Service Association, Red Cross, Salvation Army, Catholic Charities, Volunteers of America, United Way, Travelers Aid.

About 20 union and Community Services representatives attended.

GOVERNING BODY of Pulaski County, Ark., includes six members of the Ladies' Garment Workers who serve as justices of the peace on the county's Quorum Court. They were elected as part of a reform group demanding more responsive representation. Four of the six are, from left, Frances Barnes, Mary Day and Jean Wilson, members of ILGWU Local 589, and Art Martin, rear, manager of the union's Southern Missouri-Arkansas District Council. Two others elected to the court are Alberta Rogers of Local 589 and ILGWU organizer Steve Parrish.

Labor Studies Center Lists Schedule for April

Six trade union groups will use the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center at Silver Spring, Md., for leadership training during April. In addition, the center will sponsor an off-campus institute on job safety at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

Here is the April schedule:

Safety—The Building & Construction Trades is sponsoring two advanced institutes for officers who attended the department's first OSHA session last autumn. The first will run from 9 a.m., Monday, Mar. 31, through Friday, Apr. 11; the second from 4 p.m. Sunday, Apr. 27, through Friday, May 9.

Civil rights—A three day seminar on effective union action in civil rights is organized in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights for 40 union participants. From noon, Friday, Apr. 11, to noon, Sunday, Apr. 13.

Pensions and insurance—An institute for labor trustees of pension and insurance plans in the construction industry deals with the fiduciary responsibility, reporting and disclosure and other requirements of the new pension reform law, with pension planning and costing and with investment policies. From 4 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 13, through Friday, Apr. 17.

Railroaders—A seminar co-sponsored with the United Transportation Union for its general chairmen covers initial claim and grievance processing and presentations before public law boards, railroad economics and current legal problems. From 4 p.m. Sunday, Apr. 13, through Friday, Apr. 25.

Bricklayers—The Bricklayers will conduct a special staff conference for 40 from Thursday, Apr. 20, through Sunday, Apr. 23.

Federal employes—The American Federation of Government Employees, National Capital Area Dept., will sponsor a seminar on equal employment opportunity for local union members of the Washington area. 9:30 a.m., Saturday, Apr. 26.

The off-campus institute at Madison, Wis., is presented with the cooperation of the Wisconsin School for Workers. It trains union officers and staff in union rights and responsibilities under Occupational Safety & Health Act, including filing complaints, preparing for plant inspections, dealing with OSHA area offices. It will offer exercises in identifying noise and mechanical hazards, toxic substances and airborne contaminants. From 3 p.m., Sunday, Apr. 13, through Friday, Apr. 18, in the Wisconsin Center Building, Madison.

Further information about these and other Labor Studies Center programs is available from Executive Director Fred Hoehler, AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Institute Slated On Personnel Test Methods

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will offer union officers and staff members an opportunity to learn more about personnel testing methods and techniques in both private and public service employment.

In cooperation with the Wisconsin School for Workers, the center will sponsor a four-day institute May 4-8 at Madison, Wis. on "Testing and It's Implications for Collective Bargaining."

Participants will study the methods by which tests for hiring and promotions are constructed and validated.

Applications for enrollment in the institute may be submitted in writing to the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903, or by telephone to Ms. Rachlin at (301) 431-6400.

Canadian Labor Asks Action on Economic Ills

Ottawa—The Canadian Labor Congress has proposed a comprehensive program of government action to overcome the twin problems of unemployment and rising living costs.

Its annual "memorandum" to the federal government—a formal presentation of labor's program to Canada's Cabinet—foresaw rising "social unrest" if the nation can't solve its economic problems.

Tax cuts to increase purchasing power, a guaranteed annual income to avert poverty, and cost-of-living increases in all wages through a link in the consumer price index were among the CLC's proposals.

The CLC, however, opposed wage-price controls and argued the case for catch-up increases to compensate for past inflation and to bring about a more equitable distribution of income. It also proposed a $50 a month rise in old-age pensions.

A section of the CLC memorandum said the 17 percent jump in food prices last year and the prospects of a sharp increase this year impose "a terrible burden on low-income consumers."

The memorandum urged the reinstatement of a government subsidy that had held down the price of milk, and termed its removal last year "a callous act."

The CLC criticized the federal government for ineptness in dealing with the energy crisis and noted industry predictions of sharply increased prices despite "a profit explosion that has been nothing short of breathtaking."

It expressed opposition to "any move toward continentalism in energy use," and urged establishment of a national agency for research and development of all energy sources "including coal, nuclear power, oil, natural gas and tidal power."

The CLC reiterated its opposition to any exclusive bilateral trade agreement with the United States and said reduction of tariff barriers should be sought through multilateral trade agreements.

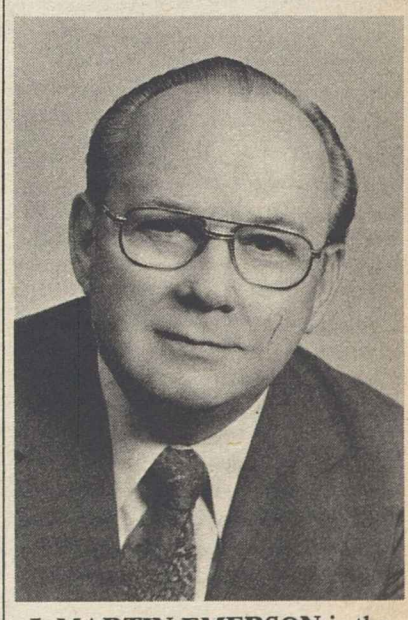
The government was urged also to move quickly toward development of a Canadian merchant marine that would be able to enter international trade "in a significant way."

In the human rights area, the CLC strongly urged that discrimination based on sex and marital status be outlawed on the same basis as race, color, and religious discrimination.

It also voiced concern over the treatment of immigrants to Canada and said "there must be no discrimination" in considering potential immigrants.

In other areas, the 1.9 million-member labor federation:

- Reiterated its support for a gradual rise in the public pension program so that benefits would equal 75 percent of earnings by the year 1996, with the opportunity to retire at age 60. The CLC said the program should be financed by a 5 percent tax on total earnings paid by workers and employers, matched by a government contribution.
- Asked a $3 an hour minimum wage, up from the present $2.20 level.
- Expressed opposition to proposed amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which governs collective bargaining in Canada's civil service.



J. MARTIN EMERSON is the new secretary-treasurer of the Musicians. He was named by the AFM executive board to succeed Stanley Ballard, who retired. Emerson has been secretary of AFM Local 161-710 in Washington since 1950.

Job Stimulus Key Goal:

rowing of the oil depletion tax loophole and other tax reform provisions.

Initially the House approved a tax cut-rebate package priced at about $20 billion, while the Senate bill's total was close to the $30 billion that Meany had urged to turn the economy around.

A House-Senate conference committee struggled to reconcile widely differing features of the two measures, while Treasury Sec. William E. Simon and other Administration officials pressed for changes that would make the final version more acceptable to the President.

In the end, as House and Senate members put off their Easter recess departures to be present for a late night vote, the conference agreement shaped up as a compromise that was generally acceptable although no group's favorite bill.

In a somewhat surprising show of strength, House Republican leaders put together a coalition with conservative Democrats that almost toppled the conference agreement.

The GOP motion to recommit the bill to the House-Senate conference committee—presumably to make it more acceptable to the President by providing less of a tax reduction—was only narrowly defeated. The vote was 214-197.

But the House then approved the legislation by a decisive 287-125 margin, with most Democrats back in the party fold.

There was no problem in the Senate, where the final passage vote was 45-16.

With the legislation cleared for presidential action, Congress then recessed until Apr. 7.

The amount of the tax refund and reduction depends both on income and family size.

Thus, for a couple with two children the biggest savings would be for a family with an adjusted gross income of $6,000. The combination of payments and reductions would total $510. At the $15,000 level, the total would be $290. It would rise to $320 at about $17,500 but drop gradually to $220 at a family income of $30,000 and higher.

For unmarried taxpayers, the savings would range from $175 at the $3,000 level to a top of $230 at the $12,500 to $20,000 level, dropping to $130 at adjusted incomes of $30,000 and above.

The lowest-income group would be helped by a "work bonus" providing for a cash payment to taxpayers with dependent children who normally would pay little or no income tax because their earnings are too low. They would receive 10 percent of earned income up to a maximum of $400 on earnings up to $4,000 a year. This would be scaled down for persons with higher incomes and be phased out at the $8,000 level.

The bill would also provide a one-time cash payment of $50 to each person receiving social security, railroad retirement and supplemental security payments.

For individuals, the bill sent to the President's desk also includes these major provisions:

- All taxpayers would receive a rebate of part of the taxes they paid on 1974 incomes with no further action required on their part.

Persons whose 1974 federal income tax was less than $100 would get the full amount of taxes rebated. Up to a middle-income range, the rebate would be 10 percent of the tax paid with a minimum of $100 and a maximum of $200. For higher income levels, the amount of the rebate drops again but all taxpayers would receive at least $100. (Persons claimed as an exemption on another tax return, such as dependent children, will not receive a refund.) In general, the $200 maximum rebate would start to drop toward the $100 minimum at a $20,000 income.

- Every taxpayer, regardless of income, would receive a $30 per person credit on 1975 taxes. Thus, a couple with three dependent children would have $150 subtracted from the tax the family would owe on income earned this year.

- Taxpayers who do not itemize their deductions would benefit through two modifications of the standard deduction. Those in the lower-income brackets would gain by an increase in the minimum standard deduction—the amount that any taxpayer can deduct from taxable income when not itemizing. This would go from the present $1,300 to $1,600 for a single person and to $1,900 for a couple.

Those with higher incomes who don't itemize deductions would be able to take a standard deduction of 16 percent of income, instead of the present 15 percent, subject to a new maximum of $2,300 for a single person—up from $2,000—and $2,600 for a couple filing a joint return.

- More families with child-care expenses because of working parents would qualify for tax deductions if they itemize their returns. Present law allows deductions of up to $4,800 a year in child-care expenses for families earning $18,000 or less. The limit on deductions is phased down as incomes go beyond that and there is no deduction for families making more than $27,000.

The new legislation would permit deductions up to a $35,000 income with a phaseout to a $44,600 cutoff.

- Persons who buy new homes, apartments or mobile homes this year will get what amounts to a Treasury-financed rebate through a tax credit equal to 5 percent of the purchase price up to a maximum rebate of $2,000. The purchase would have to be made between Mar. 13 and Dec. 31, 1975, of a house or apartment that had never been lived in, was built or under construction by Mar. 13, and had not previously been offered for sale at a lower price.

An unrelated provision added to the legislation will allow continued unemployment benefits for up to 13 more weeks to workers in certain high-unemployment states who had exhausted the 52 weeks of payments to which they were entitled under a special provision of the law triggered by serious unemployment. The extension would run out on June 30. An estimated 250,000 persons would be eligible in California, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Washington.

In the business tax area, Congress approved a rise in the investment tax credit to 10 percent (presently 7 percent for most firms and 4 percent for utilities) and allowed an extra 1 percent for firms that put that added point into a stock plan for workers. It also cut the basic corporation tax on the first $50,000 of profits.

It took a significant tax reform step by voting to end the oil depletion allowance for the biggest companies and to gradually reduce the allowance for smaller firms. At present, the first 22 percent of income from oil and gas wells is exempt from taxation.

Bills to Create Jobs Advance in Congress

brary resources programs.

Bills dealing with health insurance coverage for workers who lose their jobs advanced in both House and Senate committees.

The Senate Labor Committee approved a bill sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and backed by the AFL-CIO that would continue the health insurance coverage that unemployed workers had in their previous jobs. The program would be financed by federal funds and state unemployment insurance offices would help administer it.

A House Ways & Means subcommittee took a different approach. It endorsed the bill of its chairman, Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.). It would establish a permanent program requiring in the future that health insurance plans provided for workers must continue coverage of former employes as long as they draw unemployment benefits. To pay for coverage of workers unemployed, the bill would impose a temporary 1 percent tax on health insurance premiums.

With rare unanimity, the House Banking Committee voted 29-0 approval of a bill that would provide federal loans of up to $250 a month for two years to homeowners who lose their jobs and are in danger of having their mortgages foreclosed. The loans would have to be repaid with interest after the recipients had paid off their mortgages.

The House Democratic leadership unveiled a $5 billion emergency public works bill designed to create 250,000 jobs. House Public Works Committee Chairman Robert E. Jones (D-Ala.) said the legislation would finance $3.5 billion in public works projects previously authorized by Congress but never funded, plus $1.5 billion in new authorizations.

Hearings were scheduled for mid-April by a subcommittee headed by Rep. Robert A. Roe (D-N.J.).

'Work' Group Loses Appeal On Disclosure

The National Right to Work Committee and its fund-raising legal foundation have lost another round in their attempt to keep secret the contributors of money used to finance harassment suits against unions.

Ten unions are contending in federal court that the open-shop foundation violated a section of the Landrum-Griffin Act that prohibits an "interested employer or employer association" from financing litigation by a union member against his union.

The "work" foundation has sued unions in the names of various union members or workers, and the unions charge that this is merely a front for employer-financed attempts to weaken unions.

Last June, District Judge Charles Richey ordered the "right-to work" organization to comply with the request of the unions for a partial list of contributors.

The open shop foundation, which earlier lost a series of attempts to have the case dismissed, has now been rebuffed by a unanimous three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The appellate court refused to interfere with Judge Richey's disclosure order.

Unions that are joining in the suit are the Machinists, State, County & Municipal Employees; Teachers; Farm Workers; Television & Radio Artists; Sheet Metal Workers; Laborers; Communications Workers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Auto Workers.

1974 Profits Up 17% Despite Economic Sag

profits, the Commerce Dept. noted the full impact of the shift to the LIFO method may become clearer next month when more information is availble.

Corporate profits before taxes during the October-December period ran at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $134.1 billion, compared to $157 billion in the previous quarter. If inventory gains are removed, before-tax profits over the period rose at the annual rate of $105.6 billion, about the same as in the preceding two quarters.

3-29-75

The Commerce Dept. report noted about half of the before-tax profit declines occurred in manufacturing industries, notably among auto makers, petroleum producers, railroads, airlines and electric and gas utilities.

There were increases in bank profits and in the net inflow of investment income from abroad in the form of branch profits and dividends, the government noted.

Dividends ran at the seasonally adjusted annual rate of $33.3 billion, up $100 million from the third quarter. For the full year 1974, dividends totaled $32.7 billion, $3.1 billion more than in 1973.

Largely as a result of the changeover to the LIFO accounting technique, fourth-quarter corporate taxes fell $9.7 billion from the third quarter to the seasonally adjusted annual rate of $53 billion. For all of 1974, the profits tax liability was $56 billion, compared to $49.8 billion in 1973.

Undistributed profits—those left after paying taxes and dividends—ran at the seasonally adjusted annual rate of $47.8 billion in the fourth quarter, compared to $61.1 billion in the third quarter. For all of 1974, they totaled $52.8 billion, and compared with $43.3 billion the year before.

Compensation Rolls Exceed 6.5 Million

The number of workers drawing unemployment insurance benefits under all types of federal and state programs topped the 6.5 million mark during the week ended Mar. 8, the Labor Dept. announced.

The 6,528,700 jobless benefits recipients represented an increase of 148,000 over the previous week, and included 5,209,800 under regular state unemployment insurance programs.

During the week ended Mar. 15, a total of 537,300 initial jobless claims were filed. The total included 496,200 under state programs, the first time in 16 weeks the number of claims in this category has fallen below the half-million mark.

President's Budget 'Line' Threatens Job Programs

Court Bars Delay on Vinyl Rule

By John R. Oravec

The Supreme Court has refused further delay of a federal standard that virtually prohibits worker exposure to vinyl chloride, a cancer-causing gas widely used in the production of plastics, while it decides whether to review a manufacturers' appeal to invalidate the standard.

The Labor Dept.'s vinyl chloride rule went into effect Apr. 1, requiring the plastics industry to lower the concentration of vinyl chloride in work areas to less than 1 part per 1 million parts air (1 ppm) for an eight-hour period.

Under the standard issued by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration last October, manufacturers would have had to reduce the exposure level from 50 ppm on Jan. 1.

The Society of the Plastics Industry, Inc., and several vinyl chloride manufacturers attempted to overturn the standard in a suit brought before the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. The court upheld the standard, but delayed the effective date for three months.

In appealing to the high court, the industry group and Firestone Plastics Co. sought not only to overturn the standard, but also to stay the new Apr. 1 effective date.

The AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. intervened on the side of the Labor Dept. in the appeals court and Supreme Court cases. Briefs filed by labor pointed out that the reduced exposure level is technically and economically feasible.

Unions maintained that the industry had more than enough time to gear up for the improved working standard and that there should be no further delay beyond the Apr. 1 effective date.

OSHA had determined that vinyl chloride was a carcinogen following Labor Dept. hearings which brought out extensive evidence linking cancer of the liver and other vital organs to exposure to the chemical. Thirteen deaths among workers in manufacturing and fabricating plants have been attributed to their exposure to vinyl chloride.

At the time of the hearings, the government permitted an exposure level in workplaces of 500 ppm. That level was reduced to 50 ppm as an emergency temporary standard last April.

A number of vinyl chloride manufacturers had voluntarily lowered the concentration of the gas to less than 10 ppm even before the temporary standard was imposed because of the mounting medical

Aid Claims Continue at High Pace

Record numbers of workers continued on the unemployment insurance rolls as the Labor Dept. readied a new monthly report on the nation's employment picture.

The March report, scheduled for release the day after the AFL-CIO News went to press, was expected to be at least at the 8.2 percent jobless rate posted in January and February, and possibly higher.

During the week ended Mar. 15, a total of 6,540,100 persons received jobless benefits under state or federal unemployment insurance programs, the Labor Dept. reported. That was an increase of 3,400 over the previous week.

Of the total, 5,158,800 drew benefits under regular state unemployment insurance programs. The jobless rate for those covered by such programs was 7.8 percent.

Meanwhile, an additional half million more workers applied for jobless benefits for the first time under state insurance programs in the week ended Mar. 22. Thirty-nine thousand other initial claims were filed under federal programs.

While there was evidence of slight improvement in some sectors of the economy, the hoped-for turnaround in the nation's longest and deepest slump since the 1930s was nowhere in sight.

Housing remained in a depression. Machine-tool orders slumped to their lowest level in nearly four years. And worker layoffs continued apace.

On the plus side was the first up-

LABOR'S ACTION PROGRAM to put America back to work was pressed by nearly 2,000 union members in front of the Los Angeles City Hall. Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary-treasurer of the sponsoring Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, addresses the gathering. Alongside him is John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO. Behind them are Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley and State AFL-CIO President Albin J. Gruhn. (Story, Page 3.)

At Trade Hearings:

Labor Fights Move For New Tariff Cuts

Further relaxation of tariffs on imports will have a devastating impact on jobs in America which already has the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized nation, labor representatives warned at Trade Commission hearings being conducted around the nation.

Low-wage imports that wipe out American jobs were described as not in the best interest of consumers, particularly when unfair competition from abroad further weakens the nation's shaky economy.

The hearings, which opened in Washington in February, went on the road last month and will continue through most of April. The International Trade Commission, successor to the U.S. Tariff Commission, is holding the hearings to determine the impact of tariff reductions that the President can make under the 1974 Trade Act.

In Portland, Ore., President Dean Killion of the Oregon AFL-CIO told the commissioners that the flood of foreign imports is directly related to the loss of jobs in the nation and in that state.

Killion noted that imported clothing, television sets, stereo equipment, tools, typewriters and autos are in direct competition with products made by American workers.

And, he stressed, that does not mean the foreign-made goods are necessarily cheaper to the benefit of consumers. Instead, the benefits go to multinational corporations in the form of increased profits, he charged.

"As America becomes increasingly dependent on products from abroad, we become more subject to economic and political pressures from those countries," Killion warned. "This is an unhealthy development."

In San Francisco, Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California AFL-CIO said that many

Stage Set For Clash On Funds

By David L. Perlman

The budget line that President Ford drew before a national television audience foreshadows a series of confrontations with Congress over measures to create jobs for millions of unemployed Americans and establish national priorities.

Ford signed the tax cut and rebate bill into law, but only after complaining that it was too big and gave too large a share of tax savings to lower-income families.

Nevertheless, he said, the urgent need for an economic stimulus outweighed the slim chance that a presidential veto might induce Congress to rewrite the bill to his liking.

The President made clear that he conceives of the tax cut as a substitute for job-creating government expenditures. By contrast, the AFL-CIO views it as an important part of the massive effort needed to turn the economy around. Other needed ingredients include public works construction, increased public service employment, housing stimulus, summer jobs for youth and permanently strengthened unemployment compensation programs.

Congress has already rejected most of Ford's proposals to rescind appropriations previously voted, and a combination of court decisions and congressional actions has obligated the Administration to release a large part of the funds it

Drop Posted In Wholesale Price Index

Further drops in agriculture-related prices helped lower the government's wholesale price index six-tenths of 1 percent in March, but prices still remained 12.5 percent higher than a year earlier, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Farm product prices were down 2 percent for the month while prices of processed foods and feeds declined 2.9 percent. The figures are adjusted for seasonal variations in prices.

Prices of industrial commodities rose two-tenths of 1 percent over the month, a smaller increase than the five-tenths of 1 percent rise in each of the two preceding months.

The drop in the overall index was the fourth consecutive monthly decline. The last time wholesale

Meany Scores Health Plan Rules As Undercutting Bargaining Role

The AFL-CIO has objected to proposed federal regulations that would require an employer to bypass a union and offer his workers a health care plan the union has rejected.

Federation President George Meany expressed "strong objections" to regulations drafted by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to implement a law passed by Congress in 1973 encouraging the establishment of prepaid group health programs. The law refers to these groups as health maintenance organizations, or HMOs.

One of its provisions requires an employer who pays for part or all of the cost of a conventional form of hospitalization or medical insurance to offer to put the same amount of money into a health maintenance organization plan, if there is an HMO serving the community.

Meany noted the AFL-CIO's longstanding support of the dual choice option and its inclusion in many collective bargaining agreements—always at the urging of the union, he noted. "In fact," he added, "I know of no instance where a dual choice clause has been included in a contract on the initiative of the employer."

Labor's concern, Meany stressed, is that the proposed regulations "would require the employer to offer an HMO option to his employes even if the union, acting on behalf of its members, has rejected such an offer."

He said this would be contrary to the principles of the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act, "the two major laws governing industrial relations." Meany termed the proposed regulations "diametrically in conflict with these laws."

The formal statement submitted by the AFL-CIO noted that labor has sponsored and supported "consumer-oriented HMOs," but added that there are also some bad HMOs,

MINORITY RECRUITMENT program sponsored by the Fire Fighters resulted in more than 700 hirings nationwide and 1,800 applicants from minority groups added to civil service rolls. The record of the Houston program was the best in the nation, and President W. Howard McClennan extends his congratulations at a banquet. The program helps recruit applicants, then assists them in preparing for the fire fighter examinations.

Fire Fighter Program Spurs Minority Hiring

Houston—A Fire Fighters' program for recruitment and training among minority groups has led to the hiring of more than 725 blacks and Spanish-surnamed fire fighters throughout the country, it was announced here by Roscoe Hamby Jr., the program's director.

The IAFF program, funded by the Labor Dept., has also placed an additional 1,800 minority group members on civil service rosters.

A report on the progress of the IAFF Labor Recruitment Program was given at an awards dinner here at which the City of Houston was cited for adding 64 minority group members to its fire department in 1974.

The city also drew praise for its affirmative position in support of the minority hiring program, a policy Mayor Fred Hofheinz said would be continued throughout his administration.

The Labor Recruitment Program operates in local communities at the invitation of IAFF local affiliates, with the cooperation of city administrations, civil service commissions and local community groups.

The program not only recruits applicants, but helps them prepare for and pass the written, oral and physical fitness examinations which determine eligibility for hiring in most cities.

This year the program has operated in Milwaukee and Madison, Wis.; Minneapolis and St. Paul, Minn.; Houston; Tucson, Ariz.; Louisville, Ky.; Los Angeles, Seattle, New Orleans, and Miami.

IAFF President W. Howard McClennan, who was principal speaker at the dinner, recalled that a few years ago, after fire fighters had been "harassed" in the inner cities of many metropolitan areas, many had come to the conclusion that too large a number of ghetto residents looked upon the fire service as a hostile outside force—despite its life-saving and property-saving functions.

McClennan said lengthy consideration of the problem led to two conclusions:

- "We couldn't lower the standards of the fire service. If we did, we'd endanger life and property, lower our own morale and lose the respect of the community.
- "There are lots of strong, capable, intelligent members of the minority population who have the potential for making great fire fighters. If we can find them, work out some training programs among them, then they can compete fair and square for jobs in the fire service."

The result, McClennan said, was development of the Fire Fighters Labor Recruitment Program.

Program Director Hamby observed that the group of new fire fighters in Houston "represents a magnificent proof of what can be achieved through cooperative community and individual effort."

Airline Clerks Score Gains At Northwest

St. Paul, Minn.—A new 18-month agreement providing substantial wage increases and other improvements for nearly 3,000 Northwest Airlines employes was overwhelmingly approved by the Railway & Airline Clerks.

BRAC Northwest Chairman Allen W. McCauley said the agreement—approved by 87 percent of the workers voting—would boost wages an average of 13.5 percent. The pact is retroactive to Jan. 1 and will expire on June 30, 1976.

Covered by the contract are clerical, office, fleet and passenger-service workers at some 35 Northwest facilities across the United States.

Besides wage increases, the workers will receive improved medical and dental coverage, increased pension benefits, a 10th paid holiday, and an improved vacation schedule.

Also, contract language covering seniority and job bidding procedures was changed to eliminate any possibility of sex discrimination.

CONVENTIONS

The Arizona State AFL-CIO's 1975 convention will be held May 7-9 in Tucson.

The Connecticut AFL-CIO convention is scheduled for Sept. 10-12, in Hartford.

The Kansas AFL-CIO convention will be held Oct. 1-3 in Topeka.

The Oklahoma AFL-CIO convention will be held Nov. 19-21 in Tulsa.

William Collins Dies, Pioneer In Organizing

Maplewood, N.J.—Veteran labor organizer William Collins, who assisted many AFL and CIO unions in their early development, died here Mar. 29. He was 93.

Collins, as a member of the Amalgamated Transit Union since 1907, served as a "volunteer" organizer before joining the staff of the AFL in 1914 on the urging of Samuel Gompers.

He also worked closely with a number of other early labor leaders, including John L. Lewis, William Green and Philip Murray. After his long service with the AFL and later the AFL-CIO, Collins retired in 1958 as regional director in the New York and New Jersey region.

In a message to his son, William, AFL-CIO President George Meany expressed his condolences. "Bill was my good friend for a great many years," Meany said. "He was a fine gentleman who made significant and lasting contributions to the labor movement and all his friends will sorely miss him."

In addition to his son, survivors include three grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. A Requiem Mass was said at St. Thomas the Apostle church in Bloomfield, N.J., Apr. 1. Burial was at Upper Montclair, N.J.

Seek National Merger:

N.Y. State Teachers Affirm Tie to Labor

New York—Teachers and other public employes cannot stand apart from the American labor movement because "our jobs depend upon the prosperity of other people and their jobs," President Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers told the annual representative assembly of the New York State United Teachers.

Nearly 2,000 delegates represented the 215,000 members of the state teachers' organization, which is affiliated with both the AFT and the National Education Association.

"When other people are not working they are not paying taxes and their taxes are our salaries," Shanker added as he called on the assembly to fight for a program which "will help us restore the economy and which will do for children in this country something we should have been doing all along."

Shanker outlined a five-point program aimed at restoring full employment and revitalizing the nation's economy:

- Establishment of a federal bank to provide localities with an alternative to private banks charging "outrageously high" interest rates.
- Creation of a million new public service jobs to end the layoff-unemployment insurance-welfare "merry-go-round" afflicting the temporary stop-gap public employment measures now in effect.
- A doubling of revenue-sharing funds from $5 to $6 billion to $12 billion "with a guarantee that a certain proportion of that money go to education."
- Assumption by the federal government of the increased welfare costs caused by the economic crisis.
- Immediate release of impounded funds needed in education, public works and other national programs.

"Before we have detente with other countries," Shanker said, "we ought to have detente with our own school systems and with our own state and local governments." Most-favored nation treatment for the Soviet Union means that the United States is lending the Russians money at 6 percent, he observed, a practice that the government has not followed for domestic needs since the depression.

Shanker also urged support of the national "Educare" program put forward by the AFT calling for a massive public commitment to early childhood education, extended continuing education to provide "lifelong learning opportunities" for adults and comprehensive public funding for higher education.

The NYSUT delegates demonstrated overwhelming support during the convention of the state union's efforts on behalf of a national merger of teachers.

The New York organization, headed by President Thomas Hobart, is the only statewide teachers' organization that maintains affiliation with both the AFT and the National Education Association. The New Yorkers reaffirmed their intention to continue pressing for a single teachers' union with labor movement ties. NEA President James Harris, who also addressed the convention, agreed to begin talks in an effort to reduce conflicts between the state union and the NEA.

In other assembly action, the delegates heard from New York Gov. Hugh Carey, who announced the appointment of AFT Vice President Sandra Feldman as New York commissioner on the Education Commission of the states.

The delegates adopted resolutions calling for the right to strike for public employes, demanding increases in state and federal support for public education and supporting labor activities on behalf of women's rights.

Chicago Unionists Cited for Heroism

Chicago—Two building trades craftsmen who rescued two elderly persons from a burning building were honored for their heroic efforts by a labor-management association here.

John Pasdo of Operating Engineers Local 150 and Neil Beasley of Laborers Local 2, employes of the Chicago Dept. of Water & Sewers, were working at a construction site when a building exploded into flame. They rushed into the burning building to help evacuate two persons. A third person died in the blaze.

Pasdo and Beasley were given savings bonds and plaques by the joint safety committee of the Chicago Building Trades Council and the Building Construction Employers' Association.

Union Witnesses Testify:

New Round of Tariff Slashes Seen Destroying More Jobs

American industrialists are bending U.S. trade policies to serve their own interest and to the detriment of American workers.

He said the past anti-Communist crusades of American business constitute one of the most hypocritical chapters of U.S. history.

Focusing on the unemployment problems of California, where more than a million workers are jobless, Henning cited the direct loss of jobs resulting from expanded imports.

He noted that cars used by the Bay Area Rapid Transit system are being built by a company with plants in both California and Mexico. But as production is shifted across the border by the Rohr company, so are the jobs.

"Since last November over 800 Rohr people have lost their jobs in California, while in Mexico there has been an increase of nearly 500 jobs working on these BART cars," Henning pointed out.

He said the sub-assembly of the BART cars is done at three plants in Mexicali and two plants in Tijuana, where the top wage is 85 cents an hour, compared with the average wage of $5 an hour in the California plants.

A further report on the twin-plant concept employed by U.S.-based multinational corporations was presented by Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock of the Arizona AFL-CIO.

Testifying before the commission at Phoenix, Ariz., Aycock described how Motorola Corp. laid off 4,000 workers in the Phoenix area while hiring 3,735 in Sonora, Mexico, at wages six times lower than on the American side of the border.

"This all adds up to profits for management and the shipping out of America—American jobs," Aycock declared.

A "non-profit" business group in Tucson, the Development Authority for Tucson's Expansion, has been promoting the twinplant concept for manufacturers, Aycock noted. He presented a 1968 publication issued by the group that hailed the benefits of cheap wages across the border in Mexico titled "Inexhaustible Labor Supply—30 cents an Hour."

At hearings in Minneapolis, the commission was told that the Minnesota AFL-CIO does not attribute its rising unemployment rate solely to imports, but that many job cutbacks in the state have been directly related to the export of U.S. production.

Ronald G. Cohen, research and public relations director of the state federation, noted that Minnesota lost jobs in the auto, apparel, confectionery and shoe industries while imports of these products into the United States were rising sharply.

"Certainly tariff levels are not the cure-all for the problem which can be seen where high tariffs on textiles have not checked imports," Cohen said, "but further tariff cuts by the United States will only give further incentive to manufacturers to produce in other countries."

Henning warned the commission that further tariff reductions in California, could push the nation to the edge of economic and social disaster.

Rather, he stressed, the President should use his authority under the trade act to curb imports that are adversely affecting employment and contributing to the huge balance of payments deficit.

He called on President Ford to impose import restrictions against countries whose trade policies have placed unfair burdens on American commerce. He suggested that countervailing duty and anti-dumping provisions, although weakened by the trade law, should be vigorously enforced to meet unfair foreign competition.

Henning also urged that Congress use its new oversight authority to carefully examine all trade agreements and refuse to ratify any that would adversely affect domestic employment and U.S. production.

Additional hearings were scheduled in April in New York, Boston, Chicago, Washington, Cleveland, Denver, Omaha and Kansas City.

Labor Presses Action Programs To Revive State, Local Economies

State and local AFL-CIO councils continued to press for programs to put America back to work and to ease the hardships of the nation's 7.5 million unemployed.

In Massachusetts, Montana and Oregon, statewide union gatherings tackled the problems of double-digit unemployment and heard governors and other public officials pledge cooperation with labor's program.

At Los Angeles, nearly 2,000 union members assembled in front of City Hall in a local followup to an earlier State AFL-CIO rally in Sacramento.

Montana has a 12.3 percent unemployment rate, and each local union in the state had been asked to send a representative to an Emergency Conference on the Montana Economy called by the State AFL-CIO.

The focus, Executive Sec. James W. Murry said, was on measures to relieve "the despair and frustration of the unemployed worker."

State and federal officials including Gov. Thomas L. Judge discussed unemployment insurance and the assortment of manpower and public service employment programs available.

The conference, also addressed by AFL-CIO regional and COPE directors, pressed for final action by the legislature on a bill that would raise the unemployment benefit ceiling from the present 50 percent of the average state wage to 60 percent. It has passed the House and received preliminary approval by the state Senate.

Reports on unemployment in various sections of the state pointed up the ripple effects of joblessness. Thus, heavy unemployment in the timber and logging industries has been a byproduct of the construction slump.

In Boston, nearly 700 trade unionists from across the state attended the Put America Back to Work gathering of the Massachusetts State AFL-CIO.

Gov. Michael Dukakis and other state officials reported on long- and short-range plans to bring down a statewide 10.5 percent jobless rate.

The governor promised that the state will undertake $545 million worth of construction jobs during the next three to six months to create 20,000 jobs.

State AFL-CIO President Joseph A. Sullivan outlined labor's national program for jobs and the gathering voted its unanimous endorsement.

At Los Angeles, Mayor Tom Bradley was on hand to welcome nearly 2.000 union members—including hundreds of construction workers who had come from a City Council hearing on a zoning issue.

Sigmund Arywitz, speaking for the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, called on Congress to follow its tax cut with a curb on multinational corporations, development of energy resources aimed at self-sufficiency, an excess profits tax and a rollback of interest rates.

Bradley and other speakers pressed the Ford Administration for prompt release of all impounded funds that Congress had appropriated to build roads and public works.

Speakers included AFL-CIO state and regional officials and representatives of various unions, including the Auto Workers.

The "Put Oregon Back to Work" emergency conference called by the Oregon State AFL-CIO pressed for approval by the legislature of a large-scale highway building and maintenance program to create jobs.

Oregon has an 11.9 percent unemployment rate and State AFL-CIO President Dean Killion termed the economic crisis the worst since the Great Depression.

Gov. Robert Straub pledged support for labor's state program and endorsed the national goals.

The 250 participants at the Salem meeting adopted a comprehensive resolution dealing with taxes, multinational corporations, national health insurance, interest rates, housing and other national issues. It covered also state issues such as support for construction of a proposed aluminum plant, construction of oil refineries and nuclear power plants, expansion of port facilities, aid to small farmers and commercial fishermen and a rise in unemployment insurance protection.

Consumer Drive Hits Pricing Plan

The Consumer Federation of America, backed by the AFL-CIO, has launched a campaign to prevent supermarkets from removing prices from consumer products.

In a pamphlet titled "A New Supermarket Ripoff: Packages Without Prices," CFA charges elimination of price marking will mean lost jobs for supermarket employes. At the same time, the consumer group pointed out, comparison shopping will be rendered virtually impossible.

AFL-CIO President George Meany, in a letter to all affiliated unions, state and local central bodies, noted the issue directly affects workers and consumers and called for support of CFA in the fight to maintain price marking.

R-T-W Attack Shifts To Public Sector Unions

The National Right to Work Committee has opened a campaign against full collective bargaining rights for government workers with an attack on the integrity of most of the members of the House Education & Labor Committee.

Reed Larson, executive vice president of the open-shop organizations, held a news conference to argue that it would be a conflict of interest for members of Congress who had received campaign contributions from unions to consider legislation affecting unions.

He handed out a list drawn from public records showing that 33 of 39 members of the House committee had received contributions from one or more union political funds.

The contributions were legal, Larson acknowledged, but he insisted that there is "no way" congressmen who have had labor support could "objectively" deal with legislation affecting unions.

He didn't carry the point further, but since a majority of members of Congress had support from some union group the logic of the argument would apparently bar Congress from considering any labor legislation.

The "right-to-work" organization, whose own finances come largely from employers, singled out for attack a bill by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) that would extend the National Labor Relations Act—which governs labor-management relations in the private sector—to public employes.

America's basic labor law would be a bit hard to recognize from Larson's description.

Thompson's bill, he declared, "would subject the nation's 11.5 million state, county and local government workers to the provisions of the compulsory unionism-promoting National Labor Relations Act, which specifically authorizes agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment."

Larson also said that the vast majority of Americans oppose what the open-shop group calls "compulsory unionism in government."

He cited statistics from a poll which he acknowledged had been ordered and paid for by the Right to Work Committee.

AFL-CIO Asks Voting Rights Act Extension

The Voting Rights Act has proved an "important and effective piece of legislation" and "must not be permitted to lapse," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

Biemiller urged extension of the law, first passed in 1965 and renewed in 1970, in a letter to Rep. Don Edward (D-Calif.), chairman of a House Judiciary subcommittee.

Edwards's Subcommittee on Civil & Constitutional Rights will be considering various proposals to broaden the scope of the law. Biemiller said the right to vote should be affirmed for "all elements of the population that need protection." But "above all," he stressed, "the important thing is to make sure that the Act continues in effect."

Unless Congress extends it, the law will expire in August. Biemiller urged the subcommittee to approve "strong and effective legislation" extending it.

Metropolitan Insurance Pact Covers 7,500

The Insurance Workers reached tentative agreement with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. on a new three-year contract covering some 7,500 district agents and sales representatives.

The agreement was reached Mar. 31, the expiration date of the old contract.

IWIU President William A. Gillen said details of the pact would not be released until members have voted on ratification. He noted, however, that the contract has a clause providing for reopening on wages in the second-year.

Ratification meetings are scheduled for Apr. 18. Union negotiators have recommended acceptance, Gillen said.

The bargaining marked the first time the union has negotiated simultaneously for both district agents and sales representatives at Metropolitan. Most of those covered by the new agreement, 6,500 of them, are employed as agents.

The union is preparing for negotiations with two other major insurance firms this year. A contract covering 6,500 salesmen at John Hancock expires in June. Another covering 20,000 salesmen at Prudential expires in September.

America's Goals

AMERICA WILL BE strong only if its people believe there is a need to be strong. We will defend ourselves and our allies only so long as we believe we have something worth defending—and only so long as we believe there are real threats, real enemies of what is worth defending.

Despite the pro-Arab propaganda of the oil companies, most Americans believe that in the State of Israel there is something worth defending—there is something that must survive. The AFL-CIO has over and over again spelled out the deep roots of American labor's commitment to Israel.

But America cannot be strong just for Israel. We cannot operate on a theory of Israeli exceptionalism.

We cannot say America should not be the policeman of the world—except for Israel.

We cannot say America must cut back on defense spending—except when it comes to defending Israel.

We cannot say America must cut off aid to small countries struggling against Communist aggression—except for Israel.

Only a strong America can defend Israel against strong adversaries—and make no mistake about it: Israel's chief adversary today is the Soviet Union, which our policies have put on the brink of achieving a long sought goal: military superiority over the United States.

DOES ANYONE really expect the American people to shrug off the loss of Cambodia, South Vietnam, Portugal—to name a few of the horrible prospects now before us—but then stand up tall and strong in the defense of Israel?

In this sense, every defeat suffered by the United States is a defeat for Israel. Every retreat by the United States in the face of Communist advances undermines the security of Israel. This is a matter, not of preference, but of simple fact.

The security and the future of Israel depends not merely on America's steadfastness in the Middle East but on the maintenance of an international order—a balance of power, if you will—in which there is no reasonable doubt as to America's purposes, commitments, and resolve.

The task of constructing and sustaining such an international order begins at home. We must know what we're about in the world. We must have goals and purposes that are not only clear but worthy of support—and worthy, if need be, of sacrifice.

Profiteering in detente dollars is not, for us in the labor movement, a goal worthy of this nation's best traditions. The defense of freedom, the extension of democracy, the safeguarding of individual liberties, the uplifting of the world's poor and disadvantaged—these seem to us the appropriate goals for a nation like the United States of America.

As it happens, these are also the goals of the American labor movement—at home and abroad.

—From an address by AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward, chairman of the federation's Committee on International Affairs.

A Word Edgewise:

Egypt's 'Munich' Scenario Sets Up Israel for Whipsaw

By John P. Roche

EGYPTIAN PRESIDENT Anwar El-Sadat has bagged Henry Kissinger again. Sadat got the secretary to act as his intermediary in selling Israel the George Washington Bridge. The Israelis, not wanting to seem like spoilers, agreed to take an option on one tower, but Sadat said "all or nothing."

Kissinger labored mightily with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, even pulling out a stern message from President Ford, but Rabin could only participate in the charade up to a certain point. Giving up an oil field and two key Sinai passes in return for nothing was just too much—even if it did hinder Secretary Kissinger's quest for an oak-leaf cluster on his Nobel Peace Prize. So now Kissinger is back in Washington and sources close to his thinking are denouncing Israeli intransigence.

It was a pretty little set-up Sadat mounted. Although I am aware that in this age of detente no one is supposed to have the bad taste to talk about Munich, the Egyptian president is a long-time admirer of the late Adolf Hitler. (In his record is a highly laudatory statement about the Nazi dictator.) And if ever there was a Munich scenario, this was it. For the benefit of readers born since 1930, Hitler's technique at Munich was to promise that Germany would not invade Czechoslovakia if Prague would turn over its key frontier defenses in the Sudetenland. When the Czechs objected that this was a one-sided bargain, the British and French got furious at them for their unwillingness to accept Herr Hitler's word of honor.

Finally, under the pressure of "world opinion"—did Czechoslovakia want to be responsible for starting a war?—Prague gave way, the Wehrmacht took over the immensely powerful border line and subsequently gobbled up the rest of the country. After British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain and French Premier Edward Daladier signed the Munich agreement, dismembering Czechoslovakia, Hitler retired with his friends and allegedly did a little dance.

Well, Sadat isn't dancing, but only because the Israelis—who have their own special reasons to remember Munich—refused to go along with Kissinger and be good little Czechs. There is every reason to believe that Sadat, who is anything but a fool, anticipated this reaction and promptly moved to his fall-back position. Our old friend, the Cairo paper "Raz al-Yusef," had indeed printed an interview with the president before the breakdown of Kissinger's mission in which Sadat said he was not interested in reaching a military disengagement with Jerusalem, that after all "Israel (was) in a corner. Right is on our side . . . We have the upper hand." Unfortunately—as was the case with Hitler in 1938—nobody seems to believe that Sadat means what he says. Or else "senior officials traveling with Kissinger" do not read the Cairo press.

The fall-back position was formulated neatly by Egyptian Foreign Minister Ismail Fahmy in his final press conference: "We hope the Americans have learned a lesson and will not allow themselves to be the prisoners of Israeli actions in the future." The initial reaction in Washington on Kissinger's return must have encouraged these experts in political warfare: the "unofficial" word was that only Israeli stubbornness (their refusal to accept Sadat's word of honor?) blocked the dawn of a new era of milk and honey.

WHAT CAN WE next anticipate? First, a massive Administration-sponsored campaign to badmouth Israel. In stark terms, this will amount to putting a thumb on the jugular: threatening to cut off the supplies Israel badly needs. Then, when the Geneva Conference reconvenes, we will be subjected to a rerun of the old "recognize the Viet Cong" scenario.

In this instance, of course, the Viet Cong will be the Palestine Liberation Organization. One way or another, as was stated at the Rabat Conference, the Arabs will smuggle the PLO into the Geneva discussions (the Soviet Union, co-chairman of the conference, has already set this out as essential.)

Israel will then be whipsawed. If she boycotts the conference on the quite legitimate ground that the PLO is an Arab-Soviet front dedicated to her destruction, Israel will be accused of imperialist war-mongering. If Israel goes, it will be construed as de facto recognition of the legitimacy of the PLO. A neat trap . . . Sadat's next present to his "friend" Henry.

How to Buy:

Banning of 'Fair Trade' Laws Could Ease Consumer Woes

By Sidney Margolius

YOU MAY BE ABLE to buy many goods, from toiletries to electrical appliances, at lower prices if a growing effort to repeal present state price-fixing is successful.

Often the prices you must pay for many brand-name products may be higher than some retailer wants to charge because of the so-called "fair trade" laws operating in most states.

These laws, which more properly should be called "unfair trade," permit manufacturers to dictate to stores the prices at which goods may be sold even when the stores are able and willing to sell for less. Ordinarily such price-fixing is illegal. But a special federal law passed in 1937 made it legal for states to enact laws permitting manufacturers to fix prices on their products. Most states did, and the cost in higher prices to consumers even some years ago was estimated by Prof. Stewart Lee of Geneva College as more than a billion dollars a year.

Three-fourths of the states now have fair trade laws of varying degrees of severity. This number includes the most populous states, such as California, New York, Illinois, Ohio, Minnesota, Maryland, Michigan, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Oregon, Connecticut, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Kentucky.

As one of many examples of how competition reduces prices in areas without fair trade laws, Bayer aspirin sells for 99 cents in the District of Columbia, which has no fair trade law, and $1.48 in Maryland which does, Sen. Edward Brooke of Massachusetts points out. Brooke is chief sponsor of a bill to repeal the federal law enabling state fair trade laws.

In another example, a well-known make of refrigerator was fair-traded at $399 in a fair-trade state some years ago but had a "suggested list price" of only $370 in non-fair trade states.

Last spring, when one manufacturer removed its light bulbs from fair-trade fixed prices, an Eastern supermarket chain that had been selling four-packs for $1.30 to $1.40 reduced them to 99 cents.

Strong support has developed for the proposed repealer with, for the first time, very little support for fair trade even among congressmen who used to back it. Federal Trade Commission Chairman Lewis Engman has urged repeal of the fair trade laws, calling them "little more than anti-competitive price fixing."

As well as raising prices, Engman has said, "the fair trade laws protect inefficient retailers and tend to discourage new technology."

Among products often price-fixed under fair trade laws are drugs and toiletries, household appliances, housewares, auto parts and accessories, clothing, watches and sports equipment.

After almost 40 years of effort by labor unions and consumer groups, finally getting rid of the fair trade laws would be especially helpful in fighting inflation and stimulating employment. The success of the recent car-rebates in reducing some of the backlog of unsold cars shows how lower prices can benefit both consumers and wage-earners.

BRAND-NAME MANUFACTURERS mainly have argued that price-cutting of goods would eventually lead to lower quality. The fallacy in this argument is that at times leading manufacturers such as Sunbeam and General Electric have marketed similar appliances under two different brand names; with one brand price-fixed at a higher price and another non-fair traded and allowed to sell at lower prices.

Thus, unwary shoppers would pay several dollars more for an iron under one name than for a similar iron under another name.

Not only do fair trade laws prevent retail price cutting, they also tend to reduce price competition among manufacturers, Engman points out.

Pending elimination of fair trade, if the present effort finally should be successful, don't assume that a "fair trade" or "list price" actually is the real value of the item. A "list price" often is merely an artificial price established by the manufacturer to permit an inflated markup by the highest-cost retailers.

Shop on the basis of specifications and quality, and don't depend on the illusion that a high price necessarily means you get what you pay for.

Problems Exaggerated:

Balanced Social Security Fund Linked to Economic Rebound

RECENT ATTACKS on the soundness of the social security system have exaggerated the problems of the nation's basic retirement program, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said.

Although social security benefit payouts are running ahead of the system's income during this period of inflation, recession and unemployment, Seidman said that situation will improve with an economic turnaround.

He suggested that the short-term financial problem can best be met by a gradual increase of the taxable wage base to $28,000, which would restore the "ratio to total wages that existed when the program first started in the middle 1930s."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman took sharp issue with the Social Security Advisory Council's recommendation that all income from social security payroll taxes be applied to cash payments to retirees, disabled workers and survivors, and that Medicare be financed entirely by general federal revenue.

"Medicare is a program where people get health services as a matter of right," he declared. "We want to keep it that way," he added, stressing that if it is financed entirely by the federal government, Congress will probably insist that Medicare eligibility be keyed to a means test to establish need. He said the AFL-CIO strongly favors continuation of the contributory nature of Medicare, and eligibility as a matter of right.

Seidman said that predictions, based on a low birth rate over the years immediately ahead, that the number of social security retirees will outstrip the number of active workers contributing to the system are not likely to stand up.

"If we are able to maintain a healthy economy, we will have a demand for labor" and an expanding workforce, he said. He also pointed out that with improved health care for the elderly and elimination of some of the diseases that "strike them down," a greater number will want to keep working beyond the normal retirement age.

The most valid long-range forecast on the retiree-workforce ratio, he said, is a "situation much closer to what we have today."

Seidman was questioned by Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

CHAIRMAN ARTHUR BURNS of the Federal Reserve Board not long ago appeared before the Joint House-Senate Economic Committee, an event that had all the advance billing of a shoot-out at high noon.

For days prior to Burns's appearance, members of the committee proclaimed their intent to let the chairman know, in no uncertain terms, that the Fed must loosen its tight reign on the money supply and take steps to help the staggering economy.

As the appearance turned out, lawmakers questioned him intently but always in deference to his mastery of economics. Burns, who is said to be extremely proud of himself as an educator, puffed on his ever-present pipe and lectured the committee with great patience.

The shoot-out was creampuffs at 20 paces.

Yet something did emerge from the hearing. Senators Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), committee chairman, and William Proxmire (D-Wis.) announced the introduction of a "sense of Congress" resolution declaring that the Federal Reserve should pursue policies in the first half of 1975 to encourage lower long-term interest rates and expansion of credit "appropriate to facilitating prompt economic recovery."

The resolution, which recently was approved by both the House and Senate, instructs the Fed and Burns to consult with Congress at semi-annual meetings about its "targets" and plans with respect to growth or diminution of the monetary and credit supplies in the next year.

In effect, Congress is telling Burns that it doesn't like his tight money policies. The AFL-CIO has been attacking those policies in the strongest terms ever since the late 1960s when Burns injected his "disastrous thinking" into the first Nixon Administration.

Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), chairman of the House Banking Committee, had pushed a bill that would have ordered the board to expand the money supply at an annual rate of at least 6 percent and allocate credit to "national priority uses," something labor has consistently advocated.

But Reuss acceded to the resolution approach even though it lacks the legal force of legislation. There was considerable speculation in Congress that a resolution could pass but a bill couldn't.

Burns opposed the resolution. But one of his associates has since been quoted that he now sees it as an opportunity for "educating those people and shooting down some of their theories." Some believe that Burns will consider the resolution as nothing more than a suggestion.

However, Humphrey, Proxmire and Reuss believe they have moved Congress into exercising control over the Fed which, after all, is its own creature. Any ignoring of the resolution, Reuss says, and Congress will pass "an iron-clad law" regulating board policies.

AS ANGERED AS labor is at Burns's failure to direct the Fed's policies toward ending the country's worst recession since the end of World War II, their charges against him go much farther back than his tenure as board chairman, which began in February 1970.

As a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under Nixon, and as his special "counselor," union leaders are convinced, Burns was the architect of the infamous "game plan," which managed to spawn simultaneous recession and inflation as early as 1969.

In their book, "The Palace Guard," dealing with the men who ran the Nixon Administration before Watergate brought it down, authors Dan Rather and Gary Paul Gates describe Burns's operations, although he was not a main subject of examination.

The authors say that it was Burns, even after he became board chairman, who "educated" Treasury Sec. John Connally to the extent he could convince Nixon to set up the wage-price freeze.

Burns also ranged afield in his Nixon years. It was he who proposed the short-lived suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act, which sets prevailing wages on government-contract projects, and advocated splintering of the minimum wage law to allow a lower minimum for youths. He went so far as to advocate compulsory arbitration in labor disputes.

EXAGGERATED ATTACKS on the soundness of the social security system were refuted by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Theodor Schuchat, left, of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

A circus atmosphere greets visitors to the 10th anniversary celebration of the Job Corps.

Job Corps Marks 10th Year

THE 10th ANNIVERSARY of the Job Corp was observed with a salute to the outstanding graduates of the program and to all who helped open doors to meaningful jobs for the thousands of former enrollees.

Focus of the celebration was on a demonstration of skills in construction crafts that Job Corps members had developed under the tutelage of journeymen union instructors.

Operating in a multi-ring circus atmosphere —accented with ringmasters, barkers, balloons and popcorn—the young trainees and recent graduates practiced their trades on mock building projects. Participants in the show were trainees working toward their apprenticeships or journeymen's cards as Bricklayers, Carpenters, Operating Engineers, Painters and Plasterers.

Affiliates of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. have been involved in the Job Corps since 1966. The Railway & Airline Clerks and Marine Cooks & Stewards are also in the program. In addition, the federation's Human Resources Development Institute provides recruiting and supportive services, and the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council operates a vocational training program.

The Labor Dept., which administers a major part of the program, estimates that the Job Corps has served more than 500,000 disadvantaged youths with job oriented education, training and other services.

Before the current surge in the unemployment rate, more than 80 percent of the Job Corps members who completed training were placed in jobs or went on to further their education, the Labor Dept. noted.

Ten graduates of the program were inducted into the Job Corp Hall of Fame at the Washington celebration. The list includes three union members: Walter Mitchell of West Haven, Conn., a journeyman Operating Engineer; Jessie Al Lane of Austin, Tex., an apprentice Plasterer, and Ken Stein of San Jose, Calif., of the Retail Clerks.

'Six-Year Step Backwards':

Family Income Gap Widens As Legacy of Nixon Policies

Shifts in distribution of income occur very slowly, but in eight years of sustained economic growth from 1961 to 1969 real progress was made as those on the bottom rungs of the income ladder moved up perceptibly.

But this trend toward greater income equality came to an abrupt halt in 1969, and since then the gap between rich and poor has widened substantially, Arnold Cantor, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research, notes. His article appears in the current issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

Economic policies of the past six years, set in motion during the first Nixon Administration, have been chiefly responsible for this state of affairs, Cantor charges

Prior to this "six-year step backwards," Cantor notes, more than 15 million people moved out of poverty between 1961 and 1969, and blacks and other minorities made substantial gains in both relative and absolute terms.

"But the unfortunate chronology of economic events since then has taken its toll," the author observes.

"Skyrocketing prices, mounting unemployment, two recessions and continuing cutbacks in public investments brought an abrupt halt to an era of constant improvement in social welfare."

In 1973, the median family income was $12,051. That is, half of the nation's family units that year received less than that amount and half received more. But, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, an average urban family of four that same year required $12,626—almost $600 more than the median family income—for a "modest but adequate" standard of living.

Information on median incomes for 1974—which will not be available for some time—will show a sharp drop in family purchasing power as a result of the current recession with its attendant high unemployment and high inflation rate, Cantor predicts.

The abrupt halt in the trend toward greater income equality is evident from statistics cited in the article.

Since 1968, Cantor notes, the income shares of the 40 percent of the families at the top increased, but they fell for the majority of Americans—the 60 percent of the nation's families with 1973 incomes of $14,000 or less.

"In terms of dollars," Cantor explains, "that means since 1968, a total of $20 billion was transferred from the bottom three-fifths of U.S. families to the upper two-fifths."

Families in the low- to moderate-income bracket suffered the greatest losses, Cantor points out. Families with 1973 incomes of $6,000 to $10,000 a year saw their share of the pie slip from 12.4 percent of total income in 1968 to 11.9 percent in 1973.

The most substantial gains since 1968 went to the wealthiest 20 percent. The group with incomes of more than $19,000 increased their share of total income from 40.5 percent in 1968 to 41.1 percent in 1973.

"What's more, large chunks of the income of the wealthy aren't recorded in the census statistics since, for instance, income from the sale of stocks, bonds and other property or from gifts and inheritances, is not counted," Cantor notes.

He cites several studies of the widening incomes gap, including a Commerce Dept. survey showing that in 1971 the 1 percent of the American families with the largest personal income received 47 percent of the total income from dividends and owned 51 percent of the market value of stock.

A survey of consumers by the Institute for Social Research of the University of Michigan showed a similar pattern of concentration of wealth at the top.

The Michigan study found that in 1971 over half of the nation's families had savings of $1,000 or less—and that figure included checking and savings accounts, stocks and bonds.

"In discussing income distribution, few people question the need to alleviate the circumstances of the very poor, and it is reasonably well recognized that it is dangerous for a nation to have a concentration of vast amounts of wealth in the hands of an elite few," Cantor observes.

"To help those in the middle and at the same time bring more people into the middle is a far more complicated task."

It is clear the squeeze on the middle-income worker has been going on for some time, Cantor says, "and it has been particularly severe over the past years."

The paycheck of the average worker at the end of 1974, for example, was $160 a week and, if he had three dependents, his take-home pay was $139 a week. With that paycheck, Cantor notes, the family could buy no more than it could 10 years ago, according to the Labor Dept.

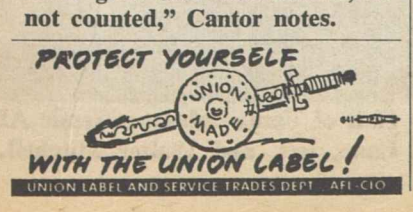
Among the economic failures over the past six years was the Nixon Administration's policy of business tax giveaways, the article charges.

Enacted in 1971, the tax giveaways fueled inflation, eroded the tax structure and helped to create the imbalances that shortened the recovery of the 1969-70 recession, Cantor points out. This, in turn, paved the way for the much deeper recession that began in 1973.

More inequities were added during the Nixon Administration's so-called economic stabilization program.

"For 32 months, this program effectively controlled workers' wages while profits, interest, dividends and other forms of income which flow primarily to the wealthy were essentially uncontrolled," Cantor notes.

"Equity and fair income shares are always critically important, even in the best of times," the author concludes. "But when the economy is performing poorly, equity and fair shares become the overriding standards by which policies and programs, both public and private, need to be judged."



'Postage Due' Order Hits Employer's Dirty Trick

The F. W. Woolworth Co. owes Local 9 of the Office & Professional Employees $27.60, plus a couple of bucks for interest.

The dime store chain went too far in trying to thwart a union organizing drive in Milwaukee, the National Labor Relations Board found.

Union supporters at Woolworth's central accounting office put OPEIU literature on the desks of fellow employes before the start of work. There was no company rule against it. But NLRB hearings established that a company supervisor went around to the desks and confiscated the union literature. Then, as an extra harassment to the union, he mailed the unsigned authorized cards back in the prepaid return envelopes the union had provided.

An administrative law judge for the NLRB found the company guilty of an unfair labor practice and ordered the firm to post the usual notice to employes promising not to interfere further with the organizing effort.

But a panel of NLRB members voted 2-1 to impose an additional requirement—that the firm reimburse the OPEIU local for the postage fees it incurred, plus 6 percent interest from late 1973 when the violation took place.

Rail Unions Seek Probe Of Lax Safety Policies

Al H. Chesser, chairman of the Congress of Railway Unions, called upon Congress to investigate "the miserable performance" of the Federal Railroad Administration in the field of railroad safety.

Chesser, who is president of the United Transportation Union, wrote Rep. Jack Brooks (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Government Operations Committee that the worsening rail accident rate is due to FRA's failure to implement the 1970 Rail Safety Act.

Chesser cited statistics showing accidents have increased since rail safety was transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the FRA, an agency of the Transportation Dept., in 1967.

Between 1967 and 1973, he said, train accidents increased from 6,914 to 9,375. In 1974, there was "a decided increase"—to 10,419 train accidents and, of that number, 445 resulted in casualties, a 23 percent increase over 1973.

Chesser charged that the FRA has failed to adopt new safety standards to cover various aspects of railroad operations or to ask for an adequate number of safety inspectors.

In addition, while ignoring its responsibility to ensure greater safety, the agency has sought "greatly increased funds to promote fanciful non-railroad projects such as linear induction motors and tracked air-cushioned vehicles," Chesser said.

"The further deterioration of railroad safety cannot be permitted to continue," Chesser declared. "The lives of the employes and the public, as well as the nation's interest in the safe handling and arrival of materials shipped over the railroads, demands that proper railroad safety regulations be issued (under the 1970 Rail Safety Act) and that adequate enforcement be carried out to the end that the railroad accident record be reduced and rail safety assured."

Better Union-Employer Relations Goal of New Mediation Program

Improved labor-management relations outside of contract negotiations when there is no crisis bargaining situation to overcome is being promoted by federal mediators.

Recognizing the need of union and management officials to find a better means of dealing with each other during the term of a contract, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has launched a program to cultivate communications between the parties.

Basically, the plan operates through joint and separate meetings with one or more mediators on hand to analyze the relationship of the parties. Positive aspects are stressed and a working agreement is made to handle and overcome negative aspects. Deadlines are set to meet the agreed-upon goals.

The concept, titled Labor-Management Relations by Objectives, is the outgrowth of a series of pilot programs conducted by the FMCS Office of Technical Services.

Director W. J. Usery, Jr., of the service said that this approach was developed "from our experience that labor and management can best identify their own mutual problems" and are in the best position to determine how to solve them.

"Working together, they have the ability to devise and implement problem-solving procedures from which both sides can benefit," Usery said. "Our mediators provide assistance throughout this process."

Among a number of FMCS efforts now under way is one that involves five AFL-CIO unions and a Georgia-Pacific wood products and papermaking complex in Maine. The parties had agreed to FMCS technical assistance following a strike last year.

The operation was developed by a team of mediators headed by John Popular II, associate director of the FMCS technical services staff. Representatives of the five unions—Paperworkers, Machinists, Carpenters, Firemen & Oilers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—and company officials first met with the mediators at Calais, Me., in January.

Then the parties broke up into mixed labor and management groups to explore areas they most wanted to resolve. The goals outlined were improved communications, more trust and respect, and better future relationships.

The groups were shown a new FMCS film about labor-relations attitudes, which they later related to their own problems. After several days of intensive meetings in separate and joint sessions, achievable improvement goals were set and responsibilities assigned in efforts to meet the goals.

With the Georgia-Pacific project in its third month, both the labor and management groups have reported positive results.

Irving Marshall, president of Paperworkers Local 27, said the opportunity to view issues from both the management and labor side, was helpful in resolving problems. With the aid of mediators, Marshall said, "We designed for ourselves a 'road map' to follow in the coming months and years."

A company official noted that grievances, which had numbered in the hundreds, slowed to a trickle after the program was initiated.

Bill Yardley, president of Firemen & Oilers Local 330, confirmed the report, commenting that by talking over potential grievances the problems are eliminated before they are started.

Vern Wentworth of Carpenters Local 2400 noted "great changes of attitudes" on both sides since the program was launched.

One union official said he based the success of the program on being able to talk with management as a person, not just an employe.

The FMCS reported that the experience with Georgia-Pacific and the five unions in Maine has generated interest in other sectors of the wood products industry and in other industries as well.

Similar projects are now under way at Leominster, Mass., involving the Chemical Workers and the Borden Chemical Co.; at Peru, Ind., with the Boilermakers and Freeman Industries, and at Minneapolis between the IBEW and Paper-Calmenson. Other projects are scheduled to start in Iowa, Ohio and Alabama, the mediation service reported.

Jerome T. Barrett, director of the FMCS Office of Technical Services, said inquiries about the program have been received from numerous areas across the country.

evidence that the chemical was carcinogenic.

Although the allowable exposure is set at 1 ppm for an eight-hour period, the concentration may go up to 5 ppm for 15-minute peak periods. Where those levels cannot be achieved, the plants are required to supply workers with respirators.

The use of respirators is currently optional for workers exposed to concentrations of the gas in excess of 25 ppm, but would be mandatory after Jan. 1, 1976.

The vinyl chloride rule affects an estimated 6,500 workers in vinyl chloride production and about 350,000 others in plastics fabricating.

Clash Looms on Funds:

Ford's Budget 'Line' Threat to Job Effort

refused to spend over the past two years.

Budget estimates are notoriously fluctuating figures, since the state of the economy can add or subtract tens of billions of dollars from tax revenues estimated more than a year in advance. Ford indicated no uncertainty, however, as he asserted that the tax cut and actions already taken by Congress will push the deficit for the fiscal year starting next July 1 to $60 billion and that measures being considered by Congress would raise the deficit to $100 billion.

Pointing to the $60 billion figure on a chart, the President declared, "I am drawing the line right here. . . . I will resist every attempt by Congress to add another dollar to this deficit by new spending programs."

Further, Ford insisted, Congress must go along with his proposal to put a 5 percent ceiling on pay increases for federal employes and a comparable curb on the cost-of-living adjustments that will be due for persons receiving social security, railroad retirement, civil service and military retirement benefits.

To keep from crossing the President's "line," Congress would have to abandon a House-passed bill carrving $5.9 billion in emergency funds to expand an assortment of job programs.

The budget limit sought by the President would require scuttling a House-passed bill designed to encourage housing construction through a mortgage interest rate subsidy for middle-income home and apartment buyers. It would thwart any additional income guarantees for farmers. And it would preclude passage of any bill using federal funds to restore health insurance protection for workers who lost their coverage when they lost their jobs.

But despite the apparent rigidity of the President's speech, the pace of economic recovery is likely to influence both Congress and the White House.

Worsening unemployment this summer would build up pressure for jobs, not reduced deficits.

If the Administration, on the other hand, can point convincingly to an economic recovery, the spending pressure would be less. And very likely the budget impact would be less also, since the added tax revenue from an upturn in employment would serve to reduce the deficit.

A wild card in the congressional outlook is the influence of the new Budget Committees of the House and Senate. Starting next year, they have a clearly defined role in establishing preliminary budget targets and proposing to Congress a breakdown of the spending totals that in effect would be establishing national priorities.

Both the House and Senate panels plan to submit an overall budget target to Congress for approval this month in a test of the new procedure.

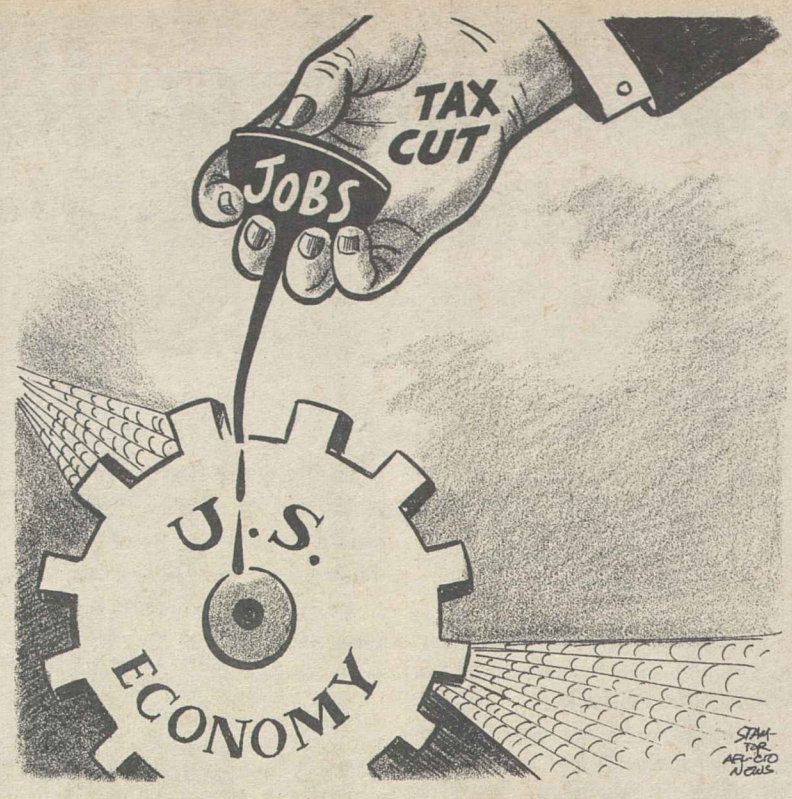
This budget target would not be legally binding for the coming fiscal year, but President Ford wants to make it so by advancing the budget control law to make it apply to the 1976 fiscal year, which starts this July 1.

If Congress complied with the President's request, which he announced at an Apr. 3 news conference, funds appropriated for government programs would be cut back proportionately in order to keep total spending within a budget ceiling approved by Congress.

Whether or not Congress accedes to Ford's proposal, the Administration clearly is relying on the Budget Committees as a restraining influence on spending.

There would be less of a gap between government revenue and federal spending if Congress followed the course urged earlier this year by the AFL-CIO General Board.

After completing action on the emergency tax cut, the board said, congressional committees should "promptly begin work on closing the loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and corporations. Only through tax justice will the government's needs for tax revenue be met by a fair and equitable tax structure."



Wholesale Drop Leaves Index Up 12.5% in Year

prices fell four months in a row was in late 1966. The 12.5 percent year-to-year rise in the index compares to a jump of 23.5 percent last November.

Together, farm products and processed foods and feeds fell 2.5 percent. This followed declines of 3.4 percent in February, 2.5 percent in January, and 2.5 percent in December 1974.

The drop in the farm products index was led by lower prices for grains, oilseeds, and fresh and dried vegetables. The index for processed foods and feeds moved down principally due to reduced prices for sugar and confectionery and manufactured animal feeds.

The overall wholesale price index for March was 170.4 percent of its 1967 base of 100, meaning that a representative group of commodities that cost $100 eight years ago cost $170.40 in March.

While changes in wholesale prices usually are reflected at the retail level, recent experience has shown food price reductions have not been fully passed on to the consumer.

Industrial commodities over the past year increased 18.6 percent, BLS noted. Prices for farm products were down 13.1 percent over the same period, while processed foods and feeds were up 8.8 percent.

The most significant price rises among industrial commodities were posted by chemicals, transportation equipment, machinery and equipment, fuels and related products and power, BLS said.

The higher prices for power reflected increases for electricity, gasoline, light distillate and residual fuels. Prices for bituminous coal were lower.

turn in six months in the government's composite index of leading economic indicators. Also, there were more cuts in banks' prime rates and the first rise in new orders for manufactured products in six months.

The nation's automakers, still trying to reduce inventories piled up because of consumer resistance to high prices, reported that March production declined about 17 percent below the year-earlier depressed level.

The construction industry lowered building outlays five-tenths of 1 percent in February, the Commerce Dept. said. Construction spending fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $128.1 billion during the month to the lowest level since November 1972.

The Conference Board, a business-oriented research organization in New York, noted a further drop in its help-wanted index of newspaper advertising in February.

The increase in the Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators amounted to 1 percent overall as four of the nine indicators that were available turned upward. These included stock prices, new orders for durable goods, industrial materials prices, and change in consumer installment debt.

The Commerce Dept.'s report on new factory orders, which showed a 1.3 percent decline in February, was accompanied by a report indicating a slowing-down in manufacturers' additions to inventories. Inventories recorded their smallest increase in three and one-half years in February, the government said.

Union Workers Widen Pay, Benefit Advantage

Any way you measure it, workers represented by unions have been getting bigger paychecks and more fringe benefits than non-union workers.

A report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics covering a six-year period, 1966 to 1972, shows that the gap has widened significantly. Union members had the advantage at the start of the survey period and had an even bigger advantage at its close. Results of the study were detailed by Paul L. Scheible in the March issue of the BLS publication, Monthly Labor Review.

non-union establishments failed even to come up to the union standard of six years earlier. And meanwhile the advance in union-won compensation made the gap even wider than it had been.

The survey covered both the pay and total compensation of non-office workers. Included in total compensation are required employer payments such as social security plus employer expenditures not required by law—retirement payments, health and life insurance benefits, etc.

Total compensation at union establishments advanced $2.22 an hour during this period, from $3.61 to $5.83 an hour. That's a 61 percent rise.

At non-union firms, the advance was only $1.21 an hour or 52 percent, from $2.32 in 1966 to $3.53 in 1972. Thus the gap between union and non-union compensation increased from $1.29 an hour in 1966 to $2.30 an hour.

In wages alone, the six-year rise in union establishments was $1.62, from $2.95 to $4.57 an hour. At non-union establishments over the same period, the increase was 99 cents—from $2.01 to $3 an hour.

Compensation beyond pay—fringes, retirement and social security—rose from 66 cents to $1.26 at union firms and from 31 cents to 53 cents at non-union firms.

The union card advantage held true in all of the subgroupings. In most cases, the compensation at

The contrast between the pay and benefits of union and non-union workers was even greater in nonmanufacturing industries than in manufacturing.

In manufacturing, union establishments in 1972 paid an average of $5.50 an hour in total compensation and $4.25 in straight wages. At non-union firms, total compensation averaged $4 that year, and wages were $3.29.

In nonmanufacturing, total compensation was $6.24 an hour for the union sector and $3.36 for non-union workers. On wages alone, hte BLS reported a $4.96 average for union workers and $2.89 in the non-union sector.

Meany Scores Health Plan Rules As Undercutting Bargaining Role

"out to make quick, high profits for unscrupulous entrepreneurs."

"There is not the slightest reason why the union should be forced to permit the employer to offer an HMO option to his employes after the union has made a determination that the HMO soliciting its members would not serve their health needs," the statement said.

Further, under the HEW proposal, the employer would have to offer such an option even if both he and the union agreed it would not be a useful plan.

Therefore, the AFL-CIO urged, the regulations should specifically provide that the bargaining agent for the employes be able to decline the HMO option on behalf of the entire bargaining unit.

In other comments on the proposed regulations, the AFL-CIO position was that:

- References to an employer should be clearly indicated as referring to a designated representative of the employer such as a jointly-administered health and welfare trust.
- It is impractical to require an employer whose workers are scattered over a wide area to deal with a large number of HMOs even though only one or two of the employes might live in an area served by a particular HMO. Therefore, the AFL-CIO suggested that the option be required only in areas where at least 25 employes would be served by the same HMO.
- The proposed regulations put the responsibility for reviewing literature dealing with the various plans available solely on the employer, with the HMO having responsibility for its distribution. In organized establishments, "the AFL-CIO strongly recommends that necessary arrangements for notifying employes of the HMO option should be worked out jointly by labor, management and the HMO."

Other points made by the AFL-CIO dealt with additional administrative costs incurred in offering an optional program, and determination of equity between employer payments for HMO and other forms of health insurance. The AFL-CIO suggested that the issue of equitable payments "be explored in depth before the final regulations are issued with representatives of labor, management, HMOs' jointly administered health and welfare trusts, self-insured employer health benefit plans" and any other interested parties.

Big Hospital Unit Votes for SEIU

The Service Employees won a representation election at Washington Hospital Center in the District of Columbia for a bargaining unit of nearly 1,400 workers.

This is the largest group of hospital workers to be organized through an election since the federal law was enacted last year providing for union representation of employes of non-profit hospitals, the SEIU said.

Meany Urges 'Credible' Foreign Policy

Warns U.S. Position in 'Shambles'

AFL-CIO President George Meany called for a reshaping of America's foreign policy to halt a retreat to isolationism and impotence in world affairs.

He called for a renewed national commitment to human freedom, based on new policies rather than new rhetoric.

Meany's foreign policy address, at a luncheon sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., criticized both an Administration committed to a one-sided detente with the Communist powers and a Congress pursuing an "impossible dream" of isolationism.

The combination has made a "shambles" of America's foreign policy, Meany said.

His speech, broadcast live by public radio, affirmed the labor movement's belief that "the loss of freedom by workers anywhere in the world is a definite threat to the freedom of workers everywhere."

That's why, "as trade unionists, we cannot buy a policy of isolation for America." And in any event, Meany suggested, there can be no isolation in a world in which no country is more than minutes away from "weapons of mass destruction."

Meany told a hushed audience that he applauds and would like to believe President Ford's recent assertion that the United States will "stand by" its allies, and his warning to this country's adversaries that the American people are prepared "to stand up for freedom any place in the world."

It's not enough to abandon the "vocabulary of detente," Meany suggested. "We must abandon the policies it spawned."

He called on Congress and the Administration, Democrats and Republicans alike, to "reshape our foreign and defense policies so that President Ford's warning to our adversaries is credible—not only to them but to ourselves."

America's unwillingness to offend the Soviet Union and its tolerance of Soviet disregard of the USSR's obligations to the detente policy is pointed up in the Middle East conflict, Meany noted.

All-out Soviet support for the Arab Yom Kippur attack on Israel went unprotested by the United States. And when Israel—a free nation established in large part by a free trade union movement—insisted on some reciprocity for its concessions to Egypt, President Ford and Sec. of State Kissinger

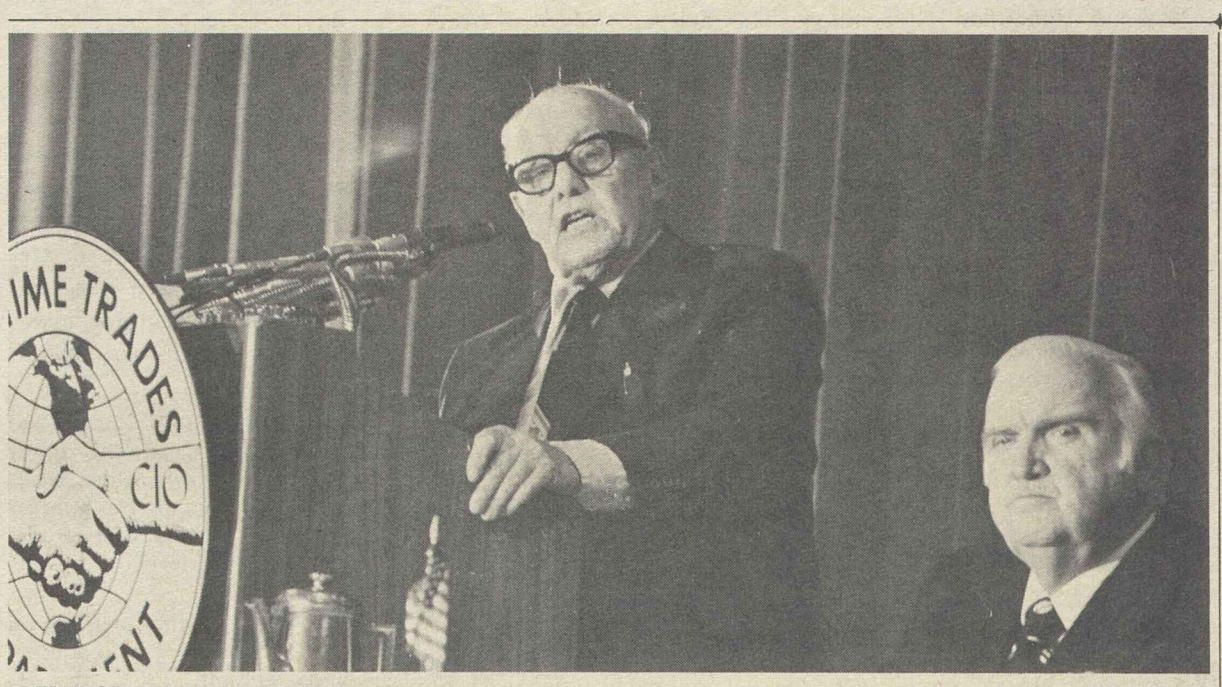
Congress, Ford Spurred On Jobs Crisis Program



SUPPORT OF FREEDOM must again become the keystone of America's foreign policy, AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a major address to a luncheon meeting sponsored by the Maritime Trades Dept. MTD President Paul Hall is at right.

Tax Cut Alone Held Not Enough

Congress must do "much more" to put America back to work, AFL-CIO President George Meany said as he called on the AFL-CIO's affiliated unions and central bodies to "keep pushing" for enactment of the unfinished part of labor's action program.

Despite the Administration's "optimistic rhetoric," Meany stressed, the nation's "disastrous economic slide" hasn't reached bottom and the turnabout is not in sight.

Meany enclosed with his letter a progress report by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller on the program adopted by the federation's General Board on Jan. 23, when it met in emergency session to respond to an economic crisis that has since become even more grave. (Text on Page 6.)

Labor's six-part program called for government action on tax cuts, a realistic energy program, reduction of interest rates, job-creating legislation, protection from unfair foreign competition and immediate assistance to the unemployed.

"There has been progress but it is not enough," Meany said. The tax cut alone is not sufficient and "every affiliate, every central body, every local union, every union member" must redouble efforts to reach and persuade members of Congress.

At Moderate Living Standard:

BLS Family Budget Costs Soar 13.5 Percent in Year

The cost of a moderate standard of living for the average American family rose to a record $14,333 last fall, or 13.5 percent above the fall 1973 level, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

This was a jump of $1,707 in one year, the largest increase since BLS began drawing up its annual set of hypothetical family budgets in 1967.

The budgets, prepared for a typical urban family of four, attempt to illustrate three different levels of living based on estimates of costs for different types and amounts of goods and services.

At the more austere, or lower, level, the typical family budget amounted to $9,198 a year, while the higher-level budget came to $20,777.

When updated to reflect current price levels, the budgets would be still higher. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, calculated that the lower budget today would come to $9,469; the intermediate, $14,800, and the higher, $21,442.

The revised estimates factor in a 2.7 percent rise in the consumer price index from last October through February of this year, plus additional social security, personal income and other taxes since last fall.

While figures for 1974 aren't yet available, the median family income in 1973 was $12,051, according to the Census Bureau. The official poverty guideline income for 1973—again the latest figure available—was $4,540. Brought up to date by adding cost-of-living increases through February of this year, the poverty guideline currently would be $5,362.

The BLS figures, which reflect record increases for all three budgets, show the total cost of the lower budget rose 12.4 percent from autumn 1973 to autumn 1974 while the higher budget went up 14.2 percent.

By comparison, the increases from autumn 1972 to autumn 1973 were 10.8 percent for the lower budget and 10.3 and 9.9 percent for the moderate and higher budgets, respectively. In previous years, the budgets mirrored rises of not more than 4.3 percent.

The budgets are drawn up for a hypothetical city family headed by a 38-year-old husband employed full time. His wife does not work outside the home, and

Official Jobless Rate Rises to 8.7%, 1.1 Million More Give Up Search

The nation's official jobless rate pushed toward the 9 percent mark last month, and the employment picture was even worse than it appeared, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

"The actual rate of unemployment is much higher than the 8.7 percent figure announced by the Bureau of Labor Statistics," Meany asserted.

"Adding the official figures of 8 million unemployed and the 1.1 million 'discouraged workers' means there are at least 9.1 million unemployed in this country."

Meany figured the actual rate of unemployment in March was at least 9.8 percent, since the rate changes by one-tenth of 1 percent with every increase or decrease of about 100,000 workers.

"The situation is even worse if you include the 3.9 million workers forced to work part-time because full-time jobs are not available," Meany added. "These figures are appalling."

The dire statistics prompted Meany to comment that the tax-reduction bill signed by President Ford Mar. 29 "obviously . . . is not enough."

Meany said "the job-creating bills now pending in Congress must be passed immediately despite any implied threat of a presidential veto."

Unemployment in America now is at its highest level since 1941 when joblessness reached 9.9 percent of the workforce. The March jobless rate was up one-half of a percentage point, from 8.2 percent in February.

Unions Fight 5% Lid on Federal Pay

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. has asked congressional leaders to help head off efforts to shortchange government workers in order to hold down the size of the anticipated budget deficit.

Department President W. Howard McClennan expressed concern at acceptance by the House Budget Committee of the 5 percent ceiling President Ford proposed on pay adjustments for government workers.

The Budget Committee also assumed in its estimates of outlays and revenue an arbitrary ceiling on social security benefit increases and

NEW YORK TEACHERS' annual representative assembly drew 2,000 delegates representing the 215,000 members of the state teachers' organization. It is affiliated with both the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association. The delegates showed overwhelming support of NYSUT's efforts to bring about a national merger of the AFT and NEA.

Strike Votes Conducted by 4 Rail Unions

Four rail unions—members of the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept.—are conducting strike votes following a breakdown in talks with the nation's major rail carriers over new contracts.

In letters to union general chairmen, leaders of the Carmen, Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers said they would continue to "press with maximum strength for an early agreement that meets the needs of the membership."

"However, we are not optimistic that such an agreement can be reached through mediation," they said.

The unions said the carriers have refused to "make any substantial or significant changes in our subcontracting agreement and other rules favorable to the employes," or to propose a satisfactory wage package.

The letter was signed by Presidents Harold J. Buoy of the Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Anthony L. Krause of the Carmen, John J. McNamara of the Firemen & Oilers and Vice President Frank Gladney of the IBEW. Also signing was President James E. Yost of the Railway Employees' Dept.

Meanwhile, the Railway & Airline Clerks were in the process of tallying strike ballots sent to members last month.

"We will be legally free to strike as of 12:01 a.m., Friday, Apr. 18, assuming a favorable vote," BRAC President C. L. Dennis said. Negotiations continued while votes were being counted.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the appointment of a presidential emergency board to consider the dispute could delay any strike by 60 days.

The Yardmasters, who have agreed with the carriers on most economic issues, reported disagreement on several minor matters. President A. T. Otto, Jr., said the union has applied for assistance from the National Mediation Board in the talks.

The Machinists were expected shortly to conclude their ratification vote on a pact containing wage and fringe-benefit improvements similar to agreements approved earlier by seven other unions.

350 Shoe Layoffs Linked to Imports

The Labor Dept. has certified 350 members of the Shoe Workers eligible for trade adjustment assistance after the government determined that their loss of jobs resulted from increased imports of women's footwear.

The union petitioned the International Trade Commission on behalf of the jobless members who had been laid off by the Shaer Shoe Corp. of Manchester, N.H.

The commission was evenly divided on whether the workers had been injured by the imports, but the White House intervened on the side of the workers.

Under the 1974 Trade Act, the USW members may receive 70 percent of their weekly average wage for at least 52 weeks, and for an additional 26 weeks to complete training courses. They also qualify for testing, counseling, and job placement and relocation assistance.

New Government Figures:

Family Budget Costs Rise 13.5% in Year

they have a 13-year-old son and an eight-year-old daughter.

The couple is assumed to have been married about 15 years, settled in the community, and the husband is an experienced worker.

"The budgets are not intended to represent a minimum or subsistence level of living," BLS notes, adding:

"The budgets do not represent how families of this type actually spend their money. Rather, they reflect the assumptions made about the manner of living at each of the three levels."

Besides calculating average budget costs at the three levels on a national basis, BLS surveys costs for 40 metropolitan areas of the United States.

Total family consumption costs—that is, the cost of food, shelter, housing, clothing and other goods and services—rose by about 11 percent in all three budgets. Biggest increases were for food, housing and transportation which account for more than 70 percent of consumption costs.

"The increase in food prices had a greater impact on the lower budget than the two other levels because food accounts for a larger proportion of the total cost of consumption at that level of living," BLS said.

Food costs at the lower level rose 13.2 percent from autumn 1973 to autumn 1974; the increases for the intermediate and higher budgets were 11.5 and 10.8 percent, respectively.

The increase in housing costs had a greater impact on the higher and moderate budgets, however, since housing accounts for a larger share of the total cost of consumption at those levels.

Total housing costs for lower-budget families, who are assumed to live in rental housing only, increased by 8.1 percent from autumn to autumn. In the moderate and higher budgets where housing includes both rental housing and homeownership, costs rose 11.3 and 11.7 percent, respectively.

"The housefurnishings and operations component of housing costs rose 19 percent at all budget levels—the largest increases among all the components of consumption," BLS observed.

Transportation costs rose the most in the higher and intermediate budgets which contain the largest proportion of automobile ownership. The increase for both categories averaged 15.6 percent.

The largest single increase in all three budgets was for taxes, including larger contributions to the social security system. Average taxes and deductions in the lower-cost budget amounted to $1,463. At the intermediate level, the average was $2,790 while the higher budget reflected a $4,686 average.

Personal income taxes alone increased 25.7 percent over the year for the lower budget, 25.1 percent at the intermediate level, and 26.6 percent for the higher budget. While the federal tax rate structure did not change during the survey period and changes in state and local tax programs were minimal, "the federal income tax rate structure as well as that of many states calls for higher tax rates as income rises," BLS pointed out.

"The increase of over 25 percent in budget costs for personal income taxes reflects the application of these higher rates to the larger incomes required in 1974 to purchase the same specified levels of consumption as last year (1973)," BLS said.

In its release accompanying the updated family budgets, BLS noted costs were 8 percent higher in metropolitan than in nonmetropolitan urban areas at the lower level. The metropolitan-nonmetropolitan difference was 13 percent for the intermediate budget and 18 percent for the higher.

Keep USIA Independent, Meany Asks

The effectiveness of the U.S. Information Agency would be undermined if it were dismembered and put under the State Dept., AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

Meany's comment on the recommendations of a special panel headed by Dr. Frank Stanton stressed the importance of maintaining the independence of USIA "in a period when the credibility of the United States is being challenged abroad."

He welcomed the Stanton panel's endorsement of the need for an overseas information program and for high standards of independence and objectivity in its reporting.

But this can best be accomplished through maintaining USIA's independence, Meany said, "so that its credibility and objectivity cannot be doubted or assailed."

Protests Cut Shelepin Visit To Britain

London — Aleksandr Shelepin, head of the Soviet government-controlled trade unions, cut short his stay in Britain after three days of demonstrations protesting his visit with leaders of the Trades Union Congress.

The former head of the KGB, the Soviet secret police, and his 12-member delegation encountered demonstrators virtually at every stop and were often greeted by flying trash as well as shouted slogans.

More than 1,000 demonstrators marched outside the TUC headquarters during a seven-hour meeting between Lionel Murray, general secretary of the TUC, and Shelepin.

Protesting trade unionists were joined by refugees of Eastern European countries — Ukranians, Czechoslovaks, Poles, Hungarians, Jews and others—who had grievances to air against the USSR and the KGB. As head of the KGB under Nikita Khrushchev, Shelepin had been linked to a number of political assassinations in and outside the Soviet Union.

Equity, the British actors' union, adopted a resolution formally condemning Shelepin's visit, and Frank Chapple, head of the electrical and plumbing trades, voiced strong opposition to the USSR-TUC conference.

The Russian "trade union" delegation was invited to Britain by the TUC as a reciprocal move following the visit of British trade union leaders to the Soviet Union 18 months ago.

As Spur to Jobs:

Maritime Unions Press Cargo Bill

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. reaffirmed its strong support of a cargo reservation program to provide badly needed jobs for the U.S. merchant marine.

"Such a program would result in enormous benefits to the nation's workers and balance of payments," the department declared in a statement adopted at a luncheon in Washington.

"Putting American ships and crews and American shipyards back to work will contribute to the economic recovery this nation needs," the department declared.

The statement said the U.S. merchant fleet has little chance of survival unless it is assured of carrying a significant portion of the country's foreign commerce.

Legislation to require that 30 percent of all U.S. oil imports be carried in American-flag ships would have done much to solve the problems of the merchant marine, the statement observed. But the bill, after clearing Congress, was killed by President Ford's pocket veto.

"It is time for the United States government to recognize the realities of a rapidly changing world," the MTD statement declared. "In today's international maritime community, such concepts as 'free trade' hold no meaning."

Among maritime union leaders pledging renewed efforts to secure congressional enactment of the oil cargo preference bill this year were MTD President Paul Hall and President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association.

"The economic situation in the maritime industry is worse than it has been since the 1930s," Calhoon said.

Page Groton, assistant to the president of the Boilermakers, observed that four years of legislative activities by the maritime industry "went down the drain" when President Ford vetoed the Energy Transportation Act last December. "We have to start all over again," he said.

Other speakers included President Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen and William O. Moody, Jr., administrator of the MDT.

While the entire industry is experiencing serious economic problems, the tanker segment has been hit the hardest, the statement noted.

It pointed out that 1.3 million tons of U.S.-flag tankers currently are without work, putting more than 1,000 seamen out of jobs.

The laid-up tanker tonnage represents one-third of the entire non-oil company or independently owned U.S.-flag tanker fleet If immediate action is not taken, this total may reach 40 percent of the independent fleet in a matter of weeks, the MTD said.

The lack of employment for existing U.S.-flag vessels has resulted in massive cutbacks in shipbuilding orders and plans, the statement observed. The Seatrain shipyard in Brooklyn has shut down completely, laying off 3,000 workers.

Government actions to put the nation's economy on the road to recovery thus far have done little to revitalize the U.S. merchant marine, the MTD noted.

"While a tax rebate may help the automobile and other manufacturing industries and an individual credit may stimulate the housing industry, measures of this kind do nothing for America's maritime industry which is unlike other industries, international as well as national," the department said.

"The problems confronting the U.S. maritime industry are the same as those facing maritime industries around the world.

"Yet the difference is that while America does nothing, foreign governments are acting not only to maintain but to build up their seafaring and shipbuilding industries."

The statement cited steps by the Arab oil-producing nations to take advantage of the current tanker market depression to buy tonnage for their own use. Venezuela, France and Japan also have recently moved to increase the participation of their fleets in their own foreign trade.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY of Lockheed Aircraft sub-assembly plant is observed by more than 150 Machinists who produce sections for the L-1011 jumbo jet at what once was a riot-torn area of Watts-Willowbrook in Los Angeles. Photos show the various stages of assembly of the aircraft sections. IAM District 727 Rep. Phil Barnett, shown upper right discussing a contract clause with two members, noted that the Lockheed operation is a real union-management success story proving that a plant located in an economically depressed area can pay off for everyone.

Textile Workers Reject 10¢ New England Offer

Boston—The Textile Workers Union of America, negotiating new contracts with New England cotton-synthetic mills, flatly rejected an offer by three pattern-setting companies as "not only ridiculous, but heartless in view of the facts of life."

The management proposal, affecting 20,000 workers in some 70 New England and Mid-Atlantic plants, was for an hourly increase of 10 cents, effective in October. The contracts are due to expire on Apr. 15.

A 13-man TWUA contract policy committee meeting here said it would recommend a "no contract-no work" policy to its members unless the industry substantially upgraded its offer.

"Galloping inflation has more than wiped out the raises workers received under the three-year pact which will soon expire," TWUA President Sol Stetin charged. He noted that wage increases under the current contract totaled only 18 percent while prices rose 28.5 percent over the three-year period.

"Yet this industry has the gall to offer its hard-pressed employes, whose productivity has been increasing between 4 and 5 percent a year since 1960, a 1975 raise that amounts to a piddling 1.5 percent, since it does not propose to place it into effect until the latter half of the contract year," Stetin said.

The union bargaining committee cited agreements in other branches of the textile industry providing wage increases of 47 cents an hour in the New York-New Jersey textile dyeing and printing industry, 37 cents an hour in New England dyeing and finishing plants, and 35 cents an hour in the synthetic fiber industry, in addition to substantial fringe-benefit improvements.

The committee pointed out the New England employers failed even to include pension and health-insurance improvements in their proposal.

'Ban-the-Can' Proponents Urged To Weigh Staggering Cost in Jobs

Shortsighted proposals to ban disposable beverage containers would do more to wipe out skilled jobs than to clean up the nation's countryside, the AFL-CIO warned at a conference on waste reduction sponsored by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The EPA is drafting rules that would forbid the sale of throw-away cans and bottles at all federal facilities, including military commissaries, federal cafeterias and other government installations.

Federation representatives told the EPA that the agency and environmental groups must carefully weigh the economic and social consequences stemming from ill-conceived clean-up programs.

Organized labor fully realizes the importance of cleaning up the environment, AFL-CIO Economist George H. R. Taylor pointed out, noting that the federation has long supported sound programs to achieve that goal. But on the issue of banning the can and the bottle "we part company with the environmentalists and without qualification," Taylor stressed.

He said that beverage containers account for only about 20 percent of the litter found on the nation's highways, with other package containers making up the rest.

He also noted that the beverage industry uses between 1 and 2 percent of total industrial energy, which boils down to four-tenths to eight-tenths of 1 percent of the total national energy usage.

"Cutting down this use by a fraction would have little impact on our national energy status," Taylor pointed out, "but it would have an inordinately large impact on jobs."

He added that the proposed ban on disposable containers could cause the junking of recycling efforts that are being developed or are already in use.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Robert McGlotten cited the nation's current high rate of joblessness and said, "we can ill afford at this stage of the game to have more people unemployed."

McGlotten told the conference that "we want to clean up the litter, but we don't want our people unemployed."

Taylor noted that EPA estimates that a ban on disposable containers would affect more than 60,000 highly paid skilled jobs.

"The EPA estimate that there could be a replacement of the equivalent number of other jobs in washing and distributing and handling containers is a statistical cop-out."

The tragedies resulting from the job displacement of skilled workers would be extensive, Taylor warned, because most wage earners in the container industry are family breadwinners in their middle years.

Working people constantly face the hazard of job loss, he said, a hazard reflected in last month's unemployment rate of 8.7 percent, which translates into 8 million workers standing in long lines at unemployment compensation offices.

"Congress certainly has the right to abolish by legislation or regulate the manufacture, distribution and sale in commerce of socially harmful goods," Taylor noted. "But before such action is taken in the beverage container industry—action that wipes out thousands of livelihoods—it must be demonstrated beyond an argument that the potential benefit to society will far outweigh the costs."

Taylor said the AFL-CIO supports a positive program to commit the nation to a policy of resource recovery. He cited a statement adopted by the federation's Executive Council, which insisted that "a clean environment and full employment are not incompatible; in fact, they can and should go hand-in-hand."

The council called on the federal government to expand efforts to develop new techniques for disposing of solid wastes and recovering valuable materials. To do this, it said, Congress must greatly increase the EPA budget that had been slashed by the Administration.

Angela Bambace Of ILGWU Dies

Baltimore—Angela Bambace, a retired vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and an early leader in the women's rights movement, died at her home here Apr. 3. She was 77.

Miss Bambace, who used her maiden name, had been a member of the ILGWU since 1919. She was manager of the union's Upper South department, comprising more than 50 locals, when she retired in 1972. She was elected to the ILGWU executive board in 1956.

Miss Bambace also was on the executive boards of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut, Italian-American Labor Council and the American Civil Liberties Union. In addition, she served on national and state commissions on the status of women. She is survived by two sons, five grandchildren and one great grandchild.

'A Cold Look at Reality'

IN LOOKING AT our nation's problems in the field of foreign affairs, I woud most respectfully suggest to President Ford that, in addition to reassessing our situation in the Middle East and perhaps in Southeast Asia, that he take a good look at this thing called detente.

There is a basic problem in connection with these Soviet promoted ideas like peaceful co-existence and detente. The Communists just don't mean it. They don't really believe in these propaganda slogans. From their point of view, they have no meaning or substance.

Every basic Communist tactic of seizing power is now on display throughout the world: Naked aggression in Indochina; political blackmail in the Middle East—combined threats of force; an outrageous putsch in Portugal; a heating up of the cold war in Korea, and a diplomatic and propaganda war in international institutions.

The time has come to ask what strings together the multiple disasters that have befallen our foreign policies in recent weeks.

To deny that these disasters are interconnected is to take the first step backward—away from serious debate. And nobody, but nobody, with common sense will believe that the Middle East, Vietnam, Portugal, Greece, Turkey, the UN, the ILO—nobody will believe that these are separate, disembodied developments that have no relation to our policies or to the overall policies of the Communist world.

We don't need any more myths. We need a cold look at reality.

AMERICA WILL BE STRONG only if its people believe there is a need to be strong. We will defend ourselves and our allies only so long as we believe we have something worth defending—and only so long as we believe there are real threats, real enemies of what is worth defending.

The President cannot—anymore than his predecessor—resolve the contradiction of proclaiming detente on the one hand and of demanding of the American people a continual level of vigilance and sacrifice for the cause of freedom.

Finally, I heard the President declare: "We will stand by our allies and I specifically warn any adversaries they should not, under any circumstances, feel that the tragedy of Vietnam is an indication that the American people have lost their will or their desire to stand up for freedom any place in the world."

I applaud that statement. But I would respectfully say to the President and to the Secretary of State: words are not enough. We need more than a new rhetoric. We need new policies.

It is not enough to abandon the misguided vocabulary of detente. We must abandon the policies it spawned.

We must reshape our foreign and defense policies so that President Ford's warning to our adversaries is credible—not only to them but to ourselves.

This is the challenge facing our political leadership today—be they Democrats or Republicans. And let there be no doubt about one thing:

The American people will pass judgment—for years to come—on how their leaders responded to the crisis of this hour.

Conflicting Views of U.S. Role In World Pose Critical Choice

By John P. Roche

RECENTLY THE Public Broadcasting Service produced a program on Vietnam, Cambodia and the United States. The panel included Ambassador Graham Martin and Rep. Paul McCloskey (R-Calif.), and within half an hour it became clear to me that Martin and McCloskey were far more than opponents on our Southeast Asian policy—they were protagonists for two generations. They are both dedicated, talented patriotic Americans but they simply steer by different stars. To put it another way they have different pictures of the world in their minds.

One of the reasons I felt this so strongly is that I am in the intermediate generation, one which began, ironically, with the McCloskey approach and wound up with that of Martin. In the course of his remarks, the congressman made it apparent that he is not only an isolationist (or "continentalist" to avoid the pejorative connotation of isolationist) but proud of it. Indeed, he quoted the late Sen. Robert Taft as a prophetic voice.

Obviously an anti-Communist with no sympathy for Hanoi, Moscow or Peking, McCloskey simply didn't see any sensible rationale for our Vietnam and Cambodian involvement. It is absurd, he suggested, for us to try to graft our value system on those of Asia. Unlike a number of other continentalists, McCloskey was completely consistent: he said we must also rethink our commitment in the Middle East and regretted the Jackson-Vanik amendment to the trade bill.

Dean Rusk observed a while ago, in his wry fashion, that he hoped the present generation would not avoid the mistakes of their fathers by imitating those of their grandfathers. As I watched and listened, I had the strange feeling that everything McCloskey said was already on file, that if I closed my eyes the year could be 1938 and the speaker Norman Thomas or Sen. Burton K. Wheeler.

As an activist in the Socialist opposition to American entry into World War II, I recall myself making impassioned pleas for non-involvement in a world immune to American democratic values. I also remember a meeting at Town Hall, a favorite site for debates in New York, where Norman Thomas (one of the century's most masterful debaters) orally shredded some pro-war spokesman. Poland was Thomas's centerpiece: with savage irony he inquired why we were supposed to fight and die for a bunch of fascist colonels. It made sense to me; I ignored the Graham Martins of that era who argued that the issue was not Poland but the survival of western honor confronted by totalitarianism.

This is not a mea culpa: I now believe I was wrong, but I held convictions honestly arrived at. What World War II did was provide a new set of pictures in my mind, notably concerning the ultimate evil of totalitarianism, images which led me to become—and remain—a liberal cold warrior. Unlike McCloskey I am incapable of believing that the Vietnamese people (for whom I have great respect and affection) would prefer Hanoi's iron dictatorship to Thieu's clumsy authoritarianism. In saying this, to repeat, I am not questioning McCloskey's integrity. (He has no trace, for example, of the racism President Johnson attributed to former Sen. J. W. Fulbright: "They're not our kind of folks.") I can no more prove my thesis than McCloskey can prove his.

IF McCLOSKEY WAS the incarnation of the continentalist, Graham Martin's tragic sense of the impact of a debacle in Southeast Asia incarnated the faith of the internationalist. Far too prudent to want the U.S. to play world policeman (Martin was, indeed, one of the most powerful voices opposing the Americanization of the war in Vietnam), he nonetheless believes the issue today is no more Vietnam or Cambodia than in 1939 it was Poland.

The question for Americans, as he sees it, is do we want to continue our postwar role as the barrier against totalitarian expansion? The underlying assumption (which I share) is that when a nation falls to the totalitarian (monolithic or polycentric), it is a bad thing. To Congressman McCloskey this smacks of ethical arrogance, though he would certainly never be as patronizing as Shirley MacLaine, who recently said that, although she personally couldn't tolerate life under Chinese communism, it was great for the Chinese.

McCloskey and Martin: two generations, two world views, two visions of American destiny. Willy-nilly, the people, sooner or later, must choose between them.

Affluent Suburbs Shape Priorities:

Philosophy of 'New' Liberals Riddled With Contradictions

By Bayard Rustin

IT HAS BECOME commonplace for young politicians to dismiss "Great Society liberalism" as a hopelessly outdated and impractical philosophy. Conservatives, of course, always hated the Great Society because they hated the activist, compassionate government policies it stood for.

We now find that there is a growing number of young liberals who are as contemptuous of the Great Society as are the most strongly ideological conservatives. They see themselves as pragmatic liberals and, in describing themselves as pragmatists, seem to be distinguishing themselves from what we are to believe is the unworkable formulas of the Johnson Administration.

If we examine the specific programs favored by these liberals, it becomes clear that their own philosophy is riddled with contradictions. They generally favor as activist a government as did the Johnson Administration; many believe in a system of national health care, expanded government housing programs, more aid to education and the like. Thus very often their differences with Great Society liberalism are differences of style, and not of substance.

Another difference between traditional liberals and many of the newer liberals is the movements which produced them and the constituencies they represent. Many of the newly elected members of Congress represent suburban communities, areas that were traditionally strongholds of the Republican Party but which, in reaction to the scandals of the Nixon Administration and the economic failures of Gerald Ford, switched to the Democratic Party last November.

The Democrats elected by this more affluent constituency differ from traditional Democrats in that their priorities are in large measure defined by their wealthier constituents. For them, political change means first and foremost the reform of political structures, the protection of the environment, consumer issues and the like.

The people who elected them do not in principle like the idea of large government and so they, at least in their rhetoric, proclaim the value of bringing government closer to the people and warn of the dangers of too much government intervention.

The significance of this is that the new liberals, although they would vigorously deny it, will not always support positions which are in the best interest of the black community. Many of the newer liberals, for example, are enthusiastic about the revenue sharing concept, which was the principal domestic "innovation" of the Nixon Administration. Although proposed as a means of returning government to "the people," revenue sharing is in reality simply a means of transferring the responsibility for the spending of government funds from the federal government, which has historically been the most responsive arm of government to the needs of minorities, to the cities and states, whose attitude towards racial progress has been far less progressive.

ANOTHER CASE of new liberal support for measures which are opposite the interests of blacks is the recent vote of Colorado Sen. Gary Hart (D) in opposition to modification of Senate Rule 22 to weaken the use of filibusters in the Senate. Those familiar with the history of the civil rights movement can recall numerous instances of the use of the filibuster by southerners and conservatives to block civil rights laws. Rule 22 was a formidable (and outrageously undemocratic) hurdle to black progress.

Since his arrival in Washington, Sen. Hart has established himself as a spokesman for the new liberalism in the Democratic Party. During his campaign, he was fond of observing that neither conservative nor liberal doctrine is relevant to issues such as "inflation, energy, the environment, campaign reform or congressional reform."

This may or may not be true, though one doubts that the energy crisis or environmental problems can be resolved through traditional conservative means.

The point, however, is that issues like congressional reform and the environment are defined by Sen. Hart and those who share his ideology as the crucial issues of our time. What, one may ask, about unemployment, the disastrous condition of the cities, the nationwide housing shortage and the awful toll which the lack of decent schooling is exacting from young blacks? Somehow Sen. Hart has gotten his priorities mixed up.

I have yet to see a rationalization for Hart's opposing reform of the filibuster rule. No doubt he has his reasons. The fact remains that he has aligned himself with forces which have again and again opposed the extension of the basic rights of minorities and working people, and has supported one of the worst legacies of the days of Dixiecrat domination in Congress.

Major Loopholes Remain:

Full-Scale Reforms Essential As Follow-Up on Tax Package

TAX CUT-REBATE legislation shaped by Congress is "overall an excellent package" to help spur the sagging economy, but leaves undone most of the comprehensive reform needed for tax law fairness and equity, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison said.

With about 90 percent of the money going to taxpayers earning less than $20,000 a year, nearly all of the $22.8 billion will go directly into the mainstream of U.S. production as low- and middle-income people buy durable goods they need but have delayed buying, Denison noted.

He said that if Congress hadn't rejected President Ford's idea of giving people in the highest income brackets up to $1,000 and next to nothing to the poor the biggest share of the rebates would have ended up in savings accounts or paying off past debts, and would have done little to put the nation's 9.1 million jobless back to work.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Denison said Congress should quickly turn to the matter of tax reform.

He said that not only has the tax burden shifted more and more on individual taxpayers and away from corporations over the years, but inflation has cut buying power while pushing individuals into higher brackets where federal taxes take a much greater part of their income.

Denison renewed labor's long-standing call to plug major loopholes in the tax laws, such as estate and gift taxes, capital gains and tax-free municipal bonds. He said that although Congress did take an important step toward ending oil depletion allowances, there are "many remaining abuses in the oil area—the intangible drilling allowance and others."

He said that a comprehensive program to revamp the tax code must be faced up to by Congress, not moved to back-burner status in the wake of the emergency tax-cut bill.

He said that the money applied to home-buying-credits in the emergency bill would have produced five times as many homes if it had been used for interest rate subsidies, the difference between 6 and 7 percent and the market rate. The biggest worry of Americans who need homes isn't the down payment, he asserted; the real problem is whether or not they can handle the monthly payments on the mortgage.

Denison was questioned by Donald Phillips of United Press International and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

ONE OF THE LEAST understood problems or issues on the national scene is that of malpractice insurance for doctors. A Senate Subcommittee on Health is holding hearings on malpractice insurance and it is hoped that it will bring to light more of the facts and dispel current myths about the problem.

Doctors, hospitals and patients face a crisis over the availability and cost of medical care unless the insurance issue is resolved.

The right of a patient to seek redress in the courts when mishandled by a doctor or a hospital is defended by the American Trial Lawyers Association as the "patient's right to litigate."

Yet the patient normally receives precious little of the money involved, and malpractice insurance premium costs are skyrocketing—rising from $61 million to an estimated $1 billion between 1960 and 1975.

"Many experts contend that as little as 16 cents of each premium dollar paid is actually recovered by the injured patient." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy said recently in a speech before the National Conference on Medical Malpractice in Arlington, Va. "The rest is consumed by court costs, legal fees and the multiplicity of other charges before reaching settlements.

"It is the patient who also pays in lost time under the present tort system of resolving malpractice disputes.

"It is the patient who also pays the indirect costs of the present system of medical malpractice. Recent opinion surveys report that between 50 and 70 percent of physicians polled said they engaged in various forms of defensive medicine."

Defensive medicine means that billions of dollars are spent each year on unnecessary X-rays, unnecessary laboratory tests, unnecessary hospitalizations and unnecessary doctor's visits.

KENNEDY IDENTIFIED some of the causes of the malpractice crisis:

Complexity of medicine—Specialization has contributed to the deterioration of the doctor-patient relationship. No longer is there a family doctor; rather there is Jack Jones, M.D., a professional corporation.

The insurance industry—According to its own data, more than one-third of each premium dollar goes for acquisition, production, administration and general company overhead. Even though the companies claim that losses incurred have exceeded premium income for every year since 1968, a substantial proportion of those losses represent the insurers' valuation of "future potential claims." They are not actual losses.

"I would like to know," Kennedy says, "just why malpractice insurance rates have doubled and tripled in the past two or three years, and I believe doctors and patients would like to know the answer as well. It is all too reminiscent of what happened to gas and oil prices during the Arab embargo."

State insurance commissioners—Kennedy says they have been negligent, impotent and ineffective. The problem of medical malpractice has traditionally been handled at the state level. "The time is overdue," he said, "for the federal government to take a more active role."

Attorneys and trial lawyers—A major share—over 50 percent of the malpractice premium goes to defense and plaintiff attorneys' fees, over half a billion dollars.

Kennedy proposes two measures to bring the federal government into the malpractice area. One would establish an insurance fund within the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to compensate patients for injuries received from medical care. It would be supported by premiums paid by doctors and other health providers. A second would establish a network in which all claims resulting from medical injury would be subject to non-binding arbitration.

Above all he believes the entire malpractice program should be linked with national health insurance, since most of the medically-related costs of injury would already be covered.

TAX-CUT AND REBATE legislation, though an "excellent package," leaves undone most of the major overhaul needed to bring the tax laws into line with fairness and justice, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Donald Phillips, left, of United Press International and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Labor's Action Plan: a 10-Week Report

Following is the text of a report from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller to Federation President George Meany.

ON JANUARY 23—10 weeks ago—the AFL-CIO General Board adopted an Action Program to Get America Back to Work.

This comprehensive, emergency program focused public attention on the President's potentially disastrous proposals and the failure of the Democratic-controlled Congress up to that time to develop its own equitable, effective, compassionate program.

Since the Action Program was adopted, there has been some action—action by the Administration in accepting some compromises and moderating some of its hard-line proposals and action by the Congress both on specific legislation and in developing its own program.

But much more remains to be done to restore economic health to America, put her unemployed citizens back to work and halt the dangerous economic downslide that continues unabated with no end yet in sight.

This, then, is a report on the actions taken thus far by the Administration, the Congress, the courts and the labor movement to implement the specifics of the AFL-CIO Action Program to Get America Back to Work.

The Action Program called for:

I. "An immediate tax cut of at least $20 billion, primarily for low- and middle-income taxpayers, to stimulate the economy through added purchasing power."

The House acted quickly on a tax cut of approximately $21 billion, significantly improving on the President's lopsided tax rebate scheme to benefit upper-income families by concentrating the benefits of tax cuts for low- and middle-income taxpayers.

However, on Feb. 20, the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted the daily worsening economy and called on the Senate to increase the tax cut to approximately $30 billion. The Senate swiftly passed a $30 billion tax cut proposal and, like the House, designed the tax cut to expand the purchasing power of those who need it the most and who would spend the money immediately to stimulate the economy.

A House-Senate conference committee promptly reported out a compromise bill containing a tax cut of nearly $25 billion. The bill, which was passed by the Congress and signed by the President despite threats he might veto it, is a substantial improvement on the President's initial rebate proposal. While varying in details from the AFL-CIO proposal, it meets our goal of concentrating benefits for low- and middle-income families, including those working poor who do not earn enough to pay income taxes.

As part of the tax-cut measure, the Congress substantially repealed the oil depletion allowance without delaying the tax cut, thus achieving a long-standing AFL-CIO objective. Because of the quick action by the Congress, the stimulus to the economy will begin in May.

It is imperative, however, that the Congress now begin to promptly work on closing the loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and the corporations, as the General Board stated on January 23. Closing these loopholes would raise about $30 billion in badly-needed federal general revenues, thus reducing the anticipated federal budget deficit while restoring equity to the tax structure.

II. "Immediate government measures to reduce America's dependence on imported oil and establishment of a fair and equitable system of allocation and rationing."

Action on this plank of the General Board's program has not been as swift as is necessary to meet the emergency. To date, the Congress has completed action on only two of the 10 specific steps the AFL-CIO General Board urged.

- It repealed the President's authority to impose a $3 per barrel duty on imported oil. While the President did veto this bill after he had imposed a $1 per barrel duty, he agreed to delay imposing the remaining $2 pending congressional action on an energy program. Thus, the President abandoned his hard-line position and sought a compromise with the Congress, and the Congress postponed an attempt to override the veto for the present time.

- As part of the tax-cut bill, the Congress eliminated the depletion allowance on foreign oil operations and moved to partially close the loophole by which international oil companies received a dollar-for-dollar credit against U.S. taxes for royalty and tax payments to foreign governments.

Additionally, the Congress has begun work on several of the other energy proposals made by the General Board. For example, House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Al Ullman (D-Ore.) has introduced a comprehensive energy proposal which is more equitable than the Administration proposal of rationing strictly by high price. Included in his bill is a quota on imports and creation of a government agency to handle oil imports—both key steps in our Action Program.

The Senate is debating a bill, S. 622, which would give the President standby authority to control production, allocation and consumption of fuel with veto power by the Congress. Obviously, standby authority is less preferable than a comprehensive, equitable, specific program enacted by the Congress.

The Environmental Protection Agency has extended the deadline on auto emission standards for one year, but any further extension, as called for in our Action Program, must be acted upon by the Congress.

Unless it has a last minute change of policy, the Administration still plans to ask the Congress to deregulate the price of "old" domestic oil (oil that is presently being produced from U.S. wells). If President Ford takes this unwarranted and inflationary step, the Congress will have only five days to block it. Therefore, it is imperative that senators and representatives know the labor movement strongly opposes the deregulation of domestic crude oil and natural gas.

III. "Immediate reduction of interest rates and allocation of credit for high-priority social and economic activities."

The Congress has passed a "sense of the Congress" resolution urging the Federal Reserve Board to increase monetary and credit supplies and to seek lower long-term interest rates. This is far from adequate.

Although the Federal Reserve Board has belatedly reduced the discount rate to 6¼ percent, it has done nothing to allocate credit to housing and other socially-useful areas.

Just prior to the General Board meeting, the Administration finally released $215 million in impounded funds for low-interest loans to developers of housing for the elderly and handicapped. Again, much more must be done.

The Congress took a first step by opposing the impoundment of $264 million in Section 235 housing assistance funds, but it may take a court suit to force the Administration to release these badly-needed funds for the depressed housing industry.

Additionally, the Congress is taking action on the following legislation of vital importance to the labor movement:

- The House passed the Emergency Middle Income Housing Act, HR 4485, which would provide a partial subsidy of mortgage interest rates for middle-income families who buy newly-constructed homes.

- The House Banking Committee has unanimously approved HR 5498, the Emergency Homeowners' Relief Act, which would provide federal loans of up to $250 a month for two years to homeowners who lose their jobs and are in danger of having their mortgages foreclosed.

IV. "Immediate, massive federal efforts to create jobs for the unemployed."

A combination of actions by the Administration, the Congress and the courts has released a substantial portion of the $19 billion in appropriated funds impounded by the President, as called for by our Action Program. These released funds include:

- $4 billion of the $9 billion of impounded funds for construction grants for sewers and waste treatment plants, released by the President on Jan. 27.

- The remaining $5 billion of these funds, ordered released by the Supreme Court on Feb. 19.

- $2 billion of nearly $4.4 billion of impounded funds for federal aid to highways, released by the President on Feb. 11. The following day, a U.S. District Court judge ruled the President did not have the power to impound highway funds, but this decision is being appealed.

The Congress also refused to agree to the impoundment of $284.7 million for hospital construction and modernization, as well as impoundments of more than $1.5 billion in various programs.

But the President has announced he intends to impound about $6 billion more in highway funds for Fiscal 1976. Hopefully, the courts will continue the trend of their present rulings and order these funds released.

The Congress is working on several job-creating programs supported by the AFL-CIO, including:

—A $5 billion Accelerated Public Works program, HR 5247, to provide grants to communities with high unemployment to enable them to step up short-term construction and repairs of public facilities. This bill would create a minimum of 250,000 on-site jobs and probably an equal number of support jobs.

—A $5.9 billion Emergency Employment Bill, HR 4481, to create jobs in the public and private sector which passed the House on Mar. 12 and is currently being considered by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

House and Senate Committees are working on similar bills that would create an additional 700,000 to one million public service jobs.

These bills are all in line with our Action Program. However, they face strong opposition from the Administration which argues they would increase the federal deficit.

Therefore it is important that senators and representatives understand that the principal cause of the budget deficit is unemployment. When the unemployed find jobs they will once again be taxpayers and the deficit will drop.

V. "Immediate action to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition."

The President has not attempted to use even the limited tools available to him under the Trade Act of 1974 to establish quotas on imports of industrial goods, impose import restrictions against countries whose trade practices discriminate against U.S. goods, or place export controls on raw materials and other products in short domestic supply.

The Congress, on the other hand, as part of the tax-cut package, has taken partial steps toward eliminating the deferral of tax payments on foreign-earned profits and repeal of the foreign tax credit, both called for in our Action Program. Legislation is pending that would repeal Section 806:30 and 807 of the Tariff Code which encourage foreign production for shipment back to U.S. markets.

VI. "Immediate government assistance to the unemployed to minimize their hardships."

As part of the tax-cut package, the Congress approved an additional 13 weeks of unemployment benefits to workers in certain states with high unemployment. If the Congress had not acted, an estimated 250,000 unemployed would have exhausted the 52 weeks of payments to which they are entitled under the special provision of the law triggered by serious unemployment.

But this stop-gap will expire on June 30. Hearings will begin soon on revamping the unemployment insurance system, including a guarantee that the temporary extended benefits are available for the full year.

Both the House and the Senate are moving rapidly on providing health insurance coverage to workers who lose their coverage under employer-employe plans when they become unemployed (HR 4003 and S. 625). Again, this is only a stop-gap, but the House Ways & Means Subcommittee on Health is planning hearings on national health insurance, as called for by the General Board.

While there has been no action on the welfare proposals made by the General Board, the Congress quickly blocked an Administration effort to make the poor and the unemployed pay more for food stamps.

As part of our Action Program, the General Board called on unions to undertake special programs to assist their unemployed members.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services is working with national public, private and voluntary agencies to better coordinate services to the unemployed on a local level. Many central bodies have established procedures to refer unemployed workers to assistance programs and cut through the administrative red tape that often delays receipt of food stamps or unemployment compensation.

The Human Resources Development Institute is working with central bodies in various ways from job counseling and referral to obtaining training funds to train unemployed workers to handle unemployment and food stamp claims. Hundreds of union halls are being used as emergency centers to process unemployment claims and for referrals to emergency assistance of all kinds.

Emergency conferences have been held by state AFL-CIO central bodies in 25 states—with at least 15 others scheduled shortly—to alert state officials and the general public to the crisis facing the unemployed. Other programs have been held in scores of localities, sometimes with the assistance of organizations like the A. Philip Randolph Institute. These conferences have been very effective in informing senators and representatives of the dimensions of the recession and the suffering of the people in their own states, and the grass roots support of the labor movement for our Action Program.

The General Board also opposed the President's proposed 5 percent ceiling on mandated cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security and other government retirement programs and a similar 5 percent ceiling on pay increases for federal employes.

The House Budget Committee has regrettably and shortsightedly made a tentative decision to go along with the President's proposal of a 5 percent ceiling on federal pay increases. Further, the Committee voted only a 7 percent increase in Social Security and other retirement programs. These decisions are clearly contrary to the public interest.

If the labor movement is to be successful in overturning this misguided action by the committee, senators and representatives must know that their constituents will not stand for unfair and inequitable burdens being placed on the elderly and government employes.

In summary, there has been action by the Congress and the Administration, but much more needs to be done and must be done if the economy is going to be turned around.

Passage of the tax cut and the blocking of efforts to increase the price of food stamps were major victories. But alone they will not restore economic health to America and jobs to the unemployed.

Therefore, it is my recommendation that all AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies redouble their efforts in support of our Action Program. This means visits to senators and representatives when they are home, letters and telephone calls in support of specific bills, working with state and local government officials to press for the release of impounded funds, and broad efforts to inform our members and the general public of our Action Progam and the ways it would help put America back to work.

Tax Cut Alone Not Enough:

Congress and Ford Pressed On Jobs Crisis Program

To keep up with fast-moving developments in Congress, Meany suggested that union leaders carefully read the AFL-CIO News "so that you can keep your members fully informed."

Biemiller's legislative report noted that the action program's first point, an immediate tax cut to stimulate the economy, has now become law and is a substantial improvement over President Ford's proposals.

While it differs in some details from the AFL-CIO plan, "it meets our goal of concentrating benefits for low- and middle-income families, including those working poor who do not earn enough to pay income taxes."

Biemiller welcomed repeal of the oil depletion allowance without delaying the tax cut, and termed it "imperative" for Congress to move promptly to close "loopholes of special tax privilege for the wealthy and the corporations."

He stressed that closing loopholes would raise about $30 billion in federal revenues, "thus reducing the anticipated federal budget deficit while restoring equity to the tax structure."

Action has been less swift on the General Board's call for an equitable system of allocation and rationing of oil to lessen America's dependence on imported oil.

Biemiller noted that an energy bill being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee is "more equitable" than the Administration proposal of using high prices as a form of rationing. The bill would include a quota on imports and creation of a government agency to handle oil imports—both part of the AFL-CIO's action program.

A compromise between Congress and the President followed passage of a bill repealing Ford's authority to go ahead with his plans for a $3 a barrel tariff on imported oil—which would have pushed living costs still higher. Ford vetoed the bill but then announced he would not act at this time to go beyond the first-step $1-a-barrel oil tariff he had already imposed. In return, Congress did not try to override the veto.

Biemiller stressed labor's continued strong opposition to deregulation of the price of domestic crude oil and natural gas.

On the AFL-CIO's call for "immediate reduction of interest rates" Congress passed a "far from adequate" resolution urging the Federal Reserve Board to increase the money supply and to seek lower long-term interest rates.

The House has passed a bill providing a partial subsidy of mortgage interest rates for middle-income families who buy new homes, and a House committee has approved a loan program to prevent foreclosures of homes of persons who lose their jobs.

On labor's call for "massive federal efforts to create jobs for the unemployed, action by the Administration, Congress and the courts has released a substantial portion of the $19 billion that had been impounded by presidential order from funds previously voted by Congress.

Further, Congress has refused to go along with Ford's proposal to rescind or impound funds voted for hospital modernization and other programs that would help the economy.

The House has already passed a $5.9 billion emergency employment bill that would increase funds for job-creating programs. Still in congressional committees are bills for accelerated public works and expansion of public service employment.

"These bills are all in line with our action program," Biemiller said. "However, they face strong opposition from the Administration which argues they would increase the federal deficit." Congress must understand, he stressed, that "when the unemployed find jobs they will once again be taxpayers and the deficit will drop."

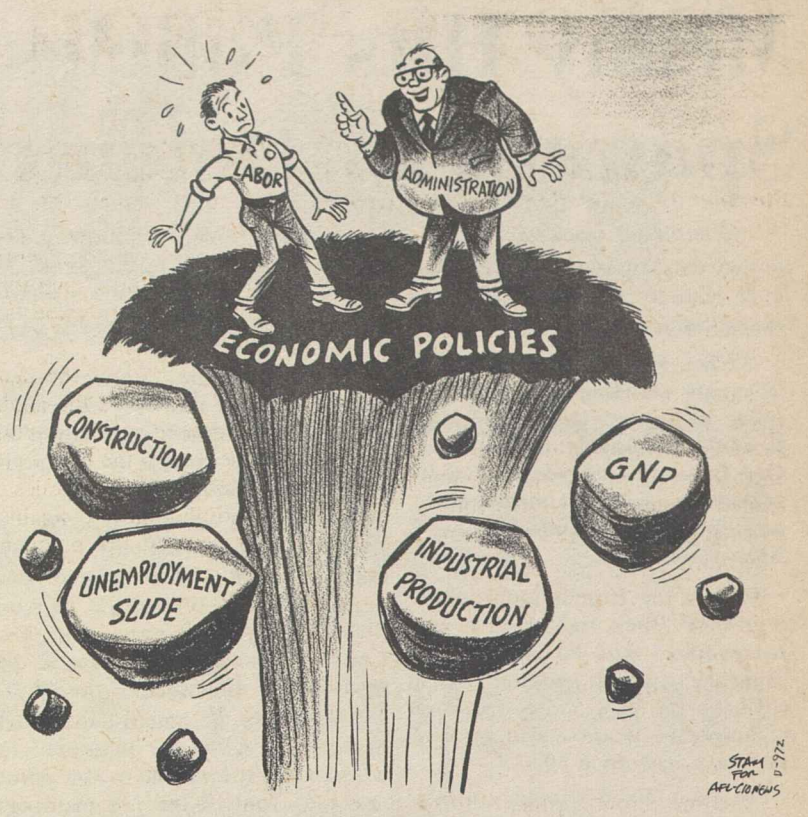
On the AFL-CIO call for protection of jobs against foreign competition, Biemiller noted that the President has made no use of even the limited tools available under the 1974 Trade Act to shield U.S. jobs. Congress has taken some partial steps towards closing loopholes in taxation of profits earned abroad. And legislation has been introduced to repeal two sections of the Tariff Code that encourage foreign production for shipment back to U.S. markets.

On immediate aid to the unemployed, Biemiller's legislative report cited the temporary extension of a program providing an additional 13 weeks of jobless benefits in states with the highest unemployment. And it noted the need to continue the program beyond its scheduled June 30 expiration date.

House and Senate committees are acting on legislation to provide health insurance for workers who lose their coverage when they become unemployed. And Congress decisively blocked an Administration effort to make the poor and unemployed pay more for food stamps.

In terms of labor's own contribution, the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept. and the Human Resources Development Institute have been working to cut red tape, speed emergency assistance and provide job counseling. Statewide conferences have focused attention on the problems of unemployment—and on labor's solutions.

'Relax, We'll Be Okay!'



St. Louis Carpenters Finance Home Loans

St. Louis—Trustees of the AFL-CIO Carpenters District Council Pension Fund here have made an additional $1.5 million available for new home loans in the council's 22-county area. The amount brings to $9.3 million the total that the trustees have provided for new home loans in eastern Missouri.

Ollie W. Langhorst, executive secretary-treasurer of the council, explained that the program is designed to boost new home sales, thereby creating jobs for the union's members.

"What started as a program to accelerate the growth of the pension fund has become a recession-fighting measure for AFL-CIO carpenters in this area," Langhorst said.

In the five years the program has been in existence, it has accounted for 248 homes built in the council's area, Langhorst said. This has meant from 500 to 1,000 manhours of work per house for carpenters alone, he observed.

Langhorst said the council launched the program in 1971 when it turned over a $2.5 million check to General American Life Insurance Co. of St. Louis. At that time tight money was curtailing housing construction in the area.

The pension fund trustees have found that investing in St. Louis area homes pays better than putting money in stocks and other securities, Langhorst said.

"All the money in our home mortgage fund is invested in new family housing," he said. "So far we have not had a single foreclosure."

The income from the housing fund earned much more than was returned by the pension trust's previous stock market investments, he noted, even though instructions were given to furnish the mortgage money at a rate .5 to 1 percent below market if necessary to insure good quality risks."

An insurance firm official said the Carpenters' fund last year earned 7.87 percent, compared with 7.66 percent in 1973.

The council's experience "has convinced us that it is not only smart investment policy, but good sense, to put as much money as possible and prudent to work in the St. Louis housing market," Langhorst said. "This produces paychecks for our members who have been hit hard by the slump in housing construction."

Official Jobless Rate Rises to 8.7%, 1.1 Million More Give Up Search

The number of unemployed persons increased by 500,000 from February to March on a seasonally adjusted basis. At 8 million, the total number of officially counted jobless workers last month was 3.1 million above the August 1974 level when joblessness began its rapid climb.

"More than two-thirds of the increased unemployment in March can be traced to job loss, as the number of persons who lost their last job rose to 4.4 million," BLS said.

Since last August, the number of job losers has gone up by 2.3 million—about 700,000 women and 1.6 million men. This rise accounted for more than three-fourths of the overall increase in unemployment during the period, BLS said.

The March rise in joblessness was shared by virtually all worker groups. Rates were near or above all-time highs for adult women, 8.5 percent; teenagers, 20.6 percent; whites, 8 percent; blacks, 14.2 percent, household heads, 5.8 percent, and full-time workers, 8.3 percent.

The increases in the rates for adult men and married men over the month were particularly sharp, BLS reported. The rate for adult men rose from 6.2 to 6.8 percent while that for married men went from 4.7 to 5.2 percent.

The jobless rate for black teenagers shot up from 36.7 percent in February to an astounding 41.6 percent. The March rate for white teenagers was 18.1 percent, up from 17.5 percent the previous month.

Joblessness among construction workers also rose sharply, from 15.9 percent in February to 18.1 last month. Blue-collar workers experienced an increase in their rate from 10.9 to 12.5 percent over the month, more than double the 6 percent level a year earlier.

The rate for manufacturing workers climbed for the 10th consecutive month, rising from 11 to 11.4 percent from February to March. Like the blue-collar rate, the factory jobless level was more than double the year-earlier rate of 5 percent.

Long-term unemployment, a key "hardship" measure of joblessness, worsened further in March. The number of persons unemployed for 15 weeks or more increased by 169,000 over the month to just under two million, or 1,171,000 more than a year earlier. BLS noted that 25.3 percent of the total number of jobless workers in March had been without employment for 15 weeks or longer.

Meany pointed out that the 500,000 additional workers who joined the government's jobless rolls in March are the equivalent of more than the total working population of New Hampshire.

"It is as if the entire state of New Hampshire had been shut down," he said.

Total employment fell by nearly 200,000 in March to 83,849,000. Although the decline was not as large as in earlier months, it marked the sixth straight month of employment reductions, which have totaled 2.6 million since last September.

The number of "discouraged" workers—persons not seeking jobs because they believe they cannot find them—at a record 1.1 million in the first quarter of 1975 reached the highest level since these statistics were first reported in 1967.

The "discouraged worker" figures are produced only quarterly. Until this year, the number of such workers has fluctuated cyclically within a range of 550,000 to 850,000, BLS noted. Since the third quarter of 1974, the number of discouraged workers has risen by nearly half a million.

"A large proportion of the discouraged are younger or older workers, women and blacks—groups who experience the greatest difficulty in finding jobs," BLS said. Blacks, for example, accounted for about 30 percent of the discouraged total in the first quarter, a much larger ratio than their proportion of the labor force (11 percent).

BLS Commissioner Julius Shiskin, in testimony before the congressional Joint Economic Committee the day the employment figures were released, called the unemployment situation "extremely serious."

Fight for Jobs Key to Rally, Abel Declares

The Industrial Union Department's Rally for Jobs Now, set for Washington on Apr. 26, is designed to "back up the AFL-CIO's fight for jobs and for programs to end this needless recession," IUD President I. W. Abel declared.

It is necessary, Abel said, to "remind the Administration, the Congress and the public that we must move forward on a broad economic front to provide Americans with jobs. We don't mean sometime, or next year we mean now."

The three-hour rally planned for the Kennedy Memorial Stadium will be opened by Abel. Officers of three IUD affiliates will be among the speakers: Glenn E. Watts, president of the Communications Workers; Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing Workers.

Several members of Congress will also speak, IUD Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman said.

G. J. Feaster Named Aide to Grospiron

Denver—George J. Feaster was named administrative assistant to President A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Feaster succeeds Robert Goss, who had been elected a vice president of the union. Feaster joined the OCAW staff in 1960 as an international representative and had been an assistant to OCAW Vice President Elwood D. Swisher since 1964.

warned that Israeli "intransigence" could lead to a "reassessment" of United States support.

"When you say to a friend of 27 years standing that you are going to reassess that friendship, it could reasonably be assumed that in some way you find that friendship no longer meaningful, perhaps even embarrassing," Meany observed.

He said the Israelis aren't about to give up "their right to live as a free people." And he pledged that "Histadrut and the people of Israel will have the help and cooperation of America's workers the same as they have had since 1924."

President Ford should consider reassessing "this thing called detente," Meany suggested.

The concept of detente, he declared, has not deterred the Communists from "naked aggression in Indochina, political blackmail in the Middle East combined with threats of force, an outrageous putsch in Portugal, a heating up of the cold war in Korea and a diplomatic and propaganda war in international institutions."

It defies common sense, Meany said, to suppose that the "disasters" in these areas "have no relation to our policies or to the overall policies of the Communist world."

To the Communist powers, Meany asserted, the term "peaceful co-existence" is a mere propaganda slogan. While the United States accepts the status quo, the Communists use every tactic to seize power and weaken the West.

Meanwhile, he noted, the United States has seen its influence in world affairs diminish to the point that only four of the 120 members of the United Nations opposed recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization—"an organization openly espousing violence and murder."

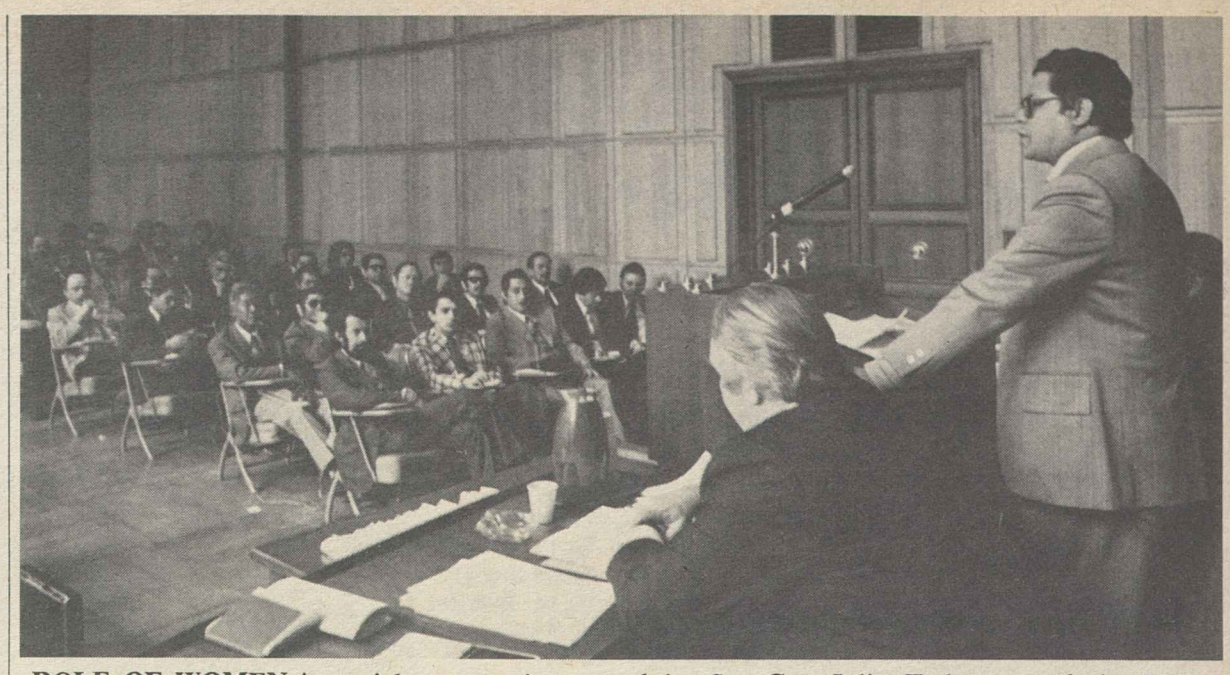
Just as UNESCO has become "a propaganda pawn for the Soviet Union," Meany warned that the International Labor Organization is moving in the same direction.

Meany said the responsibility for failure to meet America's continuing responsibilities in Vietnam must be shared by both Congress and the Administration.

"The President and his Secretary of State cannot forever sing the soothing lullabies of detente and expect the American people and their representatives in Congress to support a strong national defense coupled with a vigorous defense of freedom in the world."

Meany declared that "America will be strong only if its people believe there is a need to be strong."

He warned that President Ford "cannot—any more than his predecessor—resolve the contradiction of proclaiming detente on the one hand and demanding of the American people a continuing level of vigilance and sacrifice for the cause of freedom."



ROLE OF WOMEN in social progress is stressed by Sec.-Gen Julio Etcheverry of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) at graduation exercises of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. Thirty-eight trade unionists from 15 Latin American countries were in the 58th AIFLD training program conducted at Front Royal, Va.

Ship Unions Back Vietnamese Sealift

America's maritime unions pledged their full support and willingness to participate in U.S. efforts to rescue victims of the war in Vietnam.

"The seagoing affiliates of the AFL-CIO are ready to assist in this humane effort," the federation's Maritime Trades Dept. declared in a resolution.

"As they have done on numerous occasions in the past," the resolution continued, "the American shipping unions and maritime workers pledge their full efforts to the successful completion of the Vietnamese sealift and evacuation. The desperate plight of these innocent victims of war cries out for help."

Texas Airline Walkout Wins Major Gains

Houston — The Air Line Employees Association concluded its four-month strike against Texas International Airlines with ratification of a new 32-month contract. The agreement provides an estimated 40 percent increase in wages over its term.

ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said the contract would raise top salaries to $17,160 for chief station agents, $16,980 for chief reservation agents, and $13,260 for chief accounting clerks. The contract, covering 1,100 workers, is retroactive to last Aug. 1.

The union and the airline settled their contract differences on Mar. 13, Herbert said, but final settlement was delayed while back-to-work agreements were worked out for ALEA members and for 900 members of four other unions that supported the strike.

Herbert noted that the Air Lines Pilots, the Flight Attendants, the Machinists and the Transport Workers—all of whom had members employed by the Houston-based carrier—gave 100 percent support to the walkout.

ALEA, an affiliate of the Pilots, struck the Texas airline last Dec. 1 after the firm refused to reach agreement through arbitration. It was the union's first strike against the carrier in 22 years of representing its workers.

In addition to salary increases, the new agreement provides for a better pension plan, insurance improvements, added job security, a 10th paid holiday and an improved vacation schedule.

ALEA noted that Texas International was eligible to collect $10.8 million in benefits under the airline industry's so-called Mutual Aid Pact, the anti-labor agreement that has helped prolong strikes against many of the nation's air carriers.

Texas International serves 70 cities in a nine-state area of the Southwest and in Mexico.

New Construction Panel To Assist Bargaining

A labor-management Collective Bargaining Committee in Construction is being set up under an executive order by President Ford to encourage peaceful negotiations through effective bargaining in the industry.

The committee will consist of 10 representatives from labor and 10 from management who will be appointed by Ford. Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop will serve as chairman and W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, will participate as a committee member.

The committee will have no enforcement authority to reduce or disallow negotiated wage increases as the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee had when economic controls were in effect, but it will be able to make settlement recommendations in contract disputes.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. sees the new committee as "a forum where progress could be made, but only the future will tell."

He said the committee would interest itself in collective bargaining and attempt to improve it where possible, would seek ways to develop better and quicker methods of settling disputes and would deal with manpower problems and work volume within the relationship that exists between the federal government and the construction industry.

"Most important," Georgine said, "everyone should know that we have no stabilization responsibilities or authority. If the committee has meaningful discussions, it could mean progress for the construction industry. We start out with the advantage that every single member of the committee is knowledgeable in construction and deeply involved in it, so we have a group of people talking about things they're expert in."

The prime functions of the committee will be to facilitate the collective bargaining process at the local and regional level, help create a data bank on wages and benefits, encourage peaceful negotiations of "responsible" agreements, encourage local and regional coordinated bargaining where appropriate, and seek to resolve disputes that can't be settled through other means.

Ford's executive order gives the committee authority to hold meetings with parties involved in disputes and to make recommendations aimed at reaching agreement. It also is mandated to promote effective machinery to resolve disputes, "which recognizes the interests of each branch of the industry and preserves existing procedures that have been effective."

The committee's other functions include:

- Review and analyze manpower needs and availability under collective bargaining agreements.
- Study measures to reduce job instability and provide for more weeks of work per year.
- Consider means to increase productivity under collective bargaining agreements.
- Improve wage and benefits data to facilitate local and regional bargaining and widen the role of national organizations in disputes settlements.
- Consider problems arising from the activities of federal agencies.
- Encourage development of joint local or regional committees comparable to the federal panel.

Variable Interest Held No Aid to Homebuyers

Variable interest rates on home mortgages won't help either the housing industry or home buyers, AFL-CIO President George Meany said.

He urged House and Senate subcommittees to "totally reject" a proposal by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to authorize federally chartered savings and loan associations to issue mortgages carrying fluctuating interest rates. The interest charge would move up or down on a scale keyed to the return on corporate bond issues.

Meany said this would aggravate inflation by raising mortgage payments at a time when homeowners are hardest hit by inflation and workers suffer a loss of buying power of their paychecks.

Further, he said, the amount of added revenue wouldn't be of any significant help to savings institutions competing for money. If anything, they would be under pressure to invest funds in other types of loans, thus further slowing the flow of mortgage money.

Meany wrote members of the House and Senate panels dealing with the legislation that "the AFL-CIO sees nothing to be gained and much to be lost from this proposal."

The real problem, he suggested, is that during periods of restrictive monetary policy—the tool that recent administrations have used to combat inflation—bank funds tend to be channeled into investments other than housing.

The solution, Meany suggested, is for the government to make use of powers that it has had but never used to allocate credit.

on civil service and railroad retirement payments.

There is no reason for government employes to bear the brunt of the economy move, McClennan stressed in letters to the Democratic and Republican leaders of the House and Senate. "No group in the private sector of the economy is being asked to make any similar sacrifice."

McClennan, who heads the Fire Fighters, also strongly urged approval of a package of emergency aid to cities proposed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.). It would be "foolhardy and dangerous" to refuse the assistance, McClennan said.

Inflation won't be halted by "panicky steps" to hold down government spending, he said. The "road to economic health" lies in reducing unemployment and stimulating the economy.

McClennan cited estimates that each 1 percent of unemployment costs the nation about $15 billion a year.

Full employment is the answer, he said, not "ill-considered measures that will make the recession worse, will do nothing to halt inflation, and will cause widespread human distress."

Mortgage Aid Bill Clears House by Strong Majority

U.S. Output Off 10.4% In Quarter

The nation's economy turned in its worst performance of any quarter since the depression of the 1930s in the January-March period, as real gross national product dropped off by an adjusted annual rate of 10.4 percent, the Commerce Dept. reported.

The sharp decline in the value of the country's total output of goods and services "underscores how difficult it is to move the economy back up to where it was" in 1973 before the recession started, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger observed.

The decline was the fifth consecutive quarterly drop in real GNP, casting further doubt that economic recovery is anywhere yet in sight.

Announcement of the continued slide in GNP came on the heels of other government reports showing the housing industry still slumping, industrial production down for the sixth month in a row, unemployment insurance claims mounting, and auto sales off sharply.

The rate of inflation dropped, however. The overall price rise during the three months was at an annual rate of 8 percent, down from the 14.4 percent of the previous quarter and the lowest since mid-1973.

The first-quarter drop in real GNP followed downturns of 9 percent in the previous quarter, 1.9 percent in the third quarter of 1974, 1.6 percent in last year's spring quarter and 7 percent in the opening months of 1974.

Earlier, the Federal Reserve Board reported industrial production fell by 1 percent in March, due largely to lower production of business equipment, construction products and industrial materials.

In a separate report, the Fed noted that factories operated at only 68.3 percent of capacity in the first three months of the year, down from 75.7 percent in the 1974 fourth quarter and below the previous record low of 72.5 percent in the second quarter of 1958.

Other gloomy economic news came from the Labor Dept.'s weekly figures on unemployment insurance claims. Twenty-four states reported higher volumes, with 6,369,000 workers drawing benefits in the week ended Mar. 29. An additional 554,300 new claims were filed in the week ended Apr. 5.

Housing starts and new permits for future housing construction, meanwhile, dropped to their second-lowest rates on record in March, the Commerce Dept. said. The number of new homes begun that month ran at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 980,000.

Plan Seeks to Avert Home Foreclosures

By David L. Perlman

Congress moved to avert a flood of home foreclosures in the wake of rising unemployment that is forcing thousands of homeowners to default on their mortgage payments.

Despite Administration hostility, the House voted 321-21 for a program of government loans of up to $250 a month to unemployed persons who would otherwise lose their homes.

A similar bill has already been approved by the Senate's Banking, Housing & Urban Affairs Committee along with a package of other housing assistance measures.

The home foreclosure bill had strong labor support and the AFL-CIO Executive Council stressed at its February meeting the "urgent need" for the legislation.

As passed by the House, homeowners threatened with foreclosure could obtain a government loan not exceeding $250 a month for a maximum of two years to meet mortgage payments, including taxes and insurance.

The property involved must be the principal residence of the homeowner, unemployment or underemployment must have been involuntary, the loans would have to be repaid and there would have to be a reasonable expectation that mortgage payments could be resumed after a period of government help.

The legislation authorizes up to $500 million in government loans over the next three years, an amount considered adequate to help up to 300,000 homeowners.

The last time Congress tackled the problem of home foreclosures resulting from an unemployment crisis was during the depression of the 1930s. The result was the Home Owners Loan Corp., established in 1933, to refinance mort-

Job Losses Heavy for Adult Men

Rising joblessness hit men harder than women and teenagers in the first three months of the year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, and its impact over the past year has been particularly heavy on male family breadwinners.

In an analysis of overall trends in the nation's labor force during the first quarter of 1975, BLS reported that "employment of adult women (at 29.8 million) was the same as a year ago, but adult male and teenage employment were 1.3 million and 500,000, respectively, lower than a year earlier."

Unemployment over the three-month period jumped by 1.6 million, to a total of 7.7 million, pushing the jobless rate to an average 8.3 percent. The rate compares with 6.6 percent in the final quarter of 1973.

At the end of the quarter, the national unemployment rate was 8.7 percent with 8 million workers without jobs, a pace that is expected to quicken by midsummer, most observers believe.

Deadly Risk to Workers:

Unions Press Curb On Toxic Chemicals

By John R. Oravec

Hazardous chemicals are a deadly risk to millions of workers and their families, the AFL-CIO warned in calling for swift congressional action on legislation to control toxic substances.

A strong bill is needed to fill the gap existing in current environmental and occupational health legislation to protect both the public and the nation's workers, a Senate Commerce subcommittee was told by five representatives of organized labor.

The bill before the Senate would give the Environmental Protection Agency authority to screen all toxic substances before they are introduced in the workplace.

"We are particularly concerned over the alarming incidence of occupational illnesses in the workplaces of America," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

"These diseases not only incapacitate; they kill. And the effects can be carried into the next generation."

The chemical revolution—which has spawned the development of thousands of new substances every year—carries a deadly risk to the entire environment, affecting consumers and workers alike, Biemiller declared.

Organized labor has supported the passage of toxic substance controls in the last three Congresses, but in each instance the effort fell short. Last year, measures were approved by both houses of Congress before the legislation died in conference.

Biemiller pointed out that while controls are placed on numerous consumer products before they are sold over the counter, no such protection for workers is provided in the Occupational Safety & Health Act and thousands of chemicals are used in industry that have not been screened. Only when a substance

More Public TV Aid, U.S. Programs Urged

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to provide more federal funds for non-commercial public broadcasting and to require that programs financed by tax dollars be produced in the United States, not purchased from other countries.

The federation's testimony was presented by Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees, at House hearings. A Commerce subcommittee headed by Rep. Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.) is considering a bill that would provide an automatic flow of federal funds to public broadcasting over a five-year period, keyed to federal grants of up to $1 for each $2.50 raised from non-government sources.

Golodner endorsed the concept of the bill but urged approval of a higher dollar ceiling than the Administration has proposed. A higher federal payment has been sought by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which disperses the funds.

Golodner praised the CPB for its production grants to develop qual-

Minimum Wage Brief Refutes State Challenge

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to reject a states' rights interpretation of the Constitution that would deny protection of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act to 3.4 million public employes.

Congress brought them under the wage-hour law a year ago, but the National League of Cities and the State of California has blocked enforcement of the law through a constitutional challenge now before the Supreme Court.

At issue is the right of Congress to require local governments to comply with the minimum pay and overtime standards imposed on private employers. The suit by the cities particularly challenges the regulation of overtime pay for fire fighters and police officers.

Although the Supreme Court in 1968 had upheld the constitutionality of an earlier extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to certain groups of public workers, the composition of the court has changed since then, and the city governments contend that the two cases are not identical.

The AFL-CIO, in a brief supporting the Labor Dept. position for enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act, said Congress properly brought public employes under RALLY FOR PASSAGE of National Health Security legislation in the 94th Congress is launched at a strategy meeting of the Committee for National Health Insurance. AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller presides at a luncheon session. From left are Presidents William Sidell of the Carpenters, Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers and Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chief Senate sponsor of the bill.

At 2-Day Conference:

Strong Push Given Health Security Bill

By James M. Shevis

A Washington conference on National Health Security mapped strategy to press for enactment of the program by the 94th Congress with an all-out drive in the months ahead.

"This is a much more responsive Congress than we had last year," Leonard Woodcock, Auto Workers president and chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance, told some 300 delegates representing state, local and national organizations supporting Health Security.

"We are going to make a major fight to get national health insurance legislation out of this session of Congress," Woodcock declared.

"Two hundred years ago, our nation was founded on certain principles and defined rights," he noted. " 'To Provide for the Common Welfare.' 'Unalienable Rights' —among them, the rights to life and to the pursuit of happiness.

"Have we provided for the common welfare when adequate health care is not available to the American people?"

Speaker after speaker at the two-day conference left little doubt of the answer.

Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.), a principal advocate of national health insurance, told the rally the country's medical bill now is $110 billion a year, "and there are big gaps" in the care citizens receive.

"The poor don't get the care they need and the middle class are forced to pay everything they have," he said. The bill he has introduced in the House would close these gaps, Corman said, making health care a basic American right.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has sponsored a similar measure in the Senate, said the Corman-Kennedy version of national health insurance is the "only bill that would provide a health insurance program as a birthright."

Introduced by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller as one who "has been in the forefront of the fight" for national health care for years, Kennedy noted the bill he filed in the Senate this year "goes farther than any other proposal to control health-care costs and assure every American family the health care it needs as a matter of right. . . .

"The proposal has been further improved for the 94th Congress by the Committee for National Health Insurance and the leadership of America's trade-union movement," he said.

Besides Woodcock, Corman and Kennedy, the delegates heard speakers in discussion groups explain how Health Security would deal with specific problems.

Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, spoke on how Health Security would reform the delivery system. One big virtue, he said, is that "neither the patient nor the doctor need be concerned about payment for services rendered."

Under Health Security, bills would be fully paid through a trust fund with the federal government providing half the necessary financing from general revenues. The other half would come from a 1 percent tax on individual earners and a 2.5 percent tax on the self-employed, up to $20,000 a year, and a 3.5 percent tax on employers' payrolls.

Nelson Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, discussed how Health Security would benefit the aged and the chronically ill.

Melvin A. Glasser, director of social security for the Auto Workers, pointed out that under Health Security, workers would pay less for quality health care than they now pay in private health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket expenses.

The discussion workshops were led by President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers; President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers; President James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks; President Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; President William Sidell of the Carpenters; President Arnold Miller of the Mine Workers; Nancy Perlman, director of program development for the State, County & Municipal Employees; Robert Strauber, education director for the Rubber Workers; Terry E. Herndon, executive secretary of the National Education Association; and Dr. Grover C. Bagby, associate general-secretary, board of church and society, United Methodist Church.

Purchasing Power, Job Security Key Issues in 1975 Bargaining

Even though the 1975 collective bargaining schedule is comparatively light, union negotiators still face a difficult year.

Two members of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, Rick Galleher and Patrick F. Mason, tell why in the March issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

"Collective bargaining in 1975 will be charged with the difficult task of negotiating agreements that will maintain and regain enough real purchasing power for workers to help form a basis for economic recovery while protecting workers' jobs in a severe recession," the authors observe.

Galleher, an economist, and Mason, a research assistant, note that last year's bargaining was carried out under conditions "almost unprecedented in their difficulty."

Inflation in 1974 rose over the year at the fastest rate since the end of World War II. Workers continued to see their buying power steadily decline. And the economy slid into the nation's worst recession since the 1930s.

In spite of these conditions, the article notes, collective bargaining last year made some substantial advances beyond wages and traditional fringes in such areas as cost-of-living clauses, supplementary unemployment benefits and job security.

This year's bargaining on major agreements—those covering 1,000 or more workers—embraces 2.5 million workers in the private, nonfarm sector, down sharply from the 5.2 million in 1974 and the 5 million in 1973.

The 1975 bargaining will be heaviest in the construction industry, with about 750,000 workers covered by contracts expiring or providing for reopeners. Negotiations this year also will affect more than 600,000 postal workers not counted in the private industry bargaining total.

Other key industries in which contracts are up for negotiation this year include petroleum, food, lumber, transportation—primarily airlines and maritime—retail trade, apparel and gas and electric utilities.

Most of the contracts expiring in 1975 were last negotiated during the economic controls period of the Nixon Administration when workers saw their wages restrained while prices continued to climb.

Galleher and Mason make these additional points about workers' wages this year:

- Deferred wage increases due in 1975 will bring 6.7 million workers wage boosts averaging 5.1 percent, or just over 30 cents an hour. In manufacturing, deferred increases will average 4.4 percent, or 22.2 cents; non-manufacturing gains will average 5.9 percent, or 39.5 cents.

In 1974, the average deferred increases were 4.6 percent for manufacturing and 5.5 percent in non-manufacturing for an overall rate of 5 percent.

- Deferred wage increases in contracts containing escalator clauses will average 4.4 percent for the 4.6 million covered. Contracts with deferred wage increases, but not containing escalator clauses, will average 6.5 percent and cover 2.2 million.

When deferred wage increases are combined with fringe benefits, the total deferred increases will average 5.7 percent during 1975 in agreements covering 5,000 workers or more. That compares to 6.2 percent in 1974 and 5.4 percent in 1973.

- For contracts expiring in 1975, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that in their previous negotiations under controls, the bargainers won an average annual increase of 6.8 percent, or 8.1 percent when subsequent cost-of-living increases are included.

The authors note that last year's spiraling inflation saw consumer prices rise at an average rate of 11 percent for the full year, almost double the annual average rate of 6.2 percent in 1973 which in turn was another sharp jump from the 3.3 percent in 1972.

"The rates of inflation in 1974 and 1973 were the largest 12-month rises since World War II price controls were lifted," the article points out.

Among the leading trends in 1974 bargaining, escalator provisions highlighted many negotiations. Galleher and Mason note that more than 3 million workers were covered by such wage protective clauses in settlements last year. This brought the total number of workers under major bargaining agreements with such protection to 5.3 million.

Meany Urges Aid For Viet Refugees

New York — Vietnamese who have fled by the hundreds of thousands from the "peace of tyranny" deserve the same humanitarian assistance accorded other waves of refugees, AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a message to the International Rescue Committee. The occasion was a Freedom Award dinner honoring Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky.

Meany noted "the indescribable tragedy unfolding in Vietnam" for vast numbers of "innocent men, women and children."

And he expressed indignation that the "humanitarian effort by the United States to rescue innocent and defenseless people, including orphans, from the near certainty of slaughter has come under shocking attack from those whose commitment to the triumph of communism, or indifference to it, is untempered by the slightest tremor of compassion."

Conference Focuses On Civil Rights

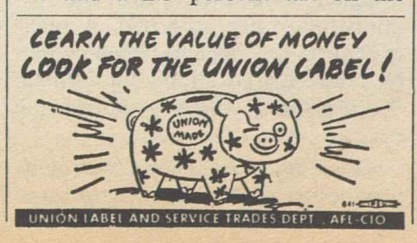
Full implementation of the civil rights policies of the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions was explored at a two-day seminar at the federation's Labor Studies Center.

The 42 participants from 29 affiliates also discussed the administration of federal and state civil rights laws dealing with non-discriminatory clauses in collective bargaining agreements.

The two-day conference of lectures, discussions and workshops was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and the Labor Studies Center.

Union civil rights representatives were briefed on ways to guide their locals in meeting the requirements of Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act governing seniority rules and layoff procedures. The focus of the discussions was on the voluntary conformity to the civil rights code covering discrimination against minorities and women.

Other areas of study included efforts to have employers eliminate various forms of discrimination on hiring, work and layoff practices, guidelines for meeting federal contract compliance and legal implications of recent court rulings in civil rights cases.



Construction Trades Parley Keyed to Jobs

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. will look into problems of unemployed craftsmen and the depressed economy at its National Jobs Conference Apr. 21 which is expected to draw about 3,000 delegates.

Department President Robert A. Georgine said the one-day conference will investigate conditions in public works, highway and mass transportation, housing, joblessness, impoundment of federal funds, energy and the environment.

Position papers and resolutions adopted by the delegates will be delivered to all members of Congress the following day. BCTD representatives also will present statements before 10 Senate and House committees which have called special hearings dealing with the problems facing the construction industry and its more than 1 million unemployed workers.

Participating in the conference will be delegates selected by 399 local and 33 state Building & Construction Trades Councils.

In outlining the format of the conference, Georgine noted that it comes at a time when the construction industry is afflicted with the worst depression since the 1930s, resulting in ever mounting unemployment among the members of the 17 BCTD affiliated unions.

Delegates will focus their attention on three key areas: Detailed reports on the problems facing workers, proposals by BCTD union presidents dealing with the nation's economic crisis, and a department program for action to stabilize the economy and put the nation back to work.

At New Mexico Conference:

Latin Union Council Maps Programs for Expansion

By Rex Hardesty

Albuquerque, N.M.—A national structure with eight districts and a program to prepare for the 1976 election were adopted at the first national membership meeting of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

The meeting drew 145 delegates from 25 LCLAA chapters in 12 states, but another 141 Latino trade unionists attended as "observers," presaging further growth for the two-year-old organization.

The new district structure replaces the five districts set up at the group's founding meetings in 1973. The group also adopted a constitution stressing its role as a voter education organization and elected seven national officers.

Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the meeting that 73 percent of whites and 65 percent of blacks were registered in 1972, while only 49.4 percent of the Spanish population was registered.

Both Clayman and Don Slaiman, deputy director of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services, related the current 8.7 percent unemployment to previous election losses and Nixon-Ford Administration policies. But Clayman held out the hope that "only in times of adversity is meaningful social reform accomplished," as in the wake of the 1930s.

The LCLAA districts make California, Texas, Florida and Illinois districts of their own, with Michigan and Ohio forming District 3, Arizona, Utah and Nevada combined in District 5, New Mexico and Colorado in District 6 and New York, Connecticut and New Jersey as District 7.

The financial report to the meeting stated that $44,000 had already been received or pledged from the AFL-CIO and international unions in 1975. The group hopes that further contributions from international unions and membership dues would enable the LCLAA to add a research specialist to its national headquarters staff and conduct two 1975 educational conferences to get ready for the 1976 elections.

The meeting adopted a dues structure of $15 per year per member, with $5 to be returned to local chapters, and empowered the executive board to suspend dues in the case of senior citizens or workers hit by layoffs.

Several resolutions adopted by the group also thanked the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions for the manpower assistance that enabled the LCLAA to begin voter registration activities in the 1974 elections. Other resolutions pledged continued close relations with the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the National Council of Senior Citizens, Frontlash, the Coalition of Labor Union Women and Auto Workers' voter education projects.

Officers elected at the two-day meeting included two new vice presidents—Henry Lacayo of the Auto Workers and Louise G. Olguin of the Retail Clerks.

LCLAA President Ray Mendoza of the Laborers was re-elected, as were Vice Presidents J. F. Otero of the Railway & Airline Clerks, Maria Portalatin of the Teachers and Franklin Garcia of the Meat Cutters and Sec.-Treas. Maclovio Barraza of the Steelworkers. Paul Montemayor of the Steelworkers is executive director, and the committee also elected 44 other board members.

A slide presentation by the National Council of La Raza emphasized the potential voting power of Latinos, and the meeting received more tangible evidence in the dual appearance of the nation's two Spanish-surnamed governors—Raul Castro of Arizona and Jerry Apodaca of New Mexico.

The meeting also heard from Peter MacDonald, chairman of the Navajo Tribal Council, whose 1974 political work in getting out the vote paralleled that of LCLAA. MacDonald recounted many of the same language problems in voter registration related by LCLAA speakers, with the added dimension that the structure of the Navajo chapters dictated "that a person whose chapter was located in Utah had to vote in Arizona."

Raul Yzaguirre and Roberto Olivas of La Raza estimated that the Latino population of the United States totaled 10.8 million in 1970.

LCLAA and La Raza plan continued cooperation in compiling a voter profile of the Latino community, with special emphasis on congressional districts and precincts in which Latinos are a minority but total more than the traditional margin of victory.

The revised constitution adopted at the meeting states that LCLAA "will not endorse candidates for political office." That language, replacing a ban on LCLAA support of rivals to labor-endorsed candidates, was passed after legal advice that endorsements could get the group into conflict with federal election law or force it to forego contributions from unions.

ELECTION COMMISSION member Thomas Harris, former associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, takes the oath of office at a ceremony in the White House rose garden. The commission will oversee the new federal campaign reform law.

Curbs Sought On Chemicals In Workplace

has been determined as hazardous to workers can the government act under the federal safety law. Even then, the process is slow.

Biemiller noted that the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health has a listing of 13,000 chemicals on which some kind of health information exists, but the agency has recommended standards for only 46. There are no standards for 1,300 cancer-causing chemicals that are on the NIOSH toxic substances list, he charged.

He urged the subcommittee to strengthen the Senate bill by including several amendments that would avoid jurisdictional conflicts between the EPA and other government agencies.

Jacob Clayman, secretary-treasurer of the Industrial Union Dept., told the subcommittee that interagency collaboration and separation of authority would be vital to the effective administration of the proposed law.

Clayman noted that a little overlapping between agencies has proved beneficial to both workers and consumers. He cited recent developments in issues involving agencies dealing with noise standards, vinyl chloride and toxic substances in drinking water.

Clayman suggested that EPA's research function be limited to short-term regulatory programs, leaving the long-term research program with NIOSH and the National Institute for Environmental Health Sciences, working in consultation with the EPA administrator.

Legislative Director John J. Sheehan of the Steelworkers said that with labor's proposed amendments, the legislation would supplement occupational health laws by initiating controls on toxic substances before they can cause serious harm to workers.

Also testifying in the support of the bill were George Perkel, research director of the Textile Workers Union of America, and Louis H. Gordon, legislative director of the Paperworkers.

West Coast Machinists Ratify Aerospace Pact

Los Angeles—About 7,000 striking Machinists employed by McDonnell Douglas at the firm's West Coast and Cape Canaveral, Fla., facilities returned to work on Apr. 15 after ratifying a new three-year contract.

Acceptance of the pact ended a nine-week walkout that began when the two parties failed to reach agreement on a contract to replace one that expired last Sept. 15. The union had twice before rejected company settlement offers.

The new agreement, approved by 66 percent of those voting, covers IAM District 720 members employed at the aerospace firm's California plants at Torrance, Santa Monica, Palmdale, Long Beach and Huntington Beach and at Cape Canaveral.

The settlement does not affect about 12,000 IAM members on strike at the company's St. Louis headquarters. Negotiations there are continuing under the aegis of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Under the agreement, District 720 members will have their pay increased by 3 percent plus 12 cents an hour, retroactive to Sept. 15. The 12 cents is the amount workers would have received last October under an escalator clause in the old agreement.

The pact also calls for 3 percent wage hikes in the second and third years plus an uncapped cost-of-living clause providing for adjustments of one cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index.

The pact also raises pension benefits from $8 to $9 a month times years of service prior to Sept. 15 and to $10 for service after that date. Medical care coverage and insurance benefits were improved.

The firm also agreed to pay workers for Thanksgiving and Christmas - New Year holiday periods last year. During the talks, the company locked out the workers and withheld their pay for these holidays.

District 720 negotiators kept intact a union-shop provision which McDonnell Douglas attempted to eliminate in its two previous contract offers.

While the old agreement expired seven months ago, union members continued to work while negotiations went forward. On Feb. 9, when District 837's contract at St. Louis expired, the strike got under way.

Extremist Group Mounts Campaign To Disrupt Local Labor Programs

York, Pa.—The "crazies" have come to this industrial community to carry on for free the anti-union disruptions that in an earlier era were done by employer-paid labor spies and thugs.

A handful of self-styled "revolutionaries" under the banner of the so-called U.S. Labor Party has mounted a sick campaign of obscene leaflets, disruption of union meetings by shouted profanities, and personal harassment of the area's union leaders.

The "Labor Party," with no ties to the trade union movement, has gained a certain notoriety by sending people with phony press credentials to union meetings and conventions around the country for the sole purpose of trying to disrupt meetings with shouts and name-calling.

The AFL-CIO earlier this year warned affiliates of some of the "front" names used by the group in seeking press credentials and the Auto Workers sued to prevent the U.S. Labor Party from calling its publication "New Solidarity" in an obvious attempt to confuse it with the UAW's newspaper, "Solidarity."

The president of the York-Adams Central Labor Council, Ed Clinch, a Machinist, Vice President Jack Barnhart, a Roofer, and Earl Keihl, a Furniture Workers representative, have been the chief targets of the harassment. Keihl is chairman of the council's special committee on unemployment and is currently working on arrangements for busloads of York area trade unionists to come to the Industrial Union Dept.'s Washington, D.C. rally on Apr. 26.

The goal of the "Labor Party's" members, Keihl said, appears to be to scuttle labor's jobs campaign.

At public meetings, their favorite epithet is "fascist." Their leaflets often include obscene cartoons. In a repetition of tactics used in other cities where the group has operated, every union leader is portrayed as a homosexual.

All three targets of harassment here have received anonymous phone calls at night, and a window in Keihl's home is pockmarked by pellets.

After having been ejected from a union meeting, three of the U.S. Labor Party members brought assault charges against the three trade union officials which were promptly dismissed in court.

Later, the county district attorney charged two of the extremists with illegal harassment, citing "lewd, lascivious and indecent language" in their attacks on the union leaders. But those charges also were dismissed.

Annoying as the personal harassment is, the community's union leadership sees the group's real threat as an impediment to organizing and as a potential source of disruption and division in a strike situation.

The disruptions have already spread beyond the trade union movement to the community at large, Keihl reported. He said a local meeting of senior citizens has already had a taste of the U.S. Labor Party tactics—a wild harangue from one of its spokesmen.

Fire Fighters Get New Training Pact

The Fire Fighters were awarded a new one-year Labor Dept. contract to recruit and train about 730 minority group persons to qualify for civil service registers leading to jobs on municipal fire departments.

The IAFF will receive a $400,000 grant to prepare candidates for examinations in 10 cities. Trainees will be given six weeks of special tutoring and physical conditioning in efforts to meet the requirements of the civil service tests.

Under the union's government-funded recruitment and training program, 725 blacks and Spanish-Americans have been hired as fire fighters and an additional 1,800 minority group members have been placed in the civil service.

Cities where the program is expected to operate under the new contract are Atlanta, Baltimore, Fort Lauderdale, Fla., Houston, Los Angeles, Memphis, New Orleans, San Diego, Seattle and Tacoma, Wash.

The People's Channels

WE WANT PUBLIC BROADCASTING to be a truly independent broadcast system—independent of politics and independent of commercial interests but not independent of the people in the communities it serves.

The bill before you does nothing to guard against the growing influence of private corporate interests on programming and station policy. This influence is exerted through the so-called underwriting process and through tax deductible grants made to individual stations. As a result, fiscal dependence on corporate largesse is encouraged and places on the governing boards of public broadcasting are assured for corporate representatives. In addition large portions of public broadcasting's prime time schedule is controlled, in effect, by Mobil, Exxon, or other commercial sponsors.

When a corporate underwriter buys a program and gives it to the public system, its primary objective is not to encourage minority programming, to help develop domestic talents, or otherwise strengthen the programming of public broadcasting. If these were its objectives, it would contribute funds with no strings attached for use by the stations and the system as its administrators and leadership perceive public broadcasting's goals and needs.

Grants for specific programs are given to enhance a corporate image and this takes precedence over the mission of public broadcasting. This, we submit is wrong and, for that reason, general grants should be encouraged and program grants prohibited.

At present, we believe, corporate underwriting provides less than 4 percent of the income for public television and radio. It will be far easier to end this practice now, as the Carnegie Commission suggested, than allow it to grow and public broadcasting to become more dependent on it. It takes little imagination to see a day when these corporate underwriters demand more for their dollar than a simple, on-the-air acknowledgement. Next will come the commercial "message"—that message which now consumes so much time on non-public television. The time to stop it is now—not when it's too late.

PUBLIC BROADCASTING belongs to all the people—working people and their representatives, as well as businessmen and their managers; women as well as men; minority group members as well as white Anglo-Saxons. The boards and councils governing CPB and public stations must reflect this diversity. Today, they do not.

In addition, more must be done to insure that women, blacks, Latinos, native Americans and others, who in the past have suffered exclusion from meaningful participation in broadcasting, are afforded new opportunities—not only to be employed but to be employed in professional and policy making positions. If this requires additional expenditures for recruitment and training, then so be it.

We endorse long range financing at the higher levels supported by CPB. But we suggest that this committee attach basic safeguards to insure that, during the next five years, the public broadcasting system will grow to nurture American artistry; that it will be independent of economic as well as political pressure from special interests; that it will involve a broad cross-section of the American public in its administration and that it will insure full participation from the citizenry it aims to serve.

A Word Edgewise:

Flow of Vietnamese Refugees Amounts to Vote Against North

By John P. Roche

MAYBE I HAVEN'T READ the papers closely enough, but I can not recall once in the last quarter of a century reading a headline: "Seven West Germans Shot Trying to Escape to East," or, "Hong Kong Police Capture Five Attempting Swim to Red China." On the contrary, movement has invariably been in the other direction: Is there any greater monument to the appeal of freedom than the Berlin Wall?

It is therefore hardly a coincidence that the flow of refugees in both Cambodia and the Republic of Vietnam has been away from the Communists. In Vietnam this is a rerun of events after the Geneva agreement of 1954 which provided for "regrouping." Communists in the South were to be allowed to move North and anti-Communists in the North to go South.

When the swap began, less than 100,000 southerners headed for the workers' state, while almost a million left the North before Hanoi, in embarrassment, illegally forbade further emigration. Still the determined ones slipped out, climbing aboard just about anything that would float, and—as always—pursued by men with guns. As one now sees the pictures of those poor people thronging the roads to Saigon, perhaps he should put aside the stereotype of the "corrupt Saigon dictatorship," and ask, "What do they know that I don't?"

A number of commentators have been taking elaborate evasive action to avoid this moment of truth. One account had it that the reason peasant families fled was simple mob hysteria—they saw everyone doing it. Try that on your piccolo. Then, a more sophisticated version appeared: The people left to avoid the fighting. There is a certain plausibility about this, but it fails to answer the key question: Why didn't they go North and join their liberators? Back to the drawing board. (By the time this column appears, I fully expect that Jane Fonda, or some equally authoritative interpreter of Vietnamese events, will announce that the refugees fled South under orders from that brutal dictator, Thieu.)

What do they, and the North Korean prisoners of war in South Korea back in 1953, and the Chinese Communist prisoners of war in the same year, and the Tibetans who fled to Nepal, and the East Germans who still try to penetrate the border minefield or scale the wall, or the Czechs who managed to get out in 1968, or, or, or . . . what do these simple folk know that is hidden from many of the great minds of our time? I'll tell you what they know: They know that a Communist government is a barbarian regime. And they are capable of making the crucial distinction between black and grey; that is, they much prefer an inefficient authoritarian state to efficient totalitarianism.

THERE IS A STORY which vividly makes this point. Pre-World War II Yugoslavia was hardly a nation dedicated to the Bill of Rights: Its secret police were a rough lot and its prisons were below average in comfort. About 1936, in one of these prisons, a leading Communist was politely handed a newspaper by a guard who usually belted him a couple of times just for exercise. The guard was chuckling because the paper carried word that leading Yugoslav Communist exiles had been shot in Moscow shortly after confessing to working for French-Japanese-British intelligence. As the shocked prisoner absorbed the details, the guard said: "Now aren't you lucky? The best day of your life was when we started protecting you."

To say this in no sense to justify any variety of authoritarianism; it is merely to emphasize that in this world one rarely has a nice clear choice between black and white. A civil liberties lawyer in Boston can issue a quite valid attack on some of the Saigon government's actions, but the issues he raises are irrelevant to the Kontum peasant fleeing from effective barbarism.

To use language this strong is to invite dismissal from the club of gentlemen journalists as a cold war relic, but sometimes the only way to put the truth is crudely. Communist regimes are barbaric. If anyone refuses to believe this (and is prepared to look at the evidence), I suggest he go to his friendly neighborhood bookseller and purchase, in paperback, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's "The Gulag Archipelago." Reading this will fill him in on what the Vietnamese peasants know and what a number of distinguished American intellectuals fail to comprehend.

A British Viewpoint:

Shelepin Visit Exposes a New Hypocrisy

On Mar. 31, a Soviet "trade union" delegation visited Great Britain at the invitation of the British Trades Union Congress and in exchange for a TUC delegation's visit to Moscow in 1973. Heading the Soviet delegation was Alexander Shelepin, chairman of the "All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions of the USSR."

Before his appointment as head of the Russian "trade unions," Mr. Shelepin was head of the KGB (1958-61), the hated Soviet secret police. In this capacity, Mr. Shelepin has been accused, among other things, of having directed the murders of two anti-Soviet Ukrainian refugees.

His visit to London was greeted by protest demonstrations and sharp editorial attacks in British newspapers. Among the sharpest were two articles in the Times of London by Bernard Levin. The first, reprinted below, is reproduced from the Times with permission; the second will appear in this space next week. Clive Jenkins, to whom Mr. Levin refers, is secretary of the Association of Scientific, Technical & Managerial Staffs.

I HAVE NEVER SUBSCRIBED to the opinion that because Mr. Clive Jenkins is a most egregious ass he is not dangerous. But until Monday I would have said that it did not matter very much. On that day, however, he was interviewed (or, more precisely, fed) on The World at One, the subject being the proposed visit to Britain of a notorious murderer and torturer.

There is a case—it is based on raison d'état—for allowing Mr. Alexander Shelepin to come to Britain, and even for swallowing the extra insult implied in his coming as the head of the Soviet "trades unions." I am not persuaded by this case, and in a further column I shall go into detail on the reasons for my inability to accept it, but it is a real one, and it is accepted by many people who are neither supporters of Soviet tyranny nor deceived by it. There is also a case for considering Mr. Shelepin as significantly less wicked than his predecessors as head of the Soviet secret police, and I accept that that is indeed true, though I do not think the argument is of much importance one way or the other.

No; what interests me today is not so much Mr. Shelepin as the attitude to him of Mr. Clive Jenkins. It is unfortunately impossible, by quotation in mere print, to convey the self-satisfied, oily smirk in his voice (he is the best living case for Offa's Dyke). But since it is impossible to give away a recording with every copy of the Times, print will have to do. As for instance:

The head of our secret police and intelligence is always knighted and looked upon as a splendid, amiable character, but the head of their secret police is looked upon as being bloodstained and diabolical. Now really, what a lot of hypocritical nonsense.

But the head of our "secret police" (by which I suppose the fool means M16) does not rule over an empire of concentration camps, does he? Does he deploy a gigantic army of jailers and informers?

Does he have the entire apparatus of the state at his disposal to crush any form of dissent from, or disagreement with, the state's purpose? Does he have the power to put anyone in prison or camp or lunatic asylum indefinitely, without trial?

Or, when he considers it appropriate, to kill or torture Britain's citizens in furtherance of his ends? Does he work in a society that refuses accused persons the right to an open trial, with counsel of their choice and access to witnesses? Do those prosecuted in this country have their sentences determined in advance by the police authorities, and communicated to the judge for passing? Do the "secret police" in Britain have literally uncontrolled power over the lives and liberties, the bodies and possessions, of every citizen, and the utmost encouragement to exercise that power?

When abuses occur in Britain, are there no newspapers, no Members of Parliament, to take up cases of suspected injustice or arbitrary acts? Are demonstrations and protest marches invariably prohibited here, and anyone raising a banner automatically arrested?

I am sorry to insult you by such questions. But it is necessary to ask them, to descend into the unplumbable sea of ignorance and dishonesty which Mr. Jenkins was swimming in with his comparison of the head of the KGB with the head of Britain's intelligence service; for only by so doing is it possible to suggest the mounting rage with which I listened to his disgusting buffooneries.

Disgusting? More than 10 million human beings were exterminated in the Soviet camps, those camps which Mr. Shelepin, when he became head of the KGB, inherited, after working his way up through the system that produced them and the slaughter that went on in them. (Do not assume that because he was appointed by Khrushchev during the brief period of partial "destalinization," he would not have cooperated in the slaughter if that had still been the order of the day when he got the job.)

And Clive Jenkins seems to think elephantine jokes ("You see the Russians haven't got a House of Lords and they don't play cricket either, and therefore, of course, it's very hard to understand them") constitute the correct response to the stench of death and torture that hangs over the Soviet Union, and to the cries of the murdered millions and of those dying now in the camps and asylums. Let Clive Jenkins tell Vladimir Bukovsky, let him tell Valentin Moroz, let him tell Semyon Gluzman, let him tell Edward Kuznetsov that it is "hypocritical nonsense" to call the head of the organization that holds them "diabolical."

Mr. Jenkins was then reminded that the KGB, when Mr. Shelepin was its head, was responsible for the hounding of Boris Pasternak. (An error, actually; it was Pasternak's Lara, Olga Ivinskaya, whom Mr. Shelepin hounded into a concentration camp. The campaign against Pasternak himself was conducted by the hacks of the Soviet literary establishment.) To this Mr. Jenkins replied:

"I think that's nonsense. I believe that the current campaign is effectively inspired by cold war forces, especially the Americans . . . the attacks on Mr. Shelepin I'd have thought were nonsense. . . . I really can't understand this rather febrile and amateurish campaign."

Just so did Britain's pre-war fascists claim that criticism of the Nazis and their methods were Jewish propaganda. No doubt a fascist equivalent of Clive Jenkins could have been found to defend a proposed visit to London by the head of the Nazi Arbeitsfront, even if he had been appointed to the job after serving as head of the Gestapo. And indeed, the analogy is extraordinarily close; Mr. Jenkins might have been quoting a BUF apologia for Hitler when, in reply to the interviewer's tentative suggestion that Soviet trades unions are not comparable to British ones, Mr. Jenkins started off: "Well, they are not comparable in so far as they are products of a different system."

Then he explained the difference in the two systems:

"The different system is that they have no private ownership of the means of manufacture there, and we live in a mixed economy. And we are very proud, and very defensive, of the independence of our unions. But their different mechanisms on the other hand are representative organizations—as are ours."

That is the difference between British unions and Soviet ones, is it? We have a mixed economy and they do not; but their unions are nevertheless representative organizations, as are ours.

So they can, say, go on strike, can they? Well, yes, as a matter of fact they can—if they are brave enough. They did so in Chimkent in 1967, after a taxi-driver had been arrested for a minor traffic offense and beaten to death by the police. An angry crowd gathered to protest, and the normal method of industrial arbitration in the Soviet Union was employed, to wit, a massacre; the number of dead is not precisely known, but was certainly scores.

Later, three men were executed—not three of the murdering troops but three of the protesters. There is no record of a mass protest on behalf of the Chimkent Three, by the Soviet Trades Union Congress, of which Mr. Shelepin was then, as he is now, the head (he had had no previous trades union experience of any kind, incidentally, which is itself a nice indication of the Soviet attitude to those "representative organizations").

Nor were there sympathetic strikes while they were under sentence of death; nor were there letters of protest in Pravda; nor did Mr. Shelepin lead a mass lobbying of the Soviet "Parliament."

Clive Jenkins was also at pains to dismiss as unimportant the fact that Mr. Shelepin had been the head of the Komsomol (the Soviet youth movement), and had been appointed to the post by Stalin:

I'm told that he was, as they say, a henchman of Stalin before the war—that means the reference to the fact that he ran their Young Communist League. But the people who ran our Young Communist League in Britain in the thirties are now members of the House of Lords.

To which bizarre comment the most suitable reply is this official Soviet description of the Komsomol in the days when Mr. Shelepin was running it for Stalin, while the corpses piled up in the camps:

The very first task of all Komsomol education work was the necessity to seek out and recognize the enemy, who had then to be removed, purely forcibly, by methods of economic pressure, organizational-political isolation, and methods of physical destruction.

As I have said, it can possibly and decently be argued that acceptance of Mr. Shelepin's visit is necessary. (Mr. Jenkins gave a single nod in the direction of this argument: "We have to deal with people as they are and systems as they are. . . .")

What it is not possible to do with decency is to maintain that Alexander Shelepin is an ordinary and harmless official, or that Soviet trades unions are real ones. Yet that is what Clive Jenkins did. His position as a kind of licensed jester to the British trades union movement has hitherto given him a certain immunity from serious criticism. I think that the performance he has just given makes it necessary to lift that immunity.

Shoppers' Dilemma:

Computerized Price Markings Seen No Benefit to Consumers

ELIMINATION of price markings on individual supermarket items will largely rule out any chance for price consciousness and comparison shopping with no guarantee that the automated checkout system will save consumers either time or money.

The warning was issued on Labor News Conference by Carol Tucker Foreman, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America, and Walter L. Davis, special assistant to the president of the Retail Clerks. They are in the forefront of the joint drive by the labor and consumer movements to retain traditional price markings on grocery items through consumer demands or legislative action.

Davis said that packages without prices leave consumers "at the mercy of the computer" that will replace the cash registers now used for grocery market checkout. He noted that posting prices on the supermarket shelves is largely hit-or-miss and often little help to shoppers, who want to make sure that their food dollars buy the best in quality and value.

Foreman said that the high cost of installing a computerized checkout system may well lead many markets to cut back the number of checkout stands they now use, which would offset any time saved by the faster electronic scanner system. She also stressed that although the Consumer Federation has pressed hard for a commitment from the supermarket industry that any savings brought by the electronic system will be passed on to consumers, the answer has never been a positive "yes."

Foreman scored the grocery industry's charge that labor is using the consumer movement to block layoffs and "protect feather-bedding" practices. She labelled the claim "a convenient propaganda device" that is "very offensive to those of us who began working in opposition to the removal of price markings long, long before the Retail Clerks became interested in it."

Davis and Foreman were questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Charles Flinner of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Rights and Jobs

RIGHT AFTER PASSAGE of the civil rights bills in the early Sixties, the AFL-CIO's George Meany began advocating full employment. The AFL-CIO Executive Council said, "The right to be hired is empty indeed when there are no jobs to be had. The right to be served in a restaurant or a hotel has no meaning for those with no money to spend."

But few listened to George Meany in those days of sit-ins and marches. Now that more leaders are beginning to stress full employment, it's time that George Meany gets some credit for his long campaigns.—From a radio commentary by Simeon Booker.

PACKAGES WITHOUT PRICES carry no guarantee that shoppers will save time or money, said Walter L. Davis, second from left, special assistant to the president of the Retail Clerks, and Carol Foreman, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America. They were questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Charles Flinner of UPI.

COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS President Glenn E. Watts talks over the telephone with Vladimir Slepak in Moscow, a Soviet Jew who has tried for six years to resettle in Israel. Slepak's right to emigrate—guaranteed under international law—has been denied by the Soviet authorities. Furthermore, the KGB, Russia's secret police agency, has harassed him, breaking into his apartment to remove his phone, Watts told reporters. With the help of the Jewish Community Council of Greater Washington, CWA called Slepak on a public line. The move was designed to dramatize the plight of some 130,000 Soviet Jews unable to leave the USSR.

Full Political Rights:

U.S. Workers Ask Hatch Act Repeal

Unions representing a big majority of federal and postal employes urged repeal of the Hatch Act restrictions on the political rights of government workers.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and a group of affiliated unions testified at House hearings in support of the Hatch Act repeal bill introduced by Rep. William L. Clay (D.-Mo.) with 53 co-sponsors.

They argued that the Hatch Act has had a chilling effect on government workers, encouraging apathy as the "safe" course and making several million persons second class citizens.

President Clyde M. Webber of the American Federation of Government Employees declared that the only law needed is one that affirms the right of public employes "to freedom in the political area without fear of reprisal."

He said the concept of a merit system free from political pressures should be preserved through stiff penalties for intimidating an employe to support a candidate, work in a campaign or contribute money.

President James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers termed the law's restraints on voluntary, partisan political activity "unnecessary, unwise and unconstitutional."

Rademacher said the "chilling effect" of the Hatch Act has been demonstrated by the hesitancy of members to contribute to the union's new nonpartisan political action fund. There is "no question," he asserted, that the problem lies in the "fear" of members that they would be violating the Hatch Act "with its unreasonable provisions and penalties."

Patrick J. Nilan, legislative director of the Postal Workers, termed the Hatch Act "an outstanding example of legislative overkill."

America's concern, he suggested, should be the lack of political participation as indicated by the fact that "barely half of the electorate even goes to the polls in the average election and a 65 percent vote is something to shout about."

A statement by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. on behalf of its 28 affiliated unions noted that last year Congress exempted from most of the restrictions of the Hatch Act the large number of state and local government workers who had been covered because their jobs were financed in part by federal funds.

The decision was "wise," the department said, and "should now be applied to federal and postal employes."

A statement from the Fire Fighters, presented by Legislative Rep. Jack A. Waller, noted that the federal law passed in 1939 had been followed by a number of "little Hatch Acts" in state legislatures restricting the political activities of state and local employes.

While welcoming the recent exemption of non-federal employes from the federal Hatch Act, the union said "the time has come for all public employes to enjoy the freedom of political participation."

Weller noted, as did other witnesses, that most other democratic nations have no comparable restrictions on the political rights of their employes.

IAFF Scores Nominee For Federal Fire Post

The appointment of John L. Petersen of Aurora, Ill., as director of the new Fire Prevention & Control Administration is a "disaster that has stunned and angered just about everyone concerned with the fire problem in the nation," President W. Howard McClennan of the Fire Fighters declared.

He said the union would mount an immediate nationwide campaign to persuade the Senate Commerce Committee to withhold endorsement of the nomination of Petersen.

Petersen, a 49-year-old Aurora law firm partner, does not have the necessary experience for the job, the IAFF charged. His only credential is that he has served as a volunteer firefighter.

Most of the nation's firemen are professional fire fighters and ought to be represented by someone who understands their problems, the union argued, calling appointment of Petersen "a political one."

"We will be joined in this effort," McClennan said, "by many other organizations concerned with the fire problem. There is a widespread belief that on the basis of experience, leadership, breadth of vision and ability, the presidential nominee does not measure up to the challenges of the new and important post for which he was appointed.

"There is no lack of first-rate talent for this post.

"Within the past two weeks the Joint Council of National Fire Service Organizations — representing many groups with varied membership and specialized interests in coping with the fire problem— voiced its concern that appointments to the top positions of the new organization 'be qualified to lead an effort that is so important to the fire service and the general public.' "

These positions had been vacant for five months after passage of the legislation. The Joint Council offered the names of two men to head the new agency: Howard Tipton, a former executive director of the National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control; and David McCormack, now the deputy chief of the New York City Fire Dept. and chairman of the Fire Science Dept. of John Jay University.

Organizations affiliated with the joint council, besides the IAFF, include the International Association of Fire Chiefs, the International Society of Fire Service Instructors, the National Fire Protection Association, the International Fire Service Training Association, the International Association of Arson Investigators, Fire Marshals Association of North America, the International Fire Administration Institute, the International Municipal Signal Association, and the Black Professional Fire Fighters Association.

TWUA Okays Mid-Atlantic Model Pact

Boston—A one-year contract providing for a two-step increase of 25 cents an hour has been reached by the Textile Workers Union of America and four leading northern cotton-synthetic textile manufacturers.

Alton M. Hodgman, the union's director for that branch of the industry, said the agreement is expected to set the pattern for settlements with some 70 firms employing approximately 20,000 workers in the New England and mid-Atlantic states.

The new contract has been ratified by workers of the American Thread Co., Willimantic, Conn.; Berkshire Hathaway, New Bedford, Mass.; Bates Fabrics, Lewiston, Me., and Edwards Manufacturing Co., Augusta, Me.

It provides for an across-the-board increase of 15 cents an hour effective Apr. 15 and 10 cents additional next Oct. 13. The industry's original offer was a total increase of 10 cents an hour, effective in October.

The only variation from the pattern was at American Thread, where workers voted to divert 1 cent an hour from the initial raise to improve pensions, Hodgman said.

Among other members of the union's contract policy committee were TWUA President Sol Stetin and Sec-Treas. William DuChessi.

Solidarity Pledged to Soviet Jews

New York—"There is no more urgent moral issue before the civilized world today than the Soviet Union's perpetuation of the ancient and odious curse of anti-Semitism," AFL-CIO President George Meany said in a message to the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry on Apr. 13, Solidarity Sunday.

A crowd of 100,000 paraded down Fifth Avenue, joined by rabbis, ministers, nuns and priests. Other demonstrations of support for Soviet Jews were held throughout the nation the same day.

Meany assured the conference of organized labor's solidarity and support of efforts to help Soviet Jews "and all peoples who are the victims of totalitarian persecution everywhere."

Meany congratulated the conference, and its constituent organizations, "for their steadfast commitment to the principle that freedom is indivisible" in an era "when the noblest ideals of human rights are on the verge of being engulfed by what Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn has called 'the spirit of Munich.' "

Meat Cutters Oppose Tax for Advertising

A high-power advertising campaign, ultimately financed by consumers, is no solution to the sales problems of cattle raisers, the Meat Cutters testified.

Arnold Mayer, the union's legislative representative, urged a Senate Agriculture subcommittee to reject a bill that would impose a form of value-added tax on the sale of cattle. The tax would go into a multi-million dollar fund that would be used for research and for advertising and promotion designed to increase the sale of beef and the price of cattle.

While advertising isn't likely to induce consumers to buy more steaks, Mayer suggested that the legislation would "do wonders for the income of the advertising industry and the persons who manage and operate the fund."

He told the panel that the Meat Cutters union is concerned with the preservation of the industry and the high costs that are driving many cattle feeders out of business. But, he added, this sympathy "does not extend to the Wall Street, Dallas and Hollywood cowboys who had been exploiting cattle feeding for tax advantages."

As for the proposed value-added tax, Mayer suggested that while producers might initially bear the cost, whenever market conditions permit it will be passed on to consumers in higher prices. Because it is such a regressive tax, state legislatures and Congress quite properly "have repeatedly shunned it," Mayer noted.

On the so-called "research" to be funded by the tax, Mayer expressed concern that it would be comparable to Dept. of Agriculture studies that ended up as attempts to blame unions for all food price problems.

NEW PRESIDENT of the United Garment Workers, Howard D. Collins, is congratulated by President Emeritus Joseph P. McCurdy, right. McCurdy had headed the union since 1941. Collins is from Bellevue, Ky., and was serving on the union's executive board prior to assuming the presidency Mar. 29.

In Arts, Entertainment:

Professional Unions Set Jobs Program

Expanded job opportunities for artists and craftsmen in entertainment and communications are the focus of an action program drafted by the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees.

The program was developed at a two-day Emergency Leadership Conference on Jobs for the Arts which drew top representatives of affiliated entertainment and communications unions.

Policy statements adopted by the council's Arts, Entertainment & Media Industries Committees explored common problems in such areas as public broadcasting, government funding of arts programs, television reruns, copyright reform and others.

Participating unions in the committee represent more than 500,000 members in the entertainment field.

The conference called on Congress to approve long-range funding proposed by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, provided that the legislation prohibits the use of federal funds to buy foreign-made programming.

Noting that 30 percent of PBS funds are spent on imported programs, the committee said future labor support of the system will depend on efforts to assure a greater use of programs produced domestically.

The committee also stressed that PBS artists and craftsmen must be paid wages and benefits prevailing in their occupations.

Copyright laws should be amended, the committee suggested, to correct basic injustices by requiring broadcasters and other commercial users of recordings to pay modest royalties to performers, musicians and recording companies.

Since 75 percent of all broadcast time sold to advertisers is devoted to playing sound recordings, the committee said it is appropriate that broadcasters make at least token payments for the use of the materials.

On the National Endowment for the Arts, the committee said the $82 million budgeted by the Ford Administration for fiscal year 1976 is inadequate and urged that the entire $128 million authorized for the bicentennial year be appropriated.

The committee also criticized the use of National Endowment for the Humanities funds to support foreign programming while American artists face severe unemployment.

Renewing organized labor's stand against the extensive use of television reruns, the committee called on the Federal Communications Commission to limit reruns to 25 percent of prime time programming.

Increased funding is also needed to expand the nation's cultural exchange program to finance the appearance of American artists and institutions overseas, the committee stressed.

It noted that the current budget of $1 million is an embarrassment to the nation and that the budgeted increase to $2.2 million for the coming fiscal year "is a modest step in the right direction."

To stimulate employment in the arts and increased production of motion pictures, video tapes, sound recording and live performances, the committee urged Congress to legislate additional tax breaks for producers.

It also called for repeal of local admission taxes imposed on both non-profit and commercial cultural activities in eight of the nation's 25 major cities.

New Leaders Take Helm of Shipbuilders

Frank Derwin, the new president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, announced that the appointment of Arthur Batson, Jr., as secretary-treasurer was approved by the union's executive board. He will take office Apr. 28.

Derwin, who had served as secretary-treasurer since 1972, assumed the presidency of the union on the death of Eugene L. McCabe last month.

Derwin has been a member of the Shipbuilders since 1943 and was an officer of Local 12 in New York for 14 years before joining the national staff in 1961. He became New York regional director in 1962 and was elected secretary-treasurer in 1972.

Batson joined the union in 1959 and has been president of Local 5 at Quincy, Mass., since 1970. He was elected to the union's executive board last month.

Labor Protest Called Key To Blocking TV Runaway

Leaders of entertainment unions hailed the AFL-CIO Executive Council's strong position against the proposed runaway production by ABC of an American bicentennial television series, calling it a decisive factor in the decision not to produce the series overseas.

ABC had originally planned to produce the "Burr" series, based on a book by Gore Vidal, in England. The network has since said the production will not take place in England, but it has yet to announce whether the series will go forward using American talent.

At an emergency conference on jobs for the arts, the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees (CPE) declared that programs commemorating the nation's national bicentennial should be produced in this country "in keeping with the spirit of the American independence and the economic hardships facing American workers."

"Not until the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO called on ABC to abandon this 'most insulting of all runaway productions . . . as a matter of simple decency' were actual results achieved," the CPE said.

AT HOUSE HEARINGS on federal funds for public broadcasting, Subcommittee Chairman Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.) welcomes Jack Golodner, center, executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees, and Sanford I. Wolff, executive secretary of the Television & Radio Artists. They urged that federal tax funds be used only for programs produced in the United States.

More Public TV Aid, U.S. Programs Urged

ity programs, but sharply criticized the operating arm, the Public Broadcasting Service, and its affiliated stations for overreliance on foreign productions.

While American talent goes unused, Golodner noted that imports dominate prime-time on public television stations and account for nearly two-thirds of all dramatic productions.

During 11 evenings of "showcase" performances last month aimed at showing public television at its best, Golodner said the Washington, D.C., outlet used 34 imports and only five programs produced in the U.S.

He quoted a newspaper critic, Alan Kreigsman of the Washington Post, who said the moral appeared to be that "if the American public will only cough up its fair share, British writers, actors and TV crews can be kept alive and healthy for the duration."

Golodner stressed that U.S. unions "are not opposed to foreign-produced cultural programming" and favor a mix of quality programs from abroad along with domestic shows. It is the current imbalance that labor opposes, he said.

To reverse the trend, he proposed in addition to banning use of federal funds for foreign programs a requirement that privately-raised dollars used to buy foreign programs not qualify for matching U.S. tax funds.

The AFL-CIO testimony also criticized a policy allowing corporate sponsors to underwrite specific programs—giving them an opportunity for institutional advertising on a supposedly non-commercial station. To encourage general grants by corporations, rather than indirect advertising, Golodner said corporate fundings of specific programs should not qualify for matching federal payments.

Golodner welcomed the increased hiring of racial minorities by public broadcasting, but urged a greater effort to bring minority group members into "professional and policy-making positions."

Further, he said, the boards and councils governing the system and its stations should reflect the fact that "public broadcasting belongs to all the people—working people and their representatives as well as businessmen; women as well as men; minority group members as well as white Anglo-Saxons."

Arthur Rosenstock, Guild Leader, Dies

New York—Arthur Rosenstock, president of the Newspaper Guild from 1959 to 1967, died at Montefiore Hospital Apr. 9 following a long illness. He was 72.

Rosenstock joined the Guild as a charter member in 1933 and was elected to a number of offices in the New York local before becoming a regional vice president of the international in 1956.

He was elected as the seventh president of the Guild in 1959, and his eight years in that office were the longest tenure as president in the union's 42-year history.

Ford Names 3-Man Board In Rail Dispute

President Ford invoked emergency provisions of the Railway Labor Act to block a nationwide railroad strike by the Railway & Airline Clerks. Ford's appointment of a factfinding panel to investigate the dispute automatically delays any strike for 60 days.

BRAC's members had voted overwhelmingly to walk off their jobs at 12:01 a.m., Apr. 18. C. L. Dennis, president of the union, said the tally showed "between 85 and 90 percent" of the members favored a strike.

"By their votes, our members have told us of their determination to win a pattern-breaking and pace-setting contract in the railway industry," Dennis said.

The emergency board has up to 30 days to investigate the dispute. After it files its report with the President, there is another 30-day "cooling-off" period.

Ford appointed attorney and labor arbitrator Alexander B. Porter to head the three-member panel. Other members are James M. Harkless, a Washington lawyer and labor arbitrator, and the Rev. Francis X. Quinn of Temple University.

BRAC's agreement with the carriers was up for renegotiation on Jan. 1. The union has termed the carriers' offers to date inadequate and substandard. It is also seeking protection against layoffs during economic slumps.

Meanwhile, four shopcraft unions—members of the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept.—were taking strike polls of members at special meetings across the country. The vote count won't be ready until mid-May.

The unions are the Carmen, Boilermakers-Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The only other rail union that has not settled in the current bargaining is the Yardmasters. The union has asked the National Mediation Board to assist in the negotiations.

Government Study Hits Subsidies for Exports

Costly export promotion programs of the Commerce Dept. and the Export-Import Bank are facing cutbacks because of their questionable economic impact and failure to expand U.S. jobs, the Journal of Commerce reports.

The Journal said that a study by the Office of Management & Budget, which has yet to be publicly released, is the basis of an Administration proposal to slash the Commerce Dept.'s export promotions $6.4 million and effectively reduce Eximbank financing in fiscal year 1976.

The OMB report noted that the real costs to the economy for export promotion may be greater than any benefits, suggesting that export expansion should not be a "priority national objective in and of itself."

The Journal said the OMB also found no reason to recommend export promotion as a way to create more American jobs, since the promotion transfers "our national output to foreigners at less than its real resource cost."

Because of the Eximbank's low-cost loans, the OMB found that the agency has become the lender of the first resort and is therefore competing with private export credit sources—something it is not supposed to do.

Eximbank's financing programs "have no inherent advantages in furthering national employment objectives in light of other fiscal and monetary tools available," the Journal said in quoting the report.

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly criticized the policies of the Eximbank as furthering the export of American jobs and technology, which in the long run result in increased imports into the U.S. market.

Eximbank loans made to foreign countries are at lower interest rates than Americans must pay at home, the federation stressed in congressional testimony last year.

The OMB report also termed the Eximbank's programs "particularly weak policy tools for stabilizing exchange rate fluctuations or achieving other balance of payments objectives because of the delay in receiving payments for exports."

Under the tax deferral programs of the Domestic International Sales Corp. (DISC), the U.S. Treasury lost $1 billion in revenues last year even though exports increased by $1.6 billion, the OMB report said.

"In effect, the U.S. economy was paying $2.6 billion to earn $1.6 billion in foreign exchange," the OMB report pointed out.

Mortgage Aid Voted:

House Acts to Avert Home Foreclosures

gages and enable thousands of people to keep their homes.

Also pending in the Senate is a companion measure to another House-passed bill—the Middle-Income Housing Act.

In its House version, this would provide a choice of two types of mortgage subsidies to middle-income families who buy new houses or condominiums priced at less than $38,000 in most areas and up to $42,000 in high-cost communities. The choice would be between a straight 7 percent mortgage rate—closer to the AFL-CIO position—or a temporary 6 percent rate that would move up to the regular market rate within six years.

The pending Senate bill would not have the 7 percent option, but it would offer an alternate choice of a $1,000 cash subsidy for persons who do not qualify for the 5 percent tax credit on new home purchases under the recently enacted tax cut law. The payment would apply only to new homes.

In non-housing areas, there were these congressional developments:

● A House Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee voted 6-3 approval of a bill that would give postal workers a limited right to strike.

The legislation, endorsed by the postal unions, would allow a union holding bargaining rights to choose between asserting a right to strike or accepting binding arbitration if contract negotiations are deadlocked. But the choice would have to be made before negotiations begin. If a strike is called, "essential" mail would continue to be delivered.

The bill is based on Canada's collective bargaining law, which applies to all government workers.

● An appropriations bill approved by the House includes an additional $5 billion for unemployment compensation programs, including non-interest loans to states whose own reserves have been drained by high unemployment.

● A House-Senate conference committee agreed on a trimmed-down version of a farm assistance bill in the hope of avoiding a presidential veto—or alternatively of producing the votes to override a veto.

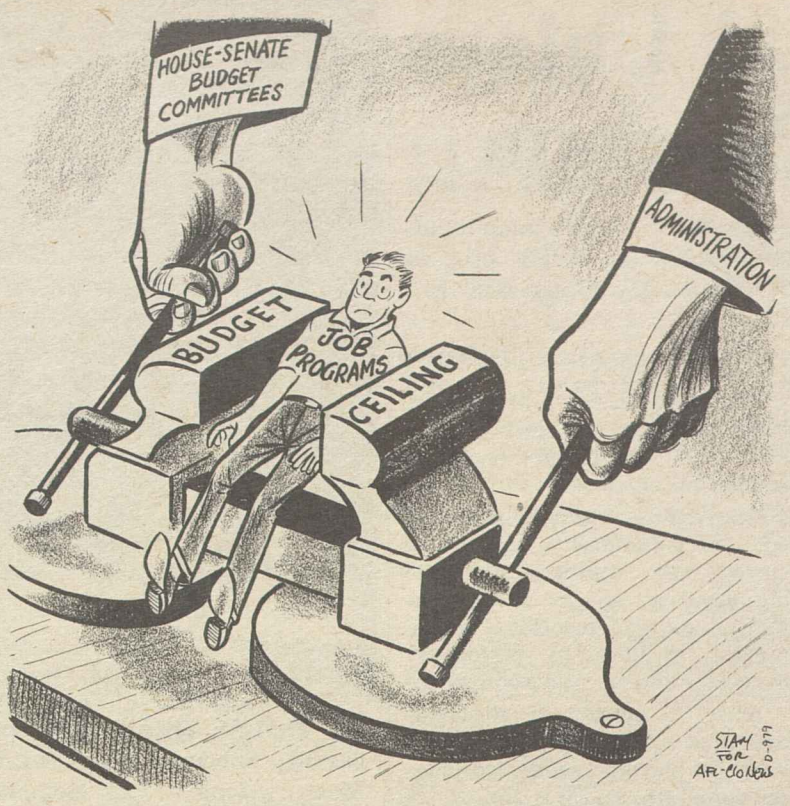
● A labor-supported extension of the Older Americans Act passed the House by a 377-19 vote, assuring continuation of a number of services and programs for the elderly and the expansion of some.

● Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D.-N.J.) successfully steered through House passage a bill to establish federal safety standards for summer camps for children and youth.

● Two House committees moved in different directions on legislation to provide health care for the unemployed. A House Commerce subcommittee approved an approach backed by the AFL-CIO of using federal funds to continue insurance coverage of workers receiving unemployment compensation, with Medicaid available for those who had not been covered in their previous employment. It is similar to a bill approved by the Senate Labor Committee. The House Ways & Means Committee took an approach of a tax on insurance premiums to pay for continued coverage, with other funds temporarily supplied by Medicare.

● The Senate approved a bill giving the President a variety of standby powers in the energy field, including authority to ration gasoline. But Congress would have review and veto power over his actions.

The Squeeze Is On



Jobless Toll Mounts Among Family Heads

Unemployment increases were "widespread and sharp," affecting all major demographic, industry and occupational groups, BLS reported. For most demographic categories, jobless rates rose to new highs over the quarter.

The rate for adult women averaged 8.2 percent; teenagers, 20.5 percent (39.8 percent for black teenagers); 7.6 percent for whites; 13.7 percent for blacks, and 5.5 percent for household heads.

The BLS report is issued quarterly and provides data for some worker groups not included in the agency's regular monthly release on job statistics. Among its highlights:

● Joblessness among household heads "increased substantially" to 5.5 percent from 4.1 percent in the fourth quarter of 1974 and 3.2 percent in the July-September period of last year.

About three-quarters of all household heads are men. Their rate was 4.7 percent. "In terms of the direct impact of the economic slowdown," BLS noted, "the number of male family heads in the unemployed ranks has doubled since the first quarter of 1974."

● Sharply higher rates of unemployment were experienced by all whites, blacks and persons of Spanish origin, but these rates varied to show an upsurge in joblessness (60 percent) for workers of Spanish origin that was in excess of that for blacks (54 percent) but less than among whites (71 percent).

● The number of discouraged workers—those who stop looking for work because they believe they cannot find jobs—rose to 1.1 million, by far the highest level recorded since BLS initiated the series in 1967.

● Joblessness among Vietnam-era veterans 20-34 years old took a sharp jump to 8.9 percent from the 6.5 percent average for the final three months of 1974. But it was still below the 9.5 percent rate for non-veterans in the same age group.

● The incidence of joblessness in poverty areas remained much higher than for the rest of the nation. The jobless rate averaged 11.2 percent in poverty areas, up from 7.1 percent a year earlier, while the rate in nonpoverty areas rose from 5.2 to 8.7 percent over the year.

"The severity of the employment situation for poverty-area residents was reflected both in the burgeoning number of jobless, which increased by 625,000 to 1.7 million, as well as in terms of the employment trend, which showed a decline of 800,000 to 13.7 million," BLS noted.

Labor force growth has been slow since mid-1974, in marked contrast to the rapid expansion in 1972-73, BLS observed. From fourth-quarter 1974 to first-quarter 1975, moreover, there was no change in the civilian labor force level (91.8 million).

Rates of participation in the labor force showed mixed trends, the report noted. The rate for adult women remained at its all-time high of 45.7 percent, while participation among adult men fell to 80.2 percent, the lowest point on record. The teenage participation rate, at 54.8 percent for the quarter, was below the high mark set in the same period a year ago.

Total employment over the first three months of this year fell to 84.1 million, a decrease of 1.6 million, BLS reported.

Education Bill Increased By $487 Million

The House refused to let the Administration's budget proposals hold down federal aid to education during the coming fiscal year.

It approved a $7.8 billion money bill, an increase of $1.3 billion from President Ford's budget-cutting request.

On the key vote, the only issue was whether to go along with the smaller budget increases proposed by the House Appropriations Committee or an amendment supported by the AFL-CIO and the American Federation of Teachers that substantially increased the funds.

The higher amount, adding $487 million to the Appropriations Committee figure, was approved by a 259-143 margin. The amendment was sponsored by Representatives Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.), David R. Obey (D-Wis) and Louis Stokes (D-Ohio), all members of the Appropriations Committee who had contended that the financial crisis facing states and communities would force cutbacks in education programs unless federal aid were increased.

The added funds include $150 million for the basic program of aid to disadvantaged children, $11 million to provide bilingual education services for children who do not speak English, $10 million for educating handicapped children and $6 million for the Follow-Through program to help children from poverty backgrounds keep up in school.

A letter sent to all House members by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged support for the amendment "to make sure that there will not be real disruptions in education."

President Albert Shanker of the Teachers also wrote House members that the added funds are needed to prevent "large and traumatic cutbacks."

Shanker acknowledged the conflicting demands on the budget but said that "cutting back on federal aid to education is not a way to deal with an economic crisis."

Minimum Wage Brief Refutes State Challenge

the law because the low pay of many of them was "a national disgrace." In 1973, when the legislation was being debated, more than 400,000 state and local government workers were paid less than $1.90 an hour, the AFL-CIO noted.

As for the states' rights argument, the AFL-CIO noted that the Supreme Court has affirmed the right of Congress to act without hindrance from contrary state laws to defend the nation against economic forces it considers "inimical or destructive of the national economy."

And substandard wages certainly fall in that category, the AFL-CIO suggested.

The brief termed the claim that cities would be bankrupt if they had to pay overtime to fire fighters "a false alarm."

Congress provided an elaborate, gradual phase-in of overtime coverage for fire fighters under which initially no overtime would be required unless they work an average of more than 60 hours a week in any 28-day period. Only an estimated 10 percent of fire fighters are on duty more than 60 hours a week, the brief noted. Eventually the straight-time maximum week would drop to 54 hours. All of the pro and con arguments were thoroughly aired during congressional consideration of the legislation, the AFL-CIO noted, and the debate made clear that volunteer firemen would not be covered.

In explaining the AFL-CIO direct interest in the case, the brief noted that about 1.7 million local and state employes are members of affiliated unions.

And "it is the conviction of the AFL-CIO," the brief stressed, "that working men and women, whether employed by a private or public employer, and whether they have chosen to be represented in dealing with their employer or not, deserve a living wage for their labor."

More Funds Called Key To College Aid Dilemma

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to provide more federal aid for both colleges and college students, but warned against spreading a limited amount of student aid funds too thinly.

That's one of the risks in a well-intentioned bill being considered by a House subcommittee, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis testified.

The bill, authored by Subcommittee Chairman James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), has some desirable features, but Davis cautioned that it wouldn't bring the cost of college within the means of most youngsters from low- and even middle-income families.

By trying to expand eligibility for educational opportunity grants without a substantial raise in total funds, the legislation could "reduce the amount of the grant available to a student at the very time when tuition and other college costs have reached an all-time high."

Davis noted that the nation's jobless rolls are already swelled by high school graduates who have been pushed "involuntarily" into the labor market by high tuition costs.

The chief problem with the bill, Davis suggested, "is that it is apparently designed to exist within the constraints of Administration budgetary policy. . . . This inevitably leads to an unwholesome tug of war for available funds, with the result that the needs of none are adequately met."

Davis, accompanied by Assistant Director John A. Sessions, cited this competition for funds as a major weakness of another provision of the bill—full expense-paid scholarships to students from lower-income families who score outstanding grades on academic tests.

Most such tests are geared "to white middle-class children," Davis noted. But "even if foolproof testing were available, we cannot accept the view that higher education is for an intellectual elite."

The AFL-CIO's position has been that "low tuition, not a scholarship program for the gifted, is the best form of student aid," Davis testified.

Meany Stresses Job Needs More Critical Than Deficit

3,000 at Conference:

Building Trades Take Case to Hill

By David L. Perlman

More than 3,000 building trades delegates carried to Capitol Hill legislative proposals designed to overcome depression-level unemployment in the construction industry.

They had adopted the program at an all-day National Jobs Conference called by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to turn the spotlight on 10 months of double-digit unemployment and a jobless rate more than double the national average.

A fleet of chartered buses took them to the steps of the Capitol early the next morning for a welcome by House Speaker Carl Albert and other congressional leaders. The delegates, who came from 44 states, fanned out to special hearings called by House and Senate committees with jurisdiction over major portions of the labor program.

The 10 committees, with nearly all members present, heard building trades proposals dealing with such areas as housing, public works, unemployment insurance, energy development, environmental issues and funding of federal programs.

Later, department officers including the presidents of the 17 affiliated unions met at the White House with President Ford.

Position papers presented to the jobs conference reinforced the grim report by BCTD President Robert A. Georgine that never before has the construction industry been in so disastrous a condition.

Real Wages At 11-Year Low Point

By James M. Shevis

Workers' buying power fell to its lowest level in 11 years in March, the result of a further decline in the average workweek and a rise in consumer prices, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Real spendable weekly earnings—that is, take-home pay adjusted to take account of inflation since 1967—amounted to $87.35 for a worker with three dependents last month. The only other month in which such earnings were lower was January 1964 when BLS began recording these statistics. The figure then was $87.15.

Last month's real weekly earnings were 34 cents below the previous month and $4.35 less than the year-earlier level. On a per-

Appeal by Meany:

Refugee Aid Urged For Vietnam Allies

AFL-CIO President George Meany appealed to Congress to take action to save hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese "who face certain destruction because they stood by our side."

"We have a moral obligation here that cannot be denied," Meany declared in letters to the Democratic and Republican leadership of both houses and to key members of the House and Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees.

"If we do not stand by these desperate people, how can we ever claim to conduct a credible foreign policy?" Meany asked.

"Even if the Congress has decided—wrongly in our view—to write off the country of South Vietnam, it simply cannot and must not abandon the masses of human beings who will pay with their lives for their loyalty to us."

Meanwhile, the House voted 230 to 187 to authorize $327 million for humanitarian and evacuation costs in connection with removal of Vietnam refugees. The Senate earlier voted 75 to 17 to authorize $250 million for evacuation and refugee relief. A conference was set to work out differences between the two aid bills.

Pointing up the certainty of retribution against South Vietnamese supporters of U.S. policies, Meany forwarded eyewitness reports of atrocities that have taken place in recent days in areas overrun by the Communists.

The reports were made to the U.S. Embassy in Saigon and directly to AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington by telephone from the CVT, South Vietnam's labor confederation.

"These grim developments, reviewed in the light of North Vietnam's long history of using systematic terrorism to consolidate its power, suggest that the bloodbath many of us have feared would fol-

Endorses $5 Billion Works Plan

Jobs for America's unemployed are more important than holding down the budget deficit, AFL-CIO President George Meany told Congress.

Meany urged approval of a $5 billion accelerated public works construction program. Along with other economic stimulants, he testified at House hearings, this could point the nation back to economic health.

He told a questioner that the cure for budget deficits is jobs. "Instead of paying people unemployment benefits or welfare, you get them jobs—and then they pay taxes."

The United States can stand a temporary $100 billion deficit, Meany said, but drawing the deficit line at $60 billion, or even the somewhat higher figures suggested by congressional budget committees, would spell "disaster" for America's jobless workers.

The labor-backed bill is sponsored by House Public Works Committee Chairman Robert E. Jones (D-Ala.) and Rep. Robert A. Roe (D-N.J.), whose subcommittee is holding the hearings.

The bill would provide full federal financing of public works projects that cities and states need but can't afford. It is one of the economic recovery measures announced by House

Unemployed Exceed 6% In 105 Areas

The number of major labor areas with substantial unemployment—6 percent or more—swelled to a record 105 in March with the addition of 31 areas, the Labor Dept. announced, as the nation's deepest and longest recession since the 1930s continued to exact a heavy toll among American workers.

The Labor Dept. each month surveys 150 major employment centers around the country, and classifies them according to the adequacy of their labor supply. An area is placed in the "substantial unemployment" category when its jobless rate is 6 percent or more, discounting seasonal factors, and this rate is expected to hold for another two months.

"The rise from 74 in February to 105 among the 150 major areas

Labor Calls for Major Overhaul Of 'Outmoded' Jobless Aid System

A major overhaul of the "outmoded and fragmented" unemployment compensation system was proposed by the AFL-CIO at House hearings.

The system developed 40 years ago and the patchwork programs of extended benefits provided during crisis levels of joblessness remains "far short of meeting the needs of the nation's unemployed," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified.

Seidman noted that half the unemployed aren't receiving compensation and that the average wage replacement for those who do get benefits amounts to only 40 percent of their lost wages.

This deficiency is hampering economic recovery as well as imposing severe hardships on the jobless, Seidman told a Ways & Means subcommittee. He urged that the universal coverage of all wage and salary workers that Congress enacted recently as "a one-year, stop-gap measure" be made a permanent part of the law. In addition, he called for:

- A wage replacement benefit keyed to two-thirds of a worker's former wages, subject to a ceiling of not less than three-fourths of the average wage in the state.
- Standards for qualifying that would assure that a person with 20 weeks of employment could receive a full 26 weeks of unemployment benefits.
- A six-week limit on the disqualification penalty that could be imposed on an unemployed worker, with lesser penalties for minor infringements.

As for the assortment of temporary and permanent legislation providing for extended benefits for the jobless during periods of high unemployment, Seidman said the program "simply has not worked." He noted that "Congress has had to tinker with it no less than 10

HRDI Works to Place Jobless In Midst of 'Disaster' to Economy

Chicago—More than 100 staff members of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute were called on by HRDI President Alan Kistler to "work doubly hard" to carry out their mission of combating joblessness despite "the burdens of the depression we are now facing."

A week-long HRDI conference drew together officers and staff members from 52 HRDI offices throughout the United States, including the newest office in Alaska.

In his keynote address to the conference Kistler reviewed previous accomplishments of the institute, which was founded in 1968, and said:

"HRDI's job has always been difficult. Today it's like working in a disaster area. Certainly, a man who loses his job and loses his house because he can't make the mortgage payments is just as homeless and in need of help as those people in towns who were struck by tornadoes last year here in the Midwest."

He pointed out that union members the institute turned to a year ago for help in developing jobs for disadvantaged workers "are themselves looking to HRDI for help this year.

"We have a special responsibility to these people to find jobs and to see that they benefit from the manpower programs HRDI is trying to implement," Kistler declared.

Charles E. Bradford, acting executive director of HRDI, said in his report that the institute had met and surpassed its contractual commitments for job placement and development, even though, "the economy was a disaster, job openings were scarce and the unions had more unemployed members than ever before."

Bradford said HRDI had developed 28,515 jobs in the past year, 6,518 more than its goal, and placed more than 12,000 persons in good jobs paying an average of $3.57 an hour.

He also reported that goals for placing ex-offenders and poverty-level workers were substantially surpassed. Most placements, he noted, "were in companies with union contracts."

Both Kistler and Bradford stressed that HRDI has a major role in implementing the AFL-CIO action program for putting America back to work.

"This is HRDI's obligation to the AFL-CIO," Bradford said. "Through HRDI and other AFL-CIO affiliates, the labor movement can and will play a major role in pulling the jobless out of this economic mess."

"We're not merely in a recession," Kistler said, "we're in a depression. And the AFL-CIO is the only voice on the national scene with a comprehensive, coherent program to meet the job problems millions of Americans are facing. HRDI has a specific designated role in this crisis. We have to bring all our expertise and hard-won experience to bear on these problems."

Conference delegates attended workshops throughout the week for close scrutiny of current programs and for development of staff skills necessary to carry out the programs. They also heard from Robert McConnon, director of the Office of National Programs in the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

Discussing his concerns over programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act, McConnon said:

"We are proceeding into a period of high unemployment without a cohesive national manpower program. For example, only 3 percent of CETA funds go to older workers. Yet they represent 20 percent of the population. Only 6 percent goes to on-the-job training. Both of these areas need to be strengthened."

Labor economist and consultant Stanley Ruttenberg, in an address to the staff conference, predicted that there will be a great increase in public works spending at the local level in the next few months. He urged HRDI staff members to make certain labor is well represented in local manpower planning councils.

"You have major responsibilities to carry out," Ruttenberg said. "You must make special efforts to see that labor is represented on the vital planning committees and the evalution and monitoring committees of the local councils."

AFL-CIO Vice President Joseph D. Keenan, an HRDI trustee and secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, also dealt with the special role of HRDI.

"Who is helped by HRDI programs?" Keenan asked. "Those who have not developed any skills, victims of racial discrimination and language discrimination, ex-offenders, welfare recipients, veterans, teenagers, anyone who has difficulty in finding and keeping decent paying jobs. These are the people HRDI helps."

Keenan reviewed the wide ranging accomplishments of HRDI and concluded: "The goals of HRDI and the labor movement are intertwined."

Rail Buildup Urged to Aid Energy Saving

The United Transportation Union has called on Congress and the railroad industry to take steps to expand the nation's railroads, pointing out their high degree of efficiency in transporting both freight and passengers.

Releasing a new study called "Transportation and Energy," UTU President Al H. Chesser told a Washington, D.C., news conference that the railroads' advantages are so far-reaching virtually all Americans would benefit from a buildup.

"Railroads consume only 3 percent of all transportation energy to haul more than 40 percent of the nation's freight," Chesser said.

Charging that federal transportation and energy policy has been consistently biased against railroads, Chesser proposed new investment and experimentation to increase and improve rail transportation, particularly in the urban corridors between Boston and Washington, Seattle and San Diego, Chicago and Pittsburgh.

Institution of this program could save 8 million gallons of fuel a year by 1980, he said. Copies of the study were sent to all members of Congress, transportation planners and government agencies involved with transportation.

Funds Pushed to Aid Vocational Training

Federal vocational education programs should be extended and their funding authorization increased as a key element in helping to get America back to work, the AFL-CIO urged in congressional testimony.

Education Director Walter G. Davis told a House Education subcommittee that the Vocational Education Act, which was adopted in 1963 and amended in 1968, has been the most successful of all federal programs in the field of education.

Davis also noted that graduates of programs set up under the act have an outstanding record of job placement in addition to contributing to the productivity of the nation's economy. Unless Congress extends the act, it will expire June 30.

Tracing the development of federal vocational programs, Davis observed that vocational education was in a deplorable state before the 1963 law was enacted.

"It was evident that when school boards began to divide scarce education funds, the parents of future Harvard graduates carried more political weight than the parents of future bricklayers and carpenters," he said.

The result was that throughout the nation, vocational training students were being taught obsolete skills on obsolete equipment. And because of the competition for educational funds, Davis noted, handicapped and disadvantaged children also failed to get adequate training.

Despite the early success of federal vocational training programs, Davis noted that the record of funding during the past three administrations has been dissappointing with appropriations running far below authorized levels.

"Moreover, there has been a dangerous tendency to utilize specific vocational funds for other programs," Davis observed. "Much of the money supporting the currently fashionable 'career education' has been siphoned away from discretionary vocational education funds."

He pointed out that use of vocational education funds for other programs was not what Congress intended when it passed the 1963 legislation.

Davis called on Congress to reject a proposal of the Ford Administration to consolidate education funds and further drain away the money intended for vocational training programs. Instead, he said, organized labor sees the need for additional categories of funding to finance specific programs through separate authorization.

Davis also expressed concern that states have been overstepping their discretionary powers by failing to budget enough funds for classroom instruction in apprenticeship training programs.

He also cited an imbalance in the distribution of vocational education funds, noting that states have failed to keep pace with the shift in the population from rural areas to urban centers.

Joining with Davis in the testimony were Kenneth Young, assistant director of legislation, and John A. Sessions of the federation's Dept. of Education.

House Panel Backs Bill Lifting Child Labor Ban

A labor-opposed bill to allow big farm enterprises to employ children under the age of 12 won a surprising 5-1 endorsement from a House subcommittee, and the efforts to block it shifted to the full Education & Labor Committee.

Both the AFL-CIO and the Administration oppose the legislation that is sponsored by Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.) and is being pushed by commercial strawberry growers in the Pacific Northwest and farm groups in some other parts of the nation.

The bill would repeal an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act adopted just last year that prohibits farms subject to the wage-hour law from employing children less than 12 years of age. Only large farms, those using more than 500 man-days of hired labor, are subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn said the trade union movement rejects the contention "that agriculture must employ very young children in order to survive."

He said the AFL-CIO considers employment of pre-teen children on big farms detrimental to their well-being, a form of economic exploitation and a means of holding down the wages of mature workers.

Meiklejohn scoffed at testimony by one farm employer who told the subcommittee: "There is nothing quite like seeing a child six, eight or 10 years old stand in line waiting for his paycheck at the end of the week. He really feels like a man."

With unemployment above the national average in the states most directly affected, Meiklejohn suggested that a labor shortage couldn't properly be used as an excuse for hiring small children.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Bernard E. DeLury said there is no shortage of older teenagers available to work on farms. And even if the employment of children under 12 were limited to harvests not requiring the use of machinery, he foresaw demands of vegetable growers in the Rio Grande Valley and through sections of the South and Midwest for authority to hire children under 12.

Steelworkers Due 8¢ COL Increase

Pittsburgh—More than 400,000 Steelworkers in the basic steel and container industries will receive cost of living increases of 8 cents an hour in May, the USWA reported.

The adjustments will go into effect May 1 for 400,000 USWA members employed by 10 major basic steel companies and on May 15 for 36,300 members of four major container firms.

Earlier COL adjustments under the union's 1974 contracts raised the hourly pay of the USWA members 56 cents, union President I. W. Abel noted.

Conference Program:

Building Trades Take Case For Job Action to Congress

workers is without a job, Georgine noted. And many others, although counted as employed, are on short weeks because of lack of work.

The severity of the construction crisis is fueling the nation's overall unemployment problem and it will take "massive emergency measures" to turn the economy around and put America back to work.

He pledged the department's full efforts to accomplish the program adopted by the conference. To do this, "we intend to use every bit of influence we can muster with Congress . . . the Executive Branch . . . every state, county and local government."

The resolutions adopted by the conference dealt with the issues raised by speakers and with others outlined in a booklet of position papers.

A comprehensive resolution on unemployment covered labor's program for strengthening the jobless compensation system, urged health care for those who lose their insurance coverage along with their jobs, and asked federal assumption of welfare costs.

Another resolution backed legislation to crack down on employers who hire and exploit illegal aliens and urged more funds for enforcement of immigration laws.

The conference strongly defended the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law in a resolution and reiterated support for legislation to allow on-site picketing.

Before acting on a series of resolutions, delegates listened to formal reports on major problem areas:

● Martin J. Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, said lack of capital funds has forced cancellation or postponement of construction of 130 generating plants in recent months—despite the nation's urgent need for energy self-sufficiency.

Those projects alone would mean more than 83 million manhours of construction work, he noted.

Ward called for an expanded money supply, lower interest rates and direct government loans, if necessary, to enable the utility industry to meet expansion needs. And he urged also the importance of quick action by Congress to authorize slurry pipelines to carry coal mixed with water from mines to power plants.

● Charles H. Pillard, president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, urged expanded public works programs concentrated in areas where unemployment is highest.

"Public works not only put the unemployed back to work but they also build schools in poor and undeveloped areas; they build hospitals for medically underprivileged people, and they rebuild roads where they are needed," he said.

● Hunter P. Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, called for "a balanced and flexible transportation policy" that would provide both public mass transit and continued highway improvement.

"Both forms of transportation are vital," he said. "Both are necessary to insure future economic growth, and neither will be able to replace the other."

● William Sidell, president of the Carpenters, noted that while unemployment in construction is twice as bad as in the overall economy, the unemployment rate in residential construction is twice as bad as in the construction industry as a whole. Further, he noted, each new home that is built means additional jobs making furniture, carpeting, appliances, as well as building supplies and public facilities.

The greatest need, he said, is for a policy of credit allocation to provide mortgage funds and a major reform of the Federal Reserve Board to compel policies lowering interest rates.

● President S. Frank Raftery of the Painters said the quickest way to create jobs for idled construction workers would be to release and spend federal funds voted by Congress but impounded or deferred by the President. While there has been some improvement from court and congressional action, he said billions of dollars are still tied up by "a game of bureaucratic ring-around-the-rosy."

The complex approval and review procedures set up by the Environmental Protection Agency, Raftery said, have resulted in a lag of more than five years between planning and construction starts. As a consequence, he said, the release of $9 billion in construction funds this year means actual spending of only $50 million in the coming year.

● Thomas F. Murphy, president of the Bricklayers, expressed the frustration and resentment of the building crafts at being made to appear anti-environment when they protest that endless lawsuits and administrative delays are needlessly holding up major construction projects.

"Union building tradesmen," he said, "believe in clean water, clean air and in safe noise levels —for themselves, their families and all Americans." But they want decisions made on merits and not on technicalities.

Congressional committees that met in special session to consider proposals from the building trades representatives were the House and Senate Labor Committees, House and Senate Banking Committees, House and Senate Interior Committees, House and Senate Public Works Committees, House Ways & Means Committee and Senate Finance Committee.

White House Duties Assigned to Usery

W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, has been appointed a special presidential assistant for labor-management negotiations.

The White House said Usery will continue to head the FMCS while taking on the additional functions of coordinating efforts to settle disputes traditionally beyond the scope of the mediation service. This would include such areas as transportation and atomic energy.

2 Million Workers Due Wage-Hour Improvement

Nearly 2 million workers will be entitled to overtime pay after fewer hours worked starting May 1 when an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act takes effect. The reductions apply to groups that are now partially exempt from the basic FLSA overtime standard of time-and-a-half after 40 hours a week.

The largest group consists of 1.5 million hotel and motel workers, who currently are legally entitled to overtime only after 48 hours. This will be reduced to 46 hours on May 1.

Within this group, an estimated 250,000 housekeeping and custodial workers will receive two further reductions in straight-time hours. On May 1, 1976, they will be entitled to overtime pay after 44 hours and on May 1, 1977, after 40 hours.

In addition, 246,000 food service employes will have their maximum straight-time hours reduced from 48 to 44 this May 1. The same reduction will apply to local transit drivers, bowling establishment workers, seafood canning and processing employes and certain telegraph employes.

CWA Fights Rate Hike To Struck Phone Firm

Rochester, N.Y.—The Communications Workers called on the New York State Public Service Commission to deny any portion of a $16 million rate hike sought by the Rochester Telephone Co.

The CWA charged that the telephone firm has shown contempt for the public interest and absolute disregard for its employes in refusing efforts to resolve a union-management dispute. The telephone company's 1,500 plant department employes have been on strike since last Nov. 22.

CWA Vice President Morton Bahr charged in a statement to the commission that while the company is attempting to pattern its rates after those charged by the Bell System, it wants to impose substandard wages and benefits on its employes.

Although the commission has taken the position that it could not deny a rate increase because of a labor dispute, Bahr said that much more is involved, including a marked decrease in service to subscribers.

He further noted that more than 45,000 Rochester telephone subscribers, a unanimous Rochester city council and scores of members of the state legislature have also urged the commission to deny the rate increase.

Bahr pointed out that the union had tried to avert the strike by continuing negotiations for almost a month after its old contract expired. He said the major cause of the strike was the company's attempt to reverse the progress made in earlier CWA contracts in working conditions, wages and fringe benefits.

Subsequent efforts by the CWA and the New York State Board of Mediation to find an acceptable solution to the five-month strike have been totally rejected by the company, Bahr charged.

Not only has the company refused to meet with CWA President Glenn E. Watts, but it also rejected fact-finding procedures mandated by state law. The firm is now attempting in federal court to overturn the state statute governing labor-management disputes in the private sector.

"Rochester Tel obviously has something to hide," Bahr declared. "It seeks to pattern its rates upon those of the Bell System, but wants serious contract retrogression aimed at its employes whose work is identical with that of the New York Telephone Co."

Since the start of the strike, the CWA charged that Rochester Telephone has contracted with an Arizona firm to hire strikebreakers, transport them across state lines and pay them more than double the wages offered its striking employes.

Meany Urges Aid to Rescue Vietnam Allies

low a Communist takeover of the South has in fact begun," Meany said.

He said the AFL-CIO has been advised that Peter Nguyen Huy Trai, the bishop of Ban Me Thuot, and two priests have been tried by a "people's court" and executed. In addition, Paul Nguyen Van Hoa, the bishop of Phan Thiet, and four more priests have also been executed, he said in his letter.

Urging bold and forthright action, Meany called on Congress to take "whatever steps are necessary, including the use of American troops, to facilitate the evacuation" of Cambodian and Vietnamese endangered by a Communist takeover.

This "would send a message to our allies and 'potential adversaries' throughout the world and perhaps restore some of that sense of hope in America's role in the world that has been so badly damaged in recent months," Meany said.

Four days after Meany's letter was made public, Attorney General Edward H. Levi issued orders permitting up to 130,000 Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees to enter the United States. These are persons whose lives would be in danger under a Communist regime:

● 50,000 "high risk" Vietnamese refugees and their families, including past and present U.S. government employes and Vietnamese officials.

● Between 10,000 and 75,000 Vietnamese nationals who are immediate relatives of American citizens or permanent resident aliens.

● 1,000 Vietnamese now at Clark Air Base in the Philippines, provided they qualify as high risk individuals.

● 1,000 Cambodians now in Thailand who had been evacuated from Cambodia by the U.S.

● 5,000 Cambodian diplomats in third countries facing forcible return or expulsion.

The Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously endorsed Levi's action.

The Jobs Deficit

ON THE PROJECTED budget deficit for this coming year, the President puts a $60 billion limit and I understand that the House Budget Committee and the Senate Budget Committee put it up to maybe $65 billion or $67 billion.

This spells disaster. We have to face up to the fact that this country is big enough to take a $100 billion deficit. After all, this is a capitalistic system.

AT&T can go out and borrow $500 million and borrow it without any trouble at all. Why? Because they are a growing concern. They are a viable concern. They have assets. They do not sell off their assets when they need money. They go out and raise money.

Why shouldn't Uncle Sam do the same thing? Uncle Sam is a viable concern and this idea that we are going to be ruined by a budget deficit is absolutely ridiculous.

If we listened to the economists, Hitler would have won the war in 1941, 1942, 1943, because the economists said America could not afford to rearm itself and to rearm and supply our allies overseas and we had the greatest production miracle in the history of mankind financed by this government here, financed by the American people, with a huge deficit.

So, we can face a deficit. There is nothing sinful about a deficit, this is a part of our economy. This is the type of society that we live in. You live on borrowed money. You do not sell off your assets. We are not going to sell the national parks. We are not going to sell the great natural resources we have. We are going to go out and borrow from the American people.

In 1947 the gross national product was $219 billion and our national debt was $225 billion. Of course, this was the aftermath of the war.

In 1960, our gross national product was $495 billion and we owed $237 billion. In other words, 47 percent of our gross national product.

WE COME DOWN to today and the last figure we have as an estimate is the gross national product of 1974 of $1,348 billion, with a national debt of $346 billion. In other words, 25 percent.

So, we have come from 102 percent in '47, 89 percent in '48, 82 percent in '49, 83 percent in '50, and we are now down to 25 percent. We are much better off than we were in the last 20 years and still you get these people crying the only solution is to balance the budget.

Well, let me tell you, they are not going to put a white flag on top of the Kremlin and surrender to us if we happen to balance the budget.

The way to balance the budget is to put people back to work and get them paying taxes. That is the way to balance the budget.

The problem is not the budget and the budget deficit. The problem is the jobs. Get America back to work. Find out how much money you need to get these people back to work and then find out where to get the money and we can get it.

This is a very, very wealthy country. This country has tremendous resources and the idea that we cannot face a deficit or that we cannot raise the national debt to where it is 50 percent of the gross national product when it was 100 percent of the gross national product 30 years ago, to me this is absolutely ridiculous.

A Word Edgewise:

Getting Friends, Foes Straight Is Basic Foreign Policy Need

By John P. Roche

AS THE GRIM NIGHT settles over Southeast Asia, those of us who have agonized over the American commitment for a decade or more are simply heartsick. Not just because we lost—though I am not a good loser and have never yet met one—but because of all the wrong turns that were taken in a basically good cause.

Perhaps the most ironic coincidence of all is that Ambassador Graham Martin, who is witnessing at first hand the shambles in South Vietnam, was the most vehement and persuasive opponent of the "Americanization" of the war—which was the real source of our trouble. However, there is nothing less fruitful than rewriting history as it should have happened. History is not like a film where, if the bad guy outdraws the sheriff, you can shout "cut!" and do a rerun with the appropriate ending.

So, where are we? What are the implications? What should be our national focus? First of all, the President of the United States should stop blaming the Congress for doing precisely what it was elected to do: represent the views of the American people. The hard fact must be faced that the American people blacked out Southeast Asia on their mental maps; they don't want to hear any more about it and probably wish the whole place was 10 feet underwater. The reasons for this are not hard to understand. As the average citizen looks back, he recalls the 50,000 dead, the 300,000 wounded, the $140 billion shot down the drain, and asks a quite sensible question: "Why?"

Ten or 15 years ago there was an answer: to prevent the spread of Communist totalitarianism. But listening to President Ford's speech demonstrated the degree to which that perfectly sound answer has been undermined: the "enemy" of 1960 has in 1975 become the "potential adversary." The minute Mr. Nixon put detente at the top of the list of international objectives and popped up chatting with Brezhnev and Mao, the line between them and us was hopelessly blurred. After all, if you accept the ideological legitimacy of the Soviet Union and the Chinese People's Republic, why shoot up their small cousin, North Vietnam?

In saying this I am not nominating myself for president of the Committee for an Insane Nuclear Policy. I am merely arguing that we must look reality in the face; and the reality, as I can document liberally from my reading of the Soviet and Chinese Communist press, is that they are at war with us, that they have repeatedly dedicated themselves to the destruction of democracy. One of the reasons it is so hard to get people to accept this fact is they think that if it is true, there will be war. Since war is too horrible to contemplate, the backward logic runs, they can't be dedicated to the destruction of democracy. And you, Roche, when you write things like this, are a warmonger.

As I have confessed before, gunfire makes me extremely nervous and I am as terrified as the next man at the possibility of nuclear war. But one of the many things I learned from my father was that the surest way to find trouble is to run from it. Thus I am prepared to argue that no rational policy of dealing with the Communist powers can be formulated except on the assumption of implacable ideological hostility.

THE UNILATERAL DETENTE of the past five years must stop, and we should go over to the ideological offensive. Our first national priority, then, is to get our categories straight. If the U.S. government permits the shipment to the USSR of sophisticated electronic equipment (the better to target their missiles with), who can blame the citizen for taking a vacation from world affairs?

The second item on our national agenda should be a full-scale review of our commitments with an honest recognition that the debacle in Southeast Asia has weakened our credibility. Vice President Rockefeller, attending Chiang Kai-shek's funeral, gave an address which never mentioned our mutual defense treaty with the Republic of China. Is it still on? Or, did Secretary Kissinger whisper something to Chou En-lai?

Indeed, there has been too damn much whispering: Let's find out who said what to whom. "Private communications," in Press Secretary Ron Nessen's clumsy phrase, may not include "secret commitments," but let the public make that judgment. I am not suggesting a scapegoat hunt—there is enough blame to go 'round—but a grand inquest which could clear the air and restore our sense of national purpose. We are not a Fourth Century Rome.

A British Viewpoint II:

Murderer's Visit to Haunt TUC Leaders

On Mar. 31, a Soviet "trade union" delegation visited Great Britain at the invitation of the British Trades Union Congress and in exchange for a TUC delegation's visit to Moscow in 1973. Heading the Soviet delegation was Alexander Shelepin, chairman of the "All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions of the USSR."

Before his appointment as head of the Russian "trade unions," Mr. Shelepin was head of the KGB (1958-61), the hated Soviet secret police. In this capacity, Mr. Shelepin has been accused, among other things of having directed the murders of two anti-Soviet Ukrainian refugees.

His visit to London was greeted by protest demonstrations and sharp editorial attacks in British newspapers. Among the sharpest were two articles in the Times of London by Bernard Levin. The first was reprinted with permission from the Times last week; the second appears below.

TODAY, THE MURDERERS are among us; Mr. Alexander Shelepin has arrived to be fawned over by Mr. Len Murray on behalf of the TUC, and possibly even hobnob merrily with the shameless Mr. Clive Jenkins.

When I say murderers, I am not using the word only as a reminder of the criminal nature of the regime which Shelepin serves; I am not even thinking of the fact that as a former head of the KGB, Shelepin was a murderer in the sense in which every head of that organization has been. (Indeed, in terms of numbers exterminated in the camps, he was probably less homicidal than any other holder of the post.)

I mean murderer in exactly the same sense as would be appropriate in describing a Mafia chief who engages a "hitman" to kill someone who has fallen foul of the organization.

In 1959, the Soviet leaders were becoming alarmed, or at the least disturbed, by the activities abroad of Ukrainian refugees who had managed to escape from the Soviet Union and were having some success in disseminating the truth about the renewed campaign, which had intensified in the previous year, to crush all remaining Ukrainian national individuality.

Two of the leaders of the Ukrainian refugees (has anybody else noticed the bland way in which our minimizers of Soviet tyranny tend to use the slightly raffish and emollient word "émigré" to describe those who have escaped from that vast prison, usually preferring to reserve the starker "refugee" for victims, of say, right-wing Chilean oppression?) were Lev Rebet and Stepan Bandera, who lived in West Germany.

It was decided to have them killed, and the KGB "hit-man," Bogdan Stashinsky, was selected for the job. (Obviously, such a double murder, on the territory of an independent foreign state, was a project which could only have been initiated with the full personal approval of the head of the organization, Shelepin.)

Stashinsky travelled from Moscow to Munich and carried out his orders; he murdered both troublesome refugees by firing cyanide pellets in their faces. He then returned to Moscow, where he was received in public audience by Shelepin, who personally invested him with the Order of the Red Banner.

The citation congratulated Stashinsky on carrying out "an important government commission," and Shelepin drew attention, in his speech, to the fact that the citation was signed by both the Chairman and the Secretary of the Presidium.

This was not designed to be the end of Stashinsky's career. On the contrary, it was made clear to him that a wonderful horizon as an assassin, and as the director of a squad of other assassins, was opening out before him. (One of the first steps taken by Shelepin's KGB in grooming their new activist was to arrange for him to learn English; apparently this would be useful for the work Shelepin had in mind for him, which he described to Stashinsky as "difficult but honorable."

There followed one of the most extraordinary and heartening stories in the entire history of tyranny. Stashinsky had fallen in love in Germany (where he had assumed a German cover-name and identity), with a German girl called Inge Pohl, and they were married. (His employers wanted him to marry another KGB agent, but he assured them Inge was politically "reliable" and they allowed him to go ahead.)

Even as a huge campaign was mounted by the KGB to keep Stashinsky a docile Communist robot and to turn Inge into another, she was chipping away at the life of lies and crime her husband was leading, and opening his eyes to the true nature of his masters and their regime.

Eventually, in circumstances more like a spy-film than real life (or indeed than most spy-films) they defected to West Berlin—that is how we know the full details of the story I have recounted—and there Stashinsky confessed to the murders of Rebet and Bandera, for which he was tried, and was sentenced to eight years imprisonment.

At his trial the judge said that "the guilt of those from whom he received his orders is far greater . . . political murder has now become institutionalized," and Stashinsky said "I wanted to unburden my conscience, and I wanted to give worldwide publicity to the way in which 'peaceful co-existence' really works in practice."

Well, for four days, we shall have an even better, or at any rate closer, demonstration of "the way in which 'peaceful co-existence' really works in practice" as the man who directed, briefed, congratulated and decorated Stashinsky for the murder of two of his victims who believed that they were beyond Shelepin's power, meets British trades unionists, headed by the poor dim thing who is their appointed leader and spokesman, to discuss "matters of mutual concern."

That sounds like an abrupt non sequitur, and as a matter of fact it is. For Shelepin's appointment as head of the Soviet "trades union" organization had and has no more validity in terms of any institution bearing the same name in free countries than would his appointment as Chief Justice of the Soviet Supreme Court (equally likely, incidentally, as his lack of any legal qualifications is no greater than his lack of any knowledge or experience of industry or workers' interests, and the one job has no more to do with justice than the other with trades unions, both being instruments through which the total state direction of all aspects of Soviet life are achieved).

From a country where strikes are treated as crimes and strikers, if they are too numerous or too resistant to be arrested, are simply shot down, where no collective bargaining exists, where all organizations except those authorized by, and part of, the State are forbidden, where the principal task of organizations called "unions" is to enforce labor discipline and to carry out—in Shelepin's own words—"the successful implementation of the Party's directives on the development of the national economy," and where it excites no comment (and where no comment would be permitted if it were excited) that the head of the secret police should be appointed to run the national "trades union" body—from such a country comes such a man, a murderer and hirer of murderers, an oppressor and director of oppressors, a liar and servant of liars.

He comes to Britain, where the corruption of the trades union movement has now gone so far that he can be welcomed here, and while here treated as the opposite number of Len Murray, rather than—as would be more appropriate—the opposite number of Ronald Kray.

There will, I hope, be continuous demonstrations throughout the visit. I hope that the demonstrations will be peaceful and orderly, and I hope that they will be massive and vociferous. I hope that the task of showing Shelepin that his nature and role are fully understood here, and that the impudence of his claim to represent Soviet "trades unions" is likewise justly estimated, will not be left only to organizations of refugees from Soviet persecution or the people who work on behalf of those still suffering from it.

I hope—particularly since no less important, and possibly more so, is the task of showing the British people the nature and extent of the poison that has entered the trades union body here—that the demonstrators will include many members of British trades unions, who will recall (I see no reason why it should not be the message on the demonstrators' banners) the words of Mr. Frank Chapple, one of the best and most truly representative of all British union leaders, who said: "The only experience Shelepin has of workers is throwing them in jail."

That is indeed the case, and it is the case against permitting Shelepin to enter this country as a trades union leader, whatever obligations we may have to allow Soviet Government representatives here. It is now too late to prevent him entering, and has clearly been too late from the start to expect the TUC to acquire consciousness of the enormity of what they are doing to change their mind about doing it.

But it is not too late to ensure that Shelepin, and any British trades union and Labor Party officials or MPs associating with him, to be met, wherever they dare to show their faces in public, by people determined to express the contempt and disgust that constitute the proper reaction to this visit.

Programs Urged to Benefit All:

Problems of Elderly Magnified For Nation's Minority Groups

PROBLEMS of low income, health and housing that are so severe for older Americans are magnified for the elderly among the nation's black and other minority groups, two experts on aging declared on Labor News Conference.

The difficulty of meeting the needs of the elderly in a youth-oriented society, when further complicated by factors of race and social disadvantage, becomes multiple jeopardy, said Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Hobart Jackson, chairman of the board of the National Caucus on the Black Aged. Jackson pointed out that half of the nation's black elderly have sub-poverty level incomes, about double the rate for the white elderly.

Smedley and Jackson called for a stepped-up effort to locate the more than 2 million elderly who are eligible for, but haven't yet enrolled in the Supplementary Security Income program shaped by Congress two years ago. Jackson called for "an alert—mostly using their peers in a door-to-door campaign." He agreed with Smedley on the need to prod the Administration for an outreach effort to make sure that those who are eligible for SSI know about the program and have a chance to sign up.

Smedley and Jackson said that the health problems of the elderly will not be effectively met as long as there is a separate program for the poor. They said that health care and health services should be a right, not a privilege; that there should be no distinction between the poor and the affluent in receiving such care, and that guarantees should be spelled out in any national health insurance law passed by Congress.

Jackson said that while the NCBA does zero-in primarily on the problems of the black aged, both the membership and leadership of the organization come from all segments of U.S. society. "We feel that if the programs that we recommend are enacted, all of the elderly will benefit," he asserted, and the NCBA recognizes the importance of "coalitions with other groups in that direction."

Reporters questioning Smedley and Jackson were Theodor Schuchat of North American Newspaper Alliance and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. Labor News Conference is broadcast Tuesdays over Mutual radio.

Worried Americans

The people need to know that the leaders of their government see human beings in unemployment lines, not statistics. Workers must believe that their government recognizes, as they do, that jobs are a worker's only hedge against inflation and disaster.

The unemployed who need food stamps are not cheaters; they are hungry. The jobless are not loafers; they are the victims of ill-advised governmental policies. Those who fear unemployment and fear to purchase needed goods now have not given up on America; they are just worried sick.

Workers know in their hearts that this nation can bear any burden, meet any hardships, defeat any foe—if their leaders deal compassionately, sensibly, fairly, and with all of its people.

—From a statement by AFL-CIO President George Meany.

SEVERE PROBLEMS that afflict older Americans are magnified for the elderly among the nation's minority groups, Hobart Jackson, second from left, board chairman, National Caucus on the Black Aged, and Lawrence Smedley, third from left, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, declared.

UNION NEGOTIATORS bring to the bargaining table contract proposals on behalf of 600,000 postal workers. Bargaining for a new national agreement with the U.S. Postal Service got under way in Washington Apr. 21. The present two-year contract expires July 20. Unions bargaining together are the American Postal Workers, the Letter Carriers, the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers—all AFL-CIO affiliates—and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

Illegal Underpayments:

Sharp Jump Found In Wage Violations

Employers illegally underpaid 350,540 workers protected by federal wage and hour laws by nearly $82 million in the first nine months of fiscal year 1975, the Labor Dept.'s wage and hour division reported.

The amount of underpayment was up sharply from the $70.3 million found owed to 266,600 workers during the same period in fiscal 1974. The chiseling occurred during the period from July 30, 1974 to Mar. 31, 1975.

"We attribute the increase to vigorous enforcement of the law by our compliance officers, greater awareness by workers of their wage rights, and to a rise in employer violations following two minimum wage increases since May 1974," Bernard E. DeLury, assistant secretary for employment standards, said.

Also in the same nine months more than 282,000 employes received about $43.2 million in back wages, the Labor Dept. said.

The difference between the total money found due to employes and the actual amount paid them is largely the result of employers' refusals to pay back wages in cases unsuitable for litigation by the Labor Dept., the wage and hour division noted.

The wage and hour division is responsible for enforcing provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and other wage and hour laws. The FLSA sets minimum wage, overtime and child labor standards for most industries in interstate commerce.

The government noted that 165,339 workers were underpaid a total of $2.2 million in minimum-wage payments in the first nine months of fiscal 1975. In the same period a year earlier, 104,372 workers were underpaid nearly $18 million.

Overtime underpayment amounted to $34.5 million for 192,764 workers, compared to $35.6 million owed 161,543 employes over the comparable period of 1974.

Under the Equal Pay Act, 25,066 workers were underpaid $20.9 million, compared to 22,321 who were cheated of $14.2 million in the same period a year earlier. The act requires equal pay for men and women performing substantially equal work in the same establishment.

Under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, 1,610 workers were found to have been underpaid $4.2 million over the period, compared to 1,106 workers who were shorted $2.5 million in the first nine months of 1974. The law protects workers between the ages of 40 and 65 from job and wage discrimination based on age.

Seventy-four workers were underpaid $37,778 as a result of violations of the federal wage garnishment law which limits the amount that may garnished from an employe's pay and prohibits the firing of an employe for garnishment for a single debt. A year earlier, 68 employes were cheated of $17,326.

Poll Demonstrates Public Support Of Social Security Improvement

By John R. Oravec

A great majority of Americans favors automatic cost of living increases in social security benefits without arbitrary limitations and the use of general tax revenues to meet the needs of the elderly—two positions long advocated by organized labor.

The findings are among the highlights of a Louis Harris Poll commissioned by the National Council on Aging (NCOA).

Of the 4,254 persons surveyed during late spring and early summer of 1974, Harris said 97 percent expressed the belief that increases in social security benefits should be made automatically based on rises in the consumer price index. And there was no indication of public support for limiting such cost-of-living increases.

"This is in direct conflict with the effort of President Ford to limit the increase to 5 percent, despite a cost-of-living increase of about 12 percent last year," NOCA President Albert J. Abrams pointed out.

The study also showed that 81 percent of the public feels the federal government has the responsibility to use general tax revenues in assisting older persons.

"There certainly is no support for any notion of a taxpayers' revolt against more assistance to the elderly," Abrams observed.

The Council on Aging described the Harris study as the most extensive ever conducted to determine the public's attitude toward aging and to document the views and attitudes of older Americans about themselves.

Of the 4,254 persons questioned in the survey, 1,457 were between the ages of 18 and 60 and 2,797 were over 65.

Harris also found that 86 percent of the public is opposed to mandatory retirement at a fixed age if the worker wants to continue working and is able to do a good job.

"Most older people of this country have the desire and the potential to be productive, contributing members of our society," Abrams noted in citing the Harris data. "They do not want to be 'put on the shelf' and excluded from social and economic activities."

Among the older persons now retired, 37 percent—or 4.4 million—said they did not retire out of choice, and about 31 percent of those said they would like to be working now.

The pollsters also found that 76 percent of the public agrees that "no matter how much a person earned during his working years, he should be able to have enough money to live on comfortably when older and retired."

The NOCA also said that the survey revealed that most older people feel their condition in life is better economically and socially than the general public believes it to be.

"But 'most' can be a deceptive term," the council pointed out. "It is vitally important to remember that many millions of older people are living at, or below the poverty line.

"Thus, when 15 percent of people over 65 say that 'not having enough money to live on' is a personal problem for them, that percentage translates to some three million needy people."

At its February meeting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council called on Congress to upgrade the nation's social security system through a gradual increase in payroll taxes and the use of general tax revenues to supplement the needs of the fund.

The Executive Council said that arguments against such improvements during the current economic difficulties are unsound.

"We will vigorously oppose the pending Administration proposal to cut back the Medicare program and to hold the scheduled cost-of-living increase to 5 percent," the AFL-CIO statement declared. "The victims of the Administration's economic mismanagement must not be forced to make additional sacrifices."

Court Awards Back Pay to City Strikers

San Francisco—The California Supreme Court has awarded millions of dollars in back pay to some 11,000 members of the Service Employees who struck the city in March 1974.

SEIU Vice President Tim Twomey, secretary-treasurer of Local 250, one of the four units involved in the nine-day strike, said that under the court ruling the city workers are now entitled to an average of $50 each a month for at least 10 months.

Victor Van Bourg, attorney for SEIU Locals 250, 400, 66A and 535, said the state Supreme Court decision strikes down taxpayers' actions against the city, known as the Bangs cases, to stop the raises.

The County Board of Supervisors had passed an order implementing the raises following a strike. The Superior Court in San Francisco issued a temporary restraining order against the board, and seven months later the city filed suit to pay the raises, thus joining the union's position.

"This is a landmark decision," Van Bourg said, "because it settles once and for all that public employers must live up to their agreements with unions even though those unions were engaged in a strike to secure benefits for their members."

Heavy opposition to implementing the raises came from the Chamber of Commerce and other business groups.

Job Protections Gained In Airlines' Route Swap

The Air Line Pilots hailed the government's amendment of the Pan American-Trans World Airline international route swap agreement to include labor protective provisions as a "big victory."

The amendment, approved by the Civil Aeronautics Board, marks the first time in 15 years and only the second time in the board's history that labor protective provisions have been applied to this type of air carrier agreement, ALPA President John J. O'Donnell noted. Normally they are reserved for airline mergers only, he observed.

CAB earlier this year approved the two carriers' agreement to eliminate duplicative services in their Pacific and transatlantic route systems to alleviate current financial problems in their international operations. The amendments will protect 312 TWA pilots and 78 Pan Am pilots affected by the route alignment, O'Donnell said.

Cost of the labor provisions could amount to about $4.7 million a year for TWA and about $1 million annually for Pan Am, O'Donnell pointed out.

The labor protective provisions extend benefits to affected personnel in three ways, O'Donnell noted:

- A furloughed pilot can receive 60 percent of his average monthly pay for a period of up to five years, depending on his length of service.
- A downgraded employe can receive a displacement allowance which represents the difference between what he will earn under the agreement and what he would have earned had the agreement not gone into effect. This special compensation would last for up to four years.
- A pilot required to move as a result of the agreement would receive travel and moving allowances and financial protection involving the sale of his home.

The CAB action is the result of ALPA's efforts to protect the airline personnel who will be impacted by the route swap. The union has long urged the board to treat major route realignment cases as it has handled mergers in the past.

"This action will serve as an important precedent since other carriers are engaging in similar route-current economic slump," O'Donswap negotiations to counter the nell said.

RUBBER WORKERS attending their union's five-day legislative institute in Washington, D.C., had a chance to meet with members of Congress and attend congressional hearings. Here, the speaker is Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio).

Backs $5 Billion Public Works Plan:

Meany Stresses Job Needs More Critical Than Deficit

Speaker Carl Albert as part of the Democratic leadership program.

Earlier, Steelworkers President I. W. Abel and President Robert Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. testified to the need for the legislation and its potential value to the nation.

Abel urged Congress to "cast aside once and for all the idea that government spending is wasteful" and spoke of the unmet public needs. Georgine told the panel that the real waste is in the workers, machinery and equipment idled by depression.

Meany sharply challenged the budget line that President Ford drew in a recent televised speech when he pointed to a projected budget deficit on a chart and said that point "is as far as we dare to go."

It was "a sad commentary on the priorities of this Administration," Meany said, that Ford wasn't pointing to an unemployment chart when he drew his line.

"America cannot stand double-digit unemployment. She cannot afford to waste the productive capacity of millions of workers," Meany insisted.

The cost of unemployment in poverty, suffering, crime, the stress on the nation's social fabric doesn't show up on Ford's budget chart, he noted. The President "should also be worried about what unemployment is doing to the people of America."

Meany emphasized that the federal deficit was caused by economic mismanagement and not by excessive federal spending.

Citing the Administration's own estimate as to the revenue drop and spending increase caused by joblessness, Meany suggested that "if unemployment were at the same level today that it was in 1969, when Richard Nixon and Arthur Burns started practicing economic black magic, then there would be a budget surplus right now."

Meany recalled that a $1 billion accelerated public works program enacted during the Kennedy Administration helped the nation recover from the 1960-61 recession and break a cycle of recurring recessions, each of which left a larger number of workers out of jobs when the economy had supposedly returned to normal.

The current economic crisis is worse than any of the recessions since World War II, Meany said, and the task of recovery is correspondingly larger.

The $5 billion proposed in the legislation would create 250,000 jobs—half on construction sites and half off the sites. But as the paychecks flowed into the economic stream, nearly as many additional jobs would be generated.

Further, Meany noted, "workers who have decent jobs aren't drawing unemployment compensation or welfare" and are also paying taxes to federal, state and local governments.

As to the contention that budget deficits spur inflation, Meany countered that when America's economic house is on fire, "let us put out the fire first, then mop up any excess water."

He said that even if the economic plunge were to bottom out in the next few months—which most economists don't expect to happen—the legislation would still be needed "to help get hundreds of thousands of American workers off the bottom."

Millions of unemployed and underemployed look to Congress for help, Meany declared. "They don't want a dole. They want to work."

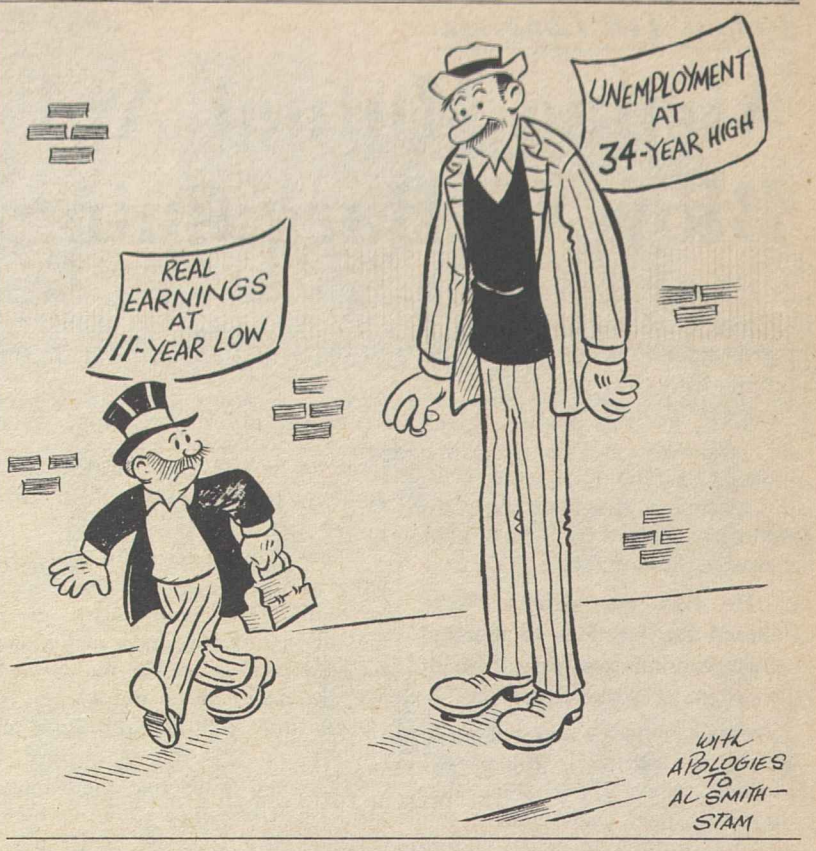
In response to a question, Meany said there is no such thing as an "acceptable" level of unemployment.

A jobless rate that might be acceptable to a person who has a job wouldn't be acceptable to someone still unemployed, he suggested.

As for Administration optimism that recovery will show up in the fourth quarter of the year, Meany noted that the Administration's economists are always seeing upturns in the fourth quarter—until it arrives. Then they start looking to the spring.

The Ford Administration's director of the Office of Management & Budget, James T. Lynn, had told the committee that the proposed legislation would take too long to help end the recession but would increase inflation.

Meany retorted that there is no reason why it should take more than 60 days to get projects under way and put people to work.



Worker Buying Power Drops to 11-Year Low

centage basis, the decline was four-tenths of 1 percent from February and 4.8 percent over the year.

The March drop in real spendable earnings reflected a drop of six-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours and a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index. The average number of hours worked dropped from 36.1 a week in February to 35.9 last month.

The shrinking workweek is a by-product of the slowdown in the nation's economy, which resulted in a record drop of 10.4 percent in real gross national product in the first three months of 1975 alone, according to the Commerce Dept.

With the March decline, real spendable earnings have dropped below their year-earlier level for 25 months in a row.

Prices overall rose at the seasonally adjusted rate of three-tenths of 1 percent last month, continuing the declining trend in the rate of increase that began last fall, BLS said.

The March increase was the smallest since July 1973 when wage-price controls were in effect. The CPI that month rose by two-tenths of 1 percent.

Food prices in March declined five-tenths of 1 percent while nonfood commodity prices rose six-tenths of 1 percent and service charges increased four-tenths of 1 percent.

At 157.8, the March consumer price index was still 10.3 percent higher than it was a year earlier. While prices over the month were lower for many foods—particularly beef, eggs and sugar—prices rose for many nonfood items, including automobiles, clothing, houses and medical care services, BLS said.

For the three months ended in March, the CPI rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.6 percent. Food prices over the quarter were up 1.4 percent; prices of nonfood commodities increased 8.3 percent over the same period, and the cost of services during the January-March period rose 8.2 percent.

Over the year, the food index rose 7.7 percent, the nonfood commodities index went up 11.4 percent, and the services index increased 11 percent.

While price declines were posted for a wide variety of grocery store foods in March, BLS noted they were partially offset by price rises for bakery products, non-alcoholic beverages and other products for which sugar is an important ingredient.

ULLICO Set New Records During 1974

New York—Union Labor Life Insurance Co., a union-owned firm, reported life insurance in force topped the $3 billion mark last year.

Citing 1974 year-end figures, ULLICO Board Chairman J. Albert Woll, disclosed that the insurance in force climbed from $2,919,390,000 at the close of 1973 to $3,070,006,000. This is about double the $1,507,483,000 recorded 10 years earlier, Woll noted.

Assets of the 48-year-old company also reached an all-time high of $184.6 million, an increase of 21.9 percent from 1973.

ULLICO paid out a record $194.3 million in benefits to policyholders and beneficiaries last year, bringing payments since 1927 to more than $2 billion, Woll pointed out.

Dividends to policyholders also increased 15 percent last year to a record $15.2 million. Woll said other records were set during 1974 in earnings, premium income and pension plan reserves.

ULLICO is principally owned by AFL-CIO affiliates, local unions, and state and city central bodies.

State-County Adds 4,100 In Two Units

Some 3,000 state workers in Iowa and 1,100 in Louisiana have chosen the State, County & Municipal Employees to represent them in negotiations with their employers.

Officials at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge granted voluntary recognition to AFSCME after the union had collected 750 authorization cards from maintenance, food service and custodial workers at the institution. The new bargaining unit has a membership of 1,100.

In Iowa, the 3,000-member State of Iowa Employees Association decided by a vote of more than 2 to 1 to affiliate with AFSCME. The group had been affiliated with the Assembly of Governmental Empolyees, a loose alliance of state employe associations.

Two other former AGE affiliates previously had negotiated affiliation agreements with AFSCME. They are the 22,000-member Hawaii Government Employees Association and the 8,000-member Rhode Island State Employees Association.

Nygren Retires from AFL-CIO Staff Post

Lawrence G. Nygren, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information Systems & Data Processing, retired Apr. 25 after more than 21 years with the federation and the AFL before merger.

Nygren started out as a Bricklayer's apprentice in the mid-1920s in Minneapolis before switching to the white-collar trades. He joined the Stenographers, Bookkeepers, Typers & Assistants in 1937 and served as a local business agent and financial secretary.

From 1945 to 1953, Nygren was a national vice president of the Office Employees International Union, a forerunner to the Office & Professional Employees.

Nygren joined the AFL national staff in 1953. He was head of the federation's tabulating department until the Information Systems & Data Processing was set up in 1973.

Unions Tell Congress:

Airline Mutual Aid Blow to Bargaining

The so-called "mutual aid pact" operated by the nation's major airlines is incompatible with collective bargaining, and should be legislated out of existence, the AFL-CIO and its airline industry unions told Congress.

MAP, as it is known, gives carriers an unfair advantage over its employes at the bargaining table, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller charged in testimony before a Senate Commerce subcommittee.

He said the airlines "have abused the freedom to marshal their economic resources through a system of strike assistance."

Sixteen of the 19 major domestic airlines are parties to the pact, in existence since 1958. Since then, they have paid each other a total of $360 million in strike support funds.

Under the agreement, a carrier-member is guaranteed 50 percent of its normal operating expenses for the first two weeks of a strike; 45 percent for the next week; 40 percent for the following week, and 35 percent during the remainder of the strike. The money is paid the struck carrier by other pact signatories.

Because a walkout reduces an airline's operating expenses, MAP guarantees the carrier a profit, Biemiller charged, adding:

"There can be little or no incentive on the part of a management to compromise and conclude a strike so long as the company is guaranteed a profit during that strike no matter how long the strike lasts and . . . so long as it is distinctly possible that this guaranteed profit may be even greater than the return to be anticipated from continued operations.

"Under these conditions," Biemiller noted, "the incentives are all the other way. A means is thereby provided of breaking the strike, and even the union."

Air Line Pilots President John J. O'Donnell termed the mutual aid pact "a concerted effort by the large carriers to gain absolute bargaining power over their employes."

"The fact that these carriers have not succeeded is irrelevant." he said. "The unnecessary grief and the agony that have accompanied the process are the real issues. We do not believe the Congress can permit such a procedure to endure."

O'Donnell noted that there have been 14 strikes since 1969 in which carriers have received MAP payments. ALPA pilots were affected by 13 of the strikes.

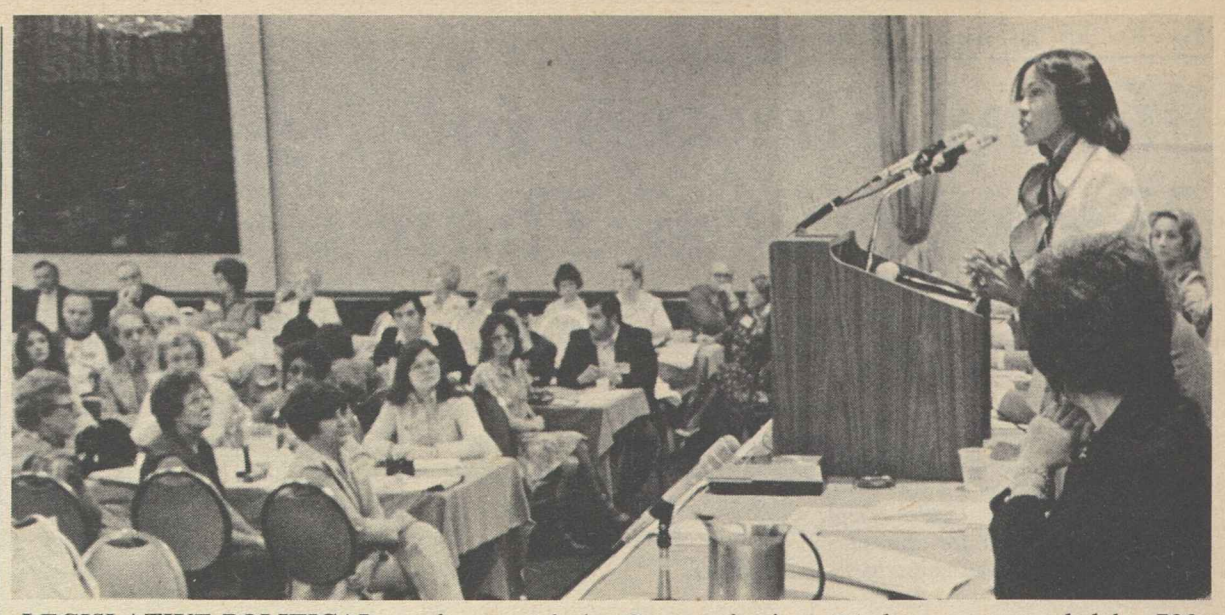
"We estimate that our pilots have lost approximately $65 million in wages by reason of these stoppages," O'Donnell said.

Beyond the damage to airline employes, the flying public also suffers because of the pact, the ALPA leader noted. Communities dependent on commercial air service have been left completely isolated. Ticket costs have risen, and flight safety has deteriorated, he said.

Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D-Minn.), who has introduced legislation in the House to outlaw the agreement, told the Senate panel MAP inflicts serious economic damage on local business enterprises as well as communities.

Communities that have suffered most severely from needlessly prolonged strikes are those served by only one airline, he noted.

Among others testifying in support of legislation to abolish MAP were Machinists Vice President John Peterpaul, Transport Workers Vice President William Lindner, and Allen McCauley, general chairman of the Northwest Orient Airlines System Board, of the Railway & Airline Clerks.



LEGISLATIVE-POLITICAL conference of the Communications Workers was attended by 700 delegates, the largest number in the program's history. Here they listen to Rep. Yvonne B. Burke (D-Calif.), one of many members of Congress who spoke to the group.

Anti-Union Bills Die In New Hampshire

Concord, N.H.—Two anti-labor measures were defeated in the New Hampshire legislature as trade unionists responded to a call by the State AFL-CIO to contact their representatives on the issues.

The first measure, calling for the repeal of the state's "Little Davis-Bacon Act," which requires payment of prevailing wages for public works employes, came out of committee with a recommendation for passage. But after a series of parliamentary moves, the House voted to postpone the bill indefinitely.

A week later, a "right-to-work" bill to outlaw union shop agreements met a similar fate.

Labor Asks Overhaul of Jobless Aid

times in the past five years."

Seidman told the panel that linking the availability of long-term benefits to large-scale and rising unemployment "just doesn't make sense." Many workers suffer long periods of joblessness even when the overall unemployment rate is comparatively low and the closing of a plant could leave a large group of workers in a community jobless for a long time.

He compared the present approach of providing extended benefits only during severe recessions to a hospitalization insurance plan that would provide an individual with up to 60 days of coverage, with an additional 30 days available "on the condition that a certain proportion of the population is also sick."

Jobless workers, he said, "can't wait for an epidemic of unemployment."

A U.S. Chamber of Commerce spokesman had suggested earlier that there should be a careful study of the entire unemployment insurance system, perhaps by a special commission.

Asked his reaction to the suggestion, Seidman said the AFL-CIO would "strongly oppose" a long-term study unless it were coupled with legislation that would meet present urgent needs.

Earlier, Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees, urged a permanent extension of coverage to all public workers. He said a majority of the 12 million state and local government employes are not eligible for jobless benefits under state laws.

Unemployment Tops 6% in 105 Key Areas

surveyed each month was the highest total in any one month since the present classification system was started in May 1955," the government said.

The total was 64 above a year earlier. The previous high was in April 1961 when 101 areas reported substantial joblessness.

The one-month increase of 31 new areas was also a record, the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration observed. The previous record increase was 25, posted in March 1961 when the classifications were made on a bimonthly basis.

The number of areas with jobless rates of 12 percent or more within the substantial unemployment category rose to 11 in March from 4 the previous month.

Areas with rates between 9 and 11.9 percent increased from 3 in March 1974 to 22 last month. The number of areas with rates between 6 and 8.9 percent rose from 37 to 72 over the same period.

"The worsening of the unemployment situation in most areas reflected primarily sizable employment losses in factory employment, mainly in the durable goods sector," the Labor Dept. noted.

"In the majority of areas, employment declines in construction and trade also contributed significantly to higher unemployment levels."

The 31 areas added to the substantial unemployment list in March are Hartford and Stamford, Conn.; Atlanta; Chicago; Evansville, Fort Wayne, Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Indianapolis, South Bend and Terre Haute, Ind.; Kansas City, Mo.; Omaha; Albany-Schenectady-Troy, Binghamton and Nassau-Suffolk, N.Y.; Asheville, Charlotte-Gastonia and Greensboro - Winston-Salem - High Point, N.C.; Akron, Canton and Dayton, Ohio; Allentown-Bethlehem-Easton, Erie, Johnstown, Pittsburgh and York, Pa.; Salt Lake City-Ogden, Utah, and Kenosha, Madison, Milwaukee and Racine, Wis.

A labor area consists of a central city or cities and the surrounding territory within commuting distance. Major labor areas usually have at least one central city with a population of 50,000 or more.

Besides major job centers, the department also lists other areas that meet the substantial unemployment criteria.

In March, the government added 12 more areas to the list of smaller labor areas with substantial unemployment, and deleted one. This brought the total of such areas to 310, compared to 299 in February. A year earlier, the total was 274.

Areas classified as having substantial unemployment become eligible for preferential treatment in bidding on federal contracts.

North Carolina Stalls Equal Rights Plank

Raleigh, N.C.—The Equal Rights Amendment is still four states short of the 38 ratifications needed to write it into the Constitution and the goal almost certainly won't be reached this year.

The North Carolina House voted 62-57 against ratification of the labor-endorsed amendment that would prohibit all legal inequalities based on sex.

North Dakota ratified the amendment in February—the only state to do so this year. Hopes for approval in Illinois and Missouri have dimmed and supporters are now looking to 1976 elections to state legislatures to achieve ratification the following year. The deadline for approval by 38 states is March 1979.

Stronger Pay Priority Sought in Bankruptcy

A long-overdue updating of the federal Bankruptcy Act is needed to protect workers when their employer's business fails, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. testified at Senate hearings.

IUD General Counsel Elliot Bredhoff noted that the ceiling on employe wage claims that have priority on the assets of a bankrupt firm was last adjusted in 1926. At that time it was set at $600 and limited to wages earned but not paid during the three months before the start of bankruptcy proceedings. The priority, furthermore, applied only to assets of the firm not held as security for other debts.

A bill before the Judiciary subcommittee would raise the wage claim ceiling to $1,200 and include a range of fringe benefits priced at up to $300.

Bredhoff said the legislation would be "a step in the right direction." But he urged the subcommittee to improve on the bill, especially since adjustments in the wage claim provisions come at long intervals.

There should be no dollar limit on claims on behalf of workers, Bredhoff said, and valid claims dating up to a year before the "substantial cessation of business" should be recognized.

The law should be clear, Bredhoff suggested, that the priority wage claim should include such factors as failure of an employer to keep up contributions to a health and welfare plan or to make other payments obligated by a collective bargaining agreement.

Bredhoff strongly urged that wage claims be treated in the same manner as secured claims. "Employes who invest their working careers in their companies should have no less protection under the law than one who invests capital on a secured basis," he said.

Bank Profits Still Rising Despite Economic Slump

Early reports on first-quarter profits show that while the economy was in its worst decline since the Great Depression the banking industry remained calm, cool—and collected.

Indeed, the nation's 25 major bank holding companies collected an astounding first-quarter average earnings gain of 28 percent, according to M. A. Shapiro & Co., Inc., a New York bank securities firm.

What's more, of the first 100 banks and bank holding companies to report their first-quarter profits, 77 listed higher income before securities transactions. The 77 banks showed an average increase of 24.4 percent.

Analysts observe that the banks have pursued a simple policy of keeping profits high by not cutting their interest rate charges as fast as their interest rate costs have fallen, thus creating a fatter spread.

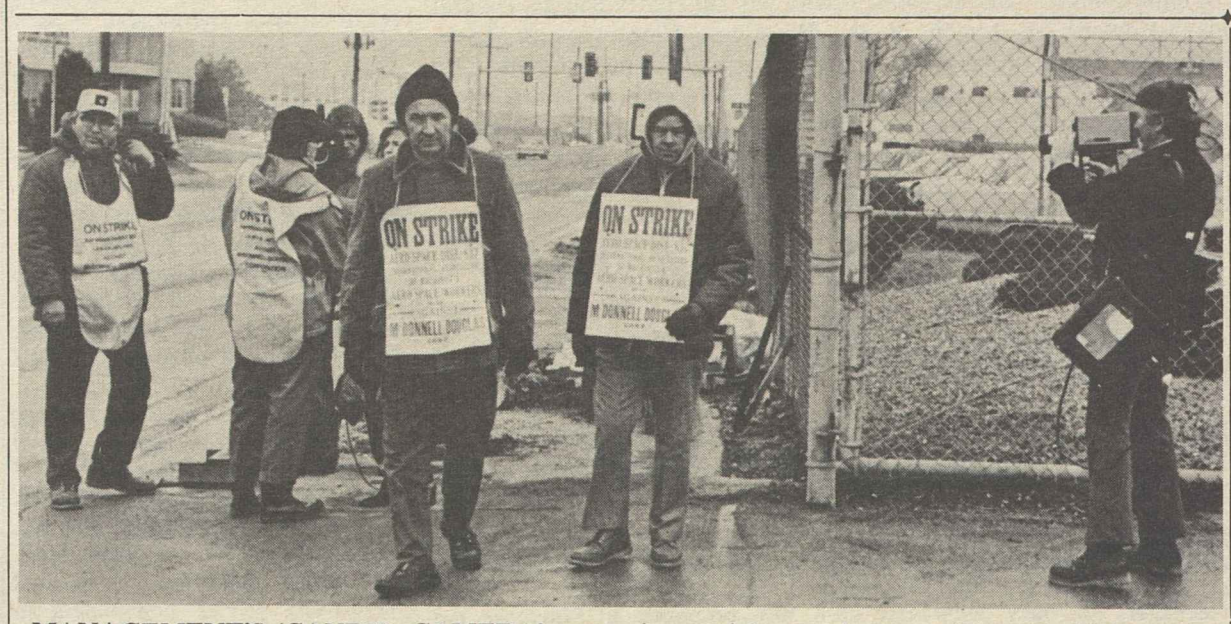
Budget Ceiling Undercuts Anti-Recession Programs



MANAGEMENT'S 'CANDID CAMERA' zooms in on pickets to harass striking Machinists at a McDonnell Douglas aerospace facility in St. Louis. The strike by 12,000 IAM members is now in its third month because of the company's refusal to make any meaningful proposals to settle the contract dispute, the union charged. IAM's contracts with the firm expired last October.

Job Funds, Housing Aid Threatened

A $6 billion emergency job-funding bill and an anti-recession package of housing legislation advanced closer to final passage despite Administration veto threats.

The bills passed both the House and Senate by margins greater than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto. They will be voted on again after House-Senate conference committees resolve some differences between the two versions.

President Ford sought unsuccessfully to persuade first the House and then the Senate to slash the $6 billion price tag of the Emergency Unemployment Appropriation bill.

The bill was put together by House leaders in early March with the intent of getting as many people to work as soon as possible by voting more funds for a vast array of existing programs. It included public service jobs, summer jobs for youth, an assortment of public works construction, conservation projects and purchase of vehicles with the aim of reviving the auto industry.

Ford's attempt to limit the extra funds to the $2 billion provided for public service and summer jobs was overwhelmingly rejected and the bill passed the House, 313-113.

The Senate changed the ingredients somewhat, adding additional funds for summer jobs for youth, cutting back on purchases of new vehicles but earmarking $700 million "to provide federal financial assistance to railroads for repairing, rehabilitating and improving rail rights-of-way and facilities." Before the rail money could be spent, however, Congress would have to pass enabling legislation.

In the Senate as in the House, attempts to cut back the amounts were beaten by one-sided votes and the bill was approved, 53-14.

The portion of the funds that would be spent during the 1976 fiscal year starting July 1 are included in the budget totals developed by both the House and Senate Budget Committees—which could become an important factor in a veto override battle.

On housing legislation, the Senate combined two House-passed measures into a single bill.

It then gave 64-26 approval to a bill including:

Message to Ford, Congress:

60,000 at IUD Rally Demand 'Jobs Now'

By John R. Oravec

Sixty thousand unemployed workers and trade unionists staged the largest jobs rally Washington has ever seen and, in the words of their leaders, served notice on Congress and the Administration that the nation's jobless "will not quietly or supinely accept unemployment as a way of life."

They came from dozens of eastern and midwestern states to call on their government for policies and programs that will restore a full employment economy.

They came in trains, cars and more than 1,000 buses to Robert F. Kennedy Stadium for the "We Want Jobs Now" rally sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The rally itself, Apr. 26, was preceded by a demonstration at the Capitol by thousands of trade unionists from New York and New Jersey, who then marched two miles to the stadium. Earlier in the day a contingent from the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers conveyed their jobs protest to the Ford Administration by marching outside the White House before joining the stadium gathering.

Before many of the marchers made it to the stadium, the gates were ordered closed when stadium officials declared the 53,000-seat facility filled to capacity. Thousands remained outside.

On the basis of the massive turnout, the IUD termed the rally a success even though the proceedings were disrupted when a number of demonstrators poured onto the field. The speakers were unable to be heard over the chanting demonstrators who crowded the platform.

When the on-field demonstrators swelled to about 1,500 it became impossible to continue the scheduled program.

But the message the rally participants brought for the Administration and the Congress was made clear, IUD President I. W. Abel and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Clayman declared.

In a letter to members of Congress and President Ford, Abel and Clayman warned that they must

Wage Gains Climb in '75 Settlements

Workers covered by major collective bargaining agreements negotiated first-year wage increases averaging 12.5 percent in settlements reached in the first quarter of 1975, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The 12.5 percent figure compares with a 10.3 percent increase during the previous quarter, 7.1 percent in the first quarter of 1974 and 9.8 percent for 1974 as a whole.

When averaged over the life of the contract, the settlements reached in the January to March period provide an annual gain of 7.7 percent. This compares with a 7.2 percent rise in fourth-quarter 1974 settlements, 6.1 percent in the same quarter a year earlier, and 7.3 percent for all of 1974.

The measures do not include possible gains under cost-of-living escalator clauses, BLS noted. The

Vote Limits Economic Stimulus

By David L. Perlman

Congress moved towards adoption of a budget ceiling that would rule out many of the programs the AFL-CIO considers necessary to get America back to work.

A key 64-29 vote in the Senate rejected a labor-sponsored amendment that would have added $9 billion to the spending level recommended by the Senate Budget Committee. The extra money would have been earmarked for job-creating programs.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the rejection "a vote against stimulating the economy and a vote for continued high unemployment."

While the budget ceiling is not binding on Congress this year, it is expected to be a strongly persuasive factor in congressional appropriations votes and in the ability of Congress to override a host of threatened presidential vetoes. Congress last year voted to establish its own budget machinery in an attempt to recapture control of spending from the White House. This involves setting a spending ceiling that in future years will be legally binding.

The budget ceiling this year will be somewhere between the $365 billion recommended by the Senate Budget Committee and the somewhat higher amount in a budget resolution that was being considered by the House as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The House Budget Committee proposed a $368.2 billion spending total.

Labor Stands Firm On Health Care Goal

New York—National health insurance will stay at the top of labor's legislative agenda until it is enacted, AFL-CIO President George Meany declared.

Meany urged a New York state coalition supporting the Health Security bill to hold firmly to the basic principle that all Americans —"as a matter of right"—should have access to the same high standard of health care.

The AFL-CIO doesn't want a bill that will just take care of union members, Meany said. And labor won't support a bill tailored to guarantee the insurance industry a profit, even if some argue it would be "politically smarter" to give the insurance lobby "a piece of the action."

Meany's address to a dinner sponsored by the New York State Committee for National Health Security was presented by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. The committee headed by Clothing Workers President Murray H. Finley, also honored Mary Lasker for her lifetime dedication to public health and support for the concepts embodied in the Health Security bill.

Other speakers included Leonard Woodcock, chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance and president of the Auto Workers, Gov. Hugh Carey and New York City Mayor Abraham Beame.

A subcommittee of the House Ways & Means Committee is scheduled to begin hearings on national health insurance this spring, and

Economy's Indicators Show Negative Trend

The government's composite index of leading economic indicators pointed downward again in March, the seventh decline in this key barometer in the past eight months.

The index, which is supposed to foreshadow trends in the economy, fell five-tenths of 1 percent in March after rising six-tenths of 1 percent the previous month, the Commerce Dept. said.

The March decline put the index at 154.5 percent of its 1967 base, or 14 percent below its peak of last July.

Five of the nine available indicators showed declines from February to March, while four registered increases. Moving unfavorably were new orders for durable goods, the average workweek, the price-labor cost ratio, building permits and the change in consumer installment debt.

The positive indicators were stock prices, industrial prices, initial unemployment insurance claims and contracts and orders for plant and equipment.

Meanwhile, more Americans applied for the first time for unemployment insurance benefits after being laid off from their jobs. The

Upgrading Least Desirable Jobs Held 'Major National Challenge'

Undesirable, low-level jobs—filled disproportionately by minority, female and young workers—need to be upgraded "as part of the general effort to improve society," the National Planning Association declared.

Aside from this broad moral mandate to raise the quality of low-level work, however, a growing shortage of workers willing to accept these substandard jobs adds to the urgency of the problem, NPA notes in a joint statement signed by 100 leaders of business, labor, agriculture and the professions.

As defined by NPA in its statement, "Upgrading Low-Level Employment: A Major National Challenge," low-level jobs are those that combine low pay, low skill, little challenge and no upward mobility. NPA estimates some 12 million jobs in the United States have these characteristics.

Reasons cited for the expected decline of Americans willing to take low-level jobs include rising expectations and opportunities for minorities, higher levels of education and training, reduced rural outmigration, demographic changes that will diminish the numbers of teenagers and new labor-force entrants in the 1980s, and increased income-support measures.

The statement points out that the normal forces of the market in the long run tend to correct imbalances between the supply and demand for low-level workers but adds the adjustment process can be assisted and speeded with timely and enlightened action by government, labor and management:

"By seeking ways to eliminate, upgrade or redesign low-level jobs, these institutions can smooth the path toward a society in which all workers have decent jobs with adequate wages."

The statement was developed by an ad hoc committee and endorsed by members of the NPA board and standing and special committees, including 20 labor leaders.

Projections of future labor supply and demand by the NPA suggest that for the lowest skilled jobs there will be a shortfall of low-skilled workers in the years ahead.

The dilemma posed, then, is a prospective mismatch of needed work and available workers in low-status jobs that will command the attention of both public and private policy makers in coming years.

The NPA proposes a number of specific policy actions to deal with the problem and comes down hard on two goals to be avoided.

First, it calls for a crackdown on illegal alien workers and those who employ them.

"The plea that certain jobs will go unfilled without illegal aliens willing to tolerate substandard conditions must be met by imaginative job upgrading or foregoing certain goods and services if that cannot be done," the statement asserts.

"Prohibiting employers from hiring illegal aliens is probably the only means of stemming the tide of illegal immigration or of getting proper attenton paid to upgrading the jobs."

A second strategy to be rejected, the NPA statement says, is the "backward-looking" idea of tailoring the educational system to fit the job market by discouraging extended schooling for those who do not need much formal education for certain low-level jobs.

The statement declares that any proposals to "increase the supply of 'dumb' workers for 'dumb' jobs" by restricting education are contrary to democratic principles and ignore the non-economic benefits of education.

Outlining its recommendations to upgrade low-level jobs, the NPA says that planners should encourage elimination of these jobs where possible through technological change, seek to improve continuing low-status jobs by restructuring them, and "try to insure that no segment of society is unfairly relegated to the undesirable work which remains."

Labor officials who signed the statement added a footnote, declaring:

"The more rapid unionization of workers now employed at low-level jobs holds the greatest promise of upgrading their status quickly. . . .

"To facilitate unionization of low-level employes, the National Labor Relations Act should be amended to provide full coverage of all workers, to expedite its procedures, and to provide effective penalties for unfair labor practices."

Union leaders endorsing the statement included Steelworkers President I. W. Abel; Rubber Workers President Peter Bommarito; Steelworkers Research Director Otis Brubaker; Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke; Frank Fernbach, assistant to Abel; Sander Genis, manager of the Clothing Workers Minnesota Joint Board; AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger; President Paul Jennings of the Eelectrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; President-emeritus Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers' & Cement Masons; Gerard P. O'Keefe, international director of the Retail Clerks; Rudolph Oswald, Service Employees' research director; Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik; Letter Carriers President James H. Rademacher; Painters President S. Frank Raftery; AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman; Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Operating Engineers Sec.-Treas. J. C. Turner; Operating Engineers President Hunter P. Wharton, and Machinists Vice President William W. Winpisinger.

Rail Accord Wins Approval Of Machinists

The Machinists overwhelmingly ratified a new agreement with the nation's major railroads, leaving only six unions with railway employes that have not settled with the industry in the current round of bargaining.

The IAM pact, reached in March, is similar to the agreements other rail unions have negotiated, and provides for boosts in wages and fringe benefits valued at about 41 percent over three years.

Meanwhile, the four shopcraft unions that make up the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept. continued their negotiations with the assistance of the National Mediation Board.

The unions currently are conducting a poll of their members to authorize a strike if a settlement is not reached. The voting is expected to be completed by May 16.

A presidential factfinding panel is investigating the dispute between the Railway & Airline Clerks and the carriers. The appointment of the emergency board in mid-April put off a strike BRAC had scheduled for Apr. 18.

The Yardmasters continued to negotiate minor differences that have proved obstacles to settlement. They sought the aid of the National Mediation Board.

Economic Indicators Resume Downturn

Labor Dept. reported 493,000 new claims were filed during the week ended Apr. 19.

Of this number, 456,600 were filed under regular state employment programs, a decrease of 39,700 from the previous week. Overall, 6,368,600 Americans drew jobless insurance benefits under one program or another in the week ended Apr. 12.

While down slightly from the previous week, the number of new claimants still was at an extraordinarily high level. Joblessness in the United States in March spread to 8 million workers, with the unemployment rate of 8.7 percent the highest in 34 years. The April jobless rate, due to be released on May 2, was expected to be even higher.

The deepening economic slump also was reflected by the volume of help-wanted newspaper advertisements and machine-tool orders in March.

The business-oriented Conference Board reported its help-wanted advertising index fell another 1.4 percent over the month to 70 percent of the 1967 average, and was 41 percent below last July's level. The index measures help-wanted advertising in 52 newspapers in nine regions of the U.S.

Machine-tool orders in March were up from the previous month but still remained sluggish, according to the National Machine Tool Builders' Association. Orders totaled $79.4 million, but were only about a quarter of the $321.1 million of a year earlier.

Adding to the woes of the depressed housing industry, the Housing & Urban Development Dept. announced an increase in the maximum allowable interest rate on home loans insured by the Federal Housing Administration or guaranteed by the Veterans Administration. The rate ceiling was boosted from 8 to 8.5 percent on Apr. 28. Builders had looked to lower interest rates to revive the industry.

In another report, the Labor Dept. noted a sharp plunge in manufacturing productivity in the first quarter of 1975. The decline in output per man-hour was 7.2 percent, and followed a 1 percent drop in the fourth quarter of last year.

The movement reflected a 31.4 percent decline in output and a 26.1 percent decline in man-hours, declines which "may be indicative of a drawing down of inventories, in which sales are not replaced by immediate new production of goods," the Labor Dept. said.

Ford Urged To Affirm U.S. Ties to Israel

President James T. Housewright of the Retail Clerks called upon President Ford to reaffirm the basic U.S. policy of uncompromising support for the continued independence of the State of Israel.

"When the President himself is questioning the steadfastness of U.S. resolve, it is no time to dilute one of our most principled and justifiable international commitments," Housewright said.

He continued: "Israel is a democratic government. Her people are totally committed to the defense of their country. U.S. assistance is well used and deeply appreciated, and no request for U.S. military intervention has been made. Under these circumstances, and in recognition and understanding of modern history and the United States' international role, our deep rooted commitment to provide Israel with the means to defend herself must be fulfilled.

"The pointed call for a reassessment of U.S. Middle Eastern policy should not be allowed to be interpreted as a weakening of our basic commitment," Housewright said.

ILO Conference Asks Public Worker Rights

Geneva—A 61-nation conference held by the International Labor Organization proclaimed that all categories of public service workers "should have the same civil and political rights as all other citizens."

The more than 300 government and trade union delegates who attended the 10-day session urged the ILO to draft a new international accord to insure that all public workers enjoy such rights.

"This is a real step forward because it is the first time that an international conference has recognized that public sector workers are entitled to the same political rights as those in the private sector," President Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers commented after the session.

Filbey represented American workers at the ILO technical conference on public service.

Filbey, a member of the board of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., said that the endorsement given the civil and political rights of public workers "should help" the campaign against the Hatch Act that denies U.S. government employes full participation in political life.

During the conference debate, Filbey urged that serious attention be given the question of public employes having the "ultimate weapon." The right to strike without fear of penalties is the "only real weapon that exists in collective bargaining," he said.

The majority of governments were not willing to recognize formally the right of public workers to strike. A compromise formula said that conciliation and arbitration arrangements should make it "unnecessary" for public workers to resort to strike action.

The conference's final recommendations on the proposed new standard to guarantee public service workers their trade union and civic rights are not as strong as Filbey would have liked.

"Nevertheless, it was a good meeting on the whole," he said. "To get an agreed text at such a conference there must be compromises."

The proposed standard, the conference said, should provide public servants adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. No public servant, it was recommended, should be fired or otherwise penalized for joining a union and participating in its activities.

60,000 Convey Message:

IUD Rally Airs Frustration, Anger of Jobless Workers

not misread the intention of those who vented their "anger and frustration" in a noisy display.

They noted that "99 percent or more of the vast audience was made up of decent and hard-working Americans, coming from virtually all basic industries in the country. They were completely representative, in every respect, of the nation's workforce."

"We read into the events of the rally on Saturday a warning to all of us—in and out of government," the IUD officials said, "that unemployed and underemployed workers will not quietly or supinely accept high unemployment as a way of life. We must not expect workers will react as passively as they did in the Great Depression," they stressed.

That point was brought out in Abel's opening address to the rally, which was delivered by Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke. Abel could not attend because of a death in his family.

"We are here in the great tradition of the American labor movement to voice our protest against the economic conditions that have caused so much hardship in our nation today," Abel stressed.

He said the rally was called "to insist that the government launch meaningful and constructive programs to alleviate this condition and to provide jobs for the unemployed."

The IUD objectives in calling the rally were embodied in a 10-point action program to end unemployment:

- Creation of jobs for everyone and passage of a Full Employment Act spelling out definite responsibilities for Congress and the President.
- A national public works program in urban and rural areas to overcome the extensive backlog of construction needs in homes, hospitals, schools and other public facilities.
- Revitalization of the mass transit system to ease the demand on highways and streets, in addition to reducing the nation's energy waste.
- Modernization of railroads to improve passenger and freight service.
- Genuine tax reform to achieve full equity in the tax structure and to boost revenues through the closing of loopholes for corporations and the wealthy.
- Development of 300,000 public service jobs through speedy congressional action on a multi-billion dollar labor-backed program.
- Reduction of interest rates to stimulate construction and consumer purchases.
- Curbing low-wage imports and regulating multinational corporations which export American jobs and technology.
- Adequate financing of public sector programs to create more jobs and improve services to the public.
- Decent treatment of unemployed workers by eliminating long delays on claims, improving jobless benefits and providing medical insurance coverage for the unemployed.

In his keynote address, Abel stressed that immediate government action is needed on labor's proposals. He said the message from the rally to the President, Congress and big business is simple: "We're fed up—fed up with delay, fed up with excuses, fed up with lack of vision and lack of initiative."

Except for a few minor scuffles when demonstrators first began to pour onto the field and an incident at one of the stadium gates after it was closed, there were no reports of violence or arrests.

subsidy for middle-income families buying moderately priced new homes. As in a bill the House had passed by a 259-106 vote in March, it would provide funds to lower the initial mortgage interest rate to 6 percent with the rate returning to market levels after six years of federal subsidy. The House bill had an alternative, closer to labor's position, of a subsidy to lower the rate to 7 percent for the full life of the mortgage. The Senate version instead had the option of a $1,000 government grant as part of a down payment.

- A new program of government loans to prevent unemployed persons from losing their homes because of mortgage foreclosures. The House version, passed 321-21, would authorize loans of up to $250 a month for a maximum of two years. The Senate bill would set the ceiling at $300 a month for up to three years. In both cases, the money would have to be repaid to the government.

In another area, the House voted 335-59 approval of a labor-endorsed bill to expand the school lunch program by adding an additional 5 million youngsters to the 10 million children from low-income families now receiving free or reduced cost meals.

The $3 billion price tag is almost twice the amount President Ford had requested in his budget. The House, however, voted down an amendment that would have raised the subsidy the government gives to the lunch program for all schoolchildren, without an income test.

A legal snarl that has tied up 130 highway construction projects in New York, Connecticut and Vermont would be untangled by a House-passed bill modifying a law that requires the federal government to prepare detailed environmental "impact" reports for highway projects. The projects involved would employ about 150,000 workers.

In another area, the House Commerce Committee brought its version of a health insurance for the unemployed bill somewhat closer to the version drafted by the House Ways & Means Committee. Instead of funding the program from general revenues, as the AFL-CIO had urged, it would impose a tax on health insurance premiums to pay for health insurance coverage of persons receiving unemployment compensation.

Action on Jobs Spurred By Louisiana Delegates

Baton Rouge, La.—Massive federal efforts are needed to create jobs, the Louisiana AFL-CIO declared in calling on Congress to take immediate action in getting the unemployed back to work.

The 2,600 delegates to the state federation's 20th annual convention also urged Congress to implement the unanimous recommendations of the Labor-Management Advisory Committee to the President to stimulate the nation's faltering economy through added puchasing power.

This action, along with steps by the President and Congress to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition, is vital in reversing the nation's and Louisiana's climbing unemployment rate, the delegates stressed.

They voiced their feelings also through their response to addresses by several Democratic senators who accused the Nixon and Ford Administrations of mismanaging the nation's economy.

Among the Democratic senators and congressmen addressing the convention were Birch Bayh of Indiana, Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, John Glenn of Ohio, Henry M. Jackson of Washington, Morris K. Udall of Arizona, Andrew Young of Georgia and Gillis W. Long of Louisiana.

They attributed the nation's excessive unemployment, tight money, high prices and the deepest recession since the 1930s to the economic and monetary policies of Ford and Nixon.

Focusing on issues affecting Louisiana workers, the convention called on the state legislature to increase workmen's compensation benefits to at least two-thirds of lost wages. The convention noted that the current maximum payment of $65 a week is far below the poverty level of $82.69 for a family of four in the state.

The legislature also was urged to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment.

Delegates re-elected state federation President Victor Bussie to his 20th term. Other top officers re-elected were First Vice President A. P. Stoddard and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Sr.

In all, 30 resolutions were adopted at the four-day convention, covering such issues as labor's political action programs, full union rights for postal workers, easier obtainability of food stamps, comprehensive day care programs for children of workers, and passage of National Health Security legislation.

A Health Consumers' Bill

WE BELIEVE that fundamental changes must be made in the way that this nation provides health care for all of its citizens.

As taxpayers, we know that separate programs for the poor and the elderly are costly, inefficient and ineffective.

As human beings, we know the deep hurt a person feels when he or she is forced to declare, "I am a pauper; I can't help myself"—before being able to receive help.

We know the terrible and increasing cost of medical care—to our members' family budgets and to our employers' insurance premiums. We know that our members' insurance covers them while they are sick but does nothing to keep them well. And that it vanishes when the layoff slips are handed out.

We aren't convinced that the bureaucracy of the private insurance companies is more efficient than the public bureaucracy. We have seen the waste and inefficiency that resulted from having insurance companies administer Medicare. We know the problems HEW has had keeping insurance companies from padding their Medicare bills with football tickets, monogramed golf balls, private airplanes, country club memberships, fishing trips, and much, much more.

And we are positive that public administration is far more accountable to the people than private administration.

Every national health insurance proposal before the Congress—except National Health Security—begins with the premise that American citizens should be treated differently, depending on their income, their age, their type of work.

We used to call that discrimination.

But this is different, we are told, because someone has to cull out the "chiselers"—that faceless army of people just itching for the chance to rip off Uncle Sam.

And to keep those "chiselers" from getting the health care which is their right, the government would keep extensive records on every American.

Under Health Security, there can be no "chiselers." Every American would receive the same comprehensive benefits, with no deductibles and no co-insurance. There would be no income tests, no work tests—and no reason to keep a dossier on every American.

HEALTH SECURITY is socially right. It would take the economics of the marketplace—profit—out of health care. It would provide a single standard of health care for all Americans as a matter of right.

And Health Security is also economically right. It has strong cost and quality controls, that would get a handle on the endless spiral of medical costs and treatments. It would cost no more than what America now spends on health care.

The American people have a lot at stake in the continuing debate over national health insurance. Their interests must come first—after all they are the health consumers.

And Health Security is the health consumers' bill. Our job, then, is to make sure that the consumer's voice is heard—loud and clear—in Washington. Because you can rest assured that organized medicine and the insurance industry have a well-financed, powerful lobby to protect their interests.

We must work as if it is a matter of life and death. Because that is what the fight for health is all about.

Wrong Fire

A Word Edgewise:

New Book Undermines Cliches Of Left and Right About Crime

By John P. Roche

IN 1972 A THOROUGHLY disarrayed Supreme Court (there were nine opinions) almost held the death penalty unconstitutional as a violation of the 6th Amendment's injunction against cruel and unusual punishments. The law that emerged from this shambles seemed to indicate that execution was unconstitutional if the judge or jury were given any leeway; that is, if the judge could choose between death or life imprisonment or the jury recommend mercy. If fulfilled—and a number of states have passed laws attempting to do so—this strange requirement would appear to make for a harsher criminal code. Now there is another case, testing the validity of these new statutes, and perhaps the court will manage to mobilize five justices behind one solid holding.

In the meantime, those concerned with problems of crime and punishment should get a copy of Harvard Prof. James Q. Wilson's new book, "Thinking About Crime" (Basic Books). Wilson, who states frankly that he is not a prophet with answers, proceeds with merciless logic to undermine most of the conventional wisdom (of both the right and the left) on just about every law-and-order issue.

On one hand, he assaults hip and thigh the liberal slogan that the way to end crime is to eliminate poverty (most poor people, black or white, never become criminals). On the other, he makes mincemeat out of the cliches from the right that we need more cops and public hangings (statistics indicate that there were trivial differences in the homicide rate between states with and without the death penalty).

For years I have been suspicious of the notion that the criminal code does not deter people from engaging in crime. The statistics that are usually trotted out indicate that 80-plus percent of all homicides occur among family and friends. For instance, a husband gets furious at his wife for telling him on their return from a party that he was a drunken boor and grabs a kitchen knife. Certainly, the argument runs, this sort of reaction would not be deterred by the death penalty (or anything else).

But what about the missing precincts? What about the husbands who under this uxorial blast meditated on the kitchen knife but didn't grab it? Is there anybody so inhuman (or saintly) that he or she on some occasion has not wanted to kill somebody? In other words, how can we know whether or not deterrence works when our whole sample is composed of those who were not held back?

Moreover, Wilson adds it is almost impossible to make any valid generalizations on this subject because of the chaos which exists in our court system. The courts, he emphasizes, are not really engaged in separating the innocent from the guilty (the overwhelming percentage of those arraigned plead guilty), but in trying to determine the proper sentence. Since there is no pattern—a three-time loser may get probation; a first offender three years—the potential criminal has no basis for calculating the risks involved in, say, burglary. Beyond this, nobody has figured out whether prisons are designed to punish or to rehabilitate.

I confess that the aspect of Wilson's analysis which appeals to me is that—unlike most of the academic experts on crime—he worries about the victims. A couple of years ago I listened to a psychiatrist expand at great length on the tragic background of a local murderer. Finally I had to ask, "But what about the future of the girl he murdered?" To understand is to understand, not to forgive, and I have always wondered if that psychiatrist would have been primarily concerned with the broken family of a guy sticking a knife in his ribs.

Thus Wilson makes the perfectly common-sense point about prisons: they may not deter, they may not rehabilitate, but they do serve to keep a number of extremely anti-social types out of circulation. A felon in Walpole (the Massachusetts prison distinguished by the rate at which the inmates impose the death penalty on each other) may blow himself up making a bomb, but he doesn't take any innocent bystanders with him.

This column can only touch on the many striking points Wilson highlights—his cold-eyed examination of the myths about heroin alone is worth the price of admission. Reading it is a bracing intellectual exercise.

Callous Step Backward:

Child Labor Move Resurrects Myths to Aid Greedy Growers

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

THE PAPERS ARE FULL OF almost unbelievably sad news from Southeast Asia. Indeed the volume—graphically illustrated with heart rending photographs of homeless refugees—is so great that the human imagination, no matter how sensitive, can hardly begin to cope with it. It tends to leave us feeling numb and helpless. In fact, soon we may unconsciously begin to ignore bad news from Cambodia and Vietnam or the Middle East on the grounds that there isn't anything we can do about it.

The same thing can happen, perhaps to a lesser extent, when we are bombarded with bad news about conditions at home. We can absorb only so many stories about economic injustice or the impact of the recession. We may be tempted to turn the page or switch the television dial to tranquilize our nerves—or salve our consciences.

Perhaps this helps explain why there has been little public reaction to a widely publicized congressional subcommittee vote recently which, if uncontested, will make it legal for children, ages five to 12, to do field harvest work by hand in areas authorized by the Secretary of Labor, as long as they work outside of school hours.

When I read about this vote, I could hardly believe my eyes. It represents an incredibly callous atempt on the part of presumably well meaning legislators to undo whatever little progress we have made—and made belatedly—in restricting use of child labor in agriculture. Such child labor was to have been prohibited by the 1974 Fair Labor Standards Act. But an Oregon strawberry grower won a temporary court injunction that permitted children under 12 to continue to work in the fields during most of last summer's harvest season. In September, however, the U.S. District Court denied a permanent injunction, whereupon the agricultural industry in Oregon launched a massive campaign to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act in their own favor.

Unless the action by the House Migrant Labor subcommittee is reversed thousands of children will work in Oregon fields this summer—at substandard wages and to the detriment of their own health and safety.

[The full House Labor Committee later killed the bill by a vote of 21 to 11. Story, page 8.]

It is ironic that most of the pressure in support of this retrogressive vote by the House Migrant Labor subcommittee should have come from the otherwise liberal state of Oregon and doubly ironic that Oregon's governor and its two U.S. senators should have succumbed to the pressure of the growers. Former Gov. Tom McCall and Senators Robert Packwood and Mark Hatfield enjoy a reasonably good reputation as progressive legislators in the field of socioeconomic reform. On this issue, however, they actively lobbied in favor of permitting even pre-school children, five years old, to work side-by-side with adult workers. Their stated reasons are, in my opinion, rather disingenuous. It is bad enough to lobby—under pressure of child labor; but it's even worse to pretend that this is being done for noble and magnanimous reasons.

What is one to think when he hears Sen. Packwood rationalizing the case for child labor as follows: "If a mother chose to go to the fields, leaving her child at home with a full-time baby sitter, she would by rule of Congress . . . be obliged to pay the baby sitter the minimum wage of $2 an hour. She would, therefore, make little, if any, profit for her day's effort in the field."

That's a plausible but completely fallacious argument. It doesn't mean—as the casual or careless newspaper reader might easily conclude—that five-year-old children should be allowed to accompany their mothers to the field because it would be too expensive for the family to hire a baby sitter at home. It means that five-year-old children should be permitted to work in the fields for substandard wages—to the benefit of the growers who hire them.

The growers, in other words, are not thinking primarily of the economic welfare of the working mother who cannot afford a baby sitter and is therefore required to bring her pre-school children with her to the fields. The growers are thinking primarily of their own economic interest. I say this on the authority of former Gov. McCall and Senators Packwood and Hatfield, all three of whom have stated for the record that they are supporting the use of child labor to accommodate the alleged needs of their grower constituents.

Former Gov. McCall and the two senators—if I have understood them correctly—seem to be arguing that if the child labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act are not drastically amended, Oregon growers will suffer severe financial losses and might even find it necessary to plow under their crops for lack of an adequate labor force.

I can understand why the growers, in their own interest, might fall back, in desperation, on this line of reasoning, but I am disappointed that their top elected representatives at the state and federal level feel constrained, for political reasons, to run interference for them in the Congress. I would have expected these distinguished public servants —even at the risk of losing votes among the growers—to stand up and fight for drastic reforms in Oregon's agricultural labor system.

Loophole For Runaway Ships:

Revival of U.S. Merchant Fleet Tied to Repeal of Tax Credits

REPEAL OF THE FOREIGN TAX credit is a key step in the drive to restore the U.S. merchant fleet as a major factor in world commerce and a reliable supply line in times of crisis or emergency, President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers declared.

Charging that the loophole has been a major factor in the growth of runaway-flag shipping, Calhoon said that without the lure of special tax breaks, much of the U.S. cargoes now moving in runaway or foreign-flag ships would return to American-flag vessels—"ships built in the United States by American labor and manned by American crews."

He said that repeal of the foreign tax credit is one of MEBA's major legislative goals in the current Congress.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Calhoon said that President Ford's veto of the Energy Transportation Security Act shaped by the last Congress triggered cancellation of many ship-building contracts, and that unemployment among maritime workers, now at 22 percent, is expected to hit 40 to 50 percent by the end of 1975.

Calhoon said MEBA is now preparing an updated study of the energy industry, focusing on oil and gas pipelines that are jointly owned by some of the larger U.S. oil companies.

Over the last 10 years, he said, the pipeline owners got a return of 53 percent a year on their equity investment while they controlled the flow of products and rates.

He renewed the call to split the oil industry into four parts, each free from control by the other. He said there should be separate corporations for production and exploration, for transportation, for refining and for marketing. He stressed that without interlocks among these four areas, the oil companies "could not hold absolute monopoly control on the nation's energy sources of this country."

Calhoon was questioned by Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

IF THE FORD ADMINISTRATION and Congress ignore the "ravages" of intolerably high unemployment, or if they act inadequately, their failure will result in a "tremendous cost to our social fabric."

The stern warning comes from the National Commission for Manpower Policy in describing the specter of unemployment as a part of an interim report it has submitted to Congress.

The NCMP was created by Congress in the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act of 1973 to identify the nation's manpower goals, to keep tabs on existing manpower programs and goals, and advise Congress on ways to strengthen them.

President Nixon, perhaps partly because of his Watergate problems and partly because of his disinterest in the commission, never got around to appointing members. On Sept. 30, President Ford named the 11 public members, including President John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, to serve with heads of six federal agencies under the chairmanship of Professor Eli Ginzberg of Columbia University.

The commission has met several times since then, submitted an interim report and generally has demonstrated that it is trying to make up for lost time.

The commission emphasizes that an 8 percent annual average unemployment rate (and it now is running considerably more than that) means that as many as 20 million persons are likely to be unemployed at some time during the year and as many as 4.5 million will be jobless for six months or more.

Further, unemployment "involves more than the loss of earned income." It frequently results in the loss of valuable fringe benefits including medical insurance and pensions and mortgage payments. Even beyond that, the report stresses, joblessness can and does lead to "severe loss of self-esteem, family disorganization, and disturbed or criminal behavior."

The commission also urges governmental leaders to realize that when the decade of the '70s began—well before the recession set in—America was faced with some specific manpower problems that were never resolved and have since worsened.

These forerunner problems include an extremely high rate of unemployment among teenagers and minority groups, chronic underemployment in inner cities, forced retirement of people who couldn't afford it, a steady increase in welfare rolls and the inability of veterans of military service to find jobs.

THERE IS A further warning in the report that even with a revival of the economy, millions of jobless may never get their jobs back because older plants may not reopen and employers will have developed new technologies that permit efficiency with far fewer employes.

The automotive industry is cited as a sector of the economy in which older plants and the facilities that supply them may permanently close, leaving Midwest automotive areas with painful adjustment problems such as those that confronted New England when its textile plants moved to the South after World War I.

It is looking into such devices as the feasibility of a quasi-government corporation to stimulate creation of job opportunities; subsidies to employers for hiring the jobless; a requirement that employers put aside a portion of profits in good times to be released to expand jobs as they are needed; and the use of credit, low interest rates and other incentives to revitalize sagging areas of the economy.

But the urgent need—the thread running through the entire report—is that the federal government should get cracking on legislation to create jobs now. "The commission is deeply sympathetic to the view of those who favor a much enlarged government program to put the unemployed back to work," the report concludes.

ENDING SPECIAL TAX BREAKS for runaway-flag ships would be a big step toward restoring the U.S. merchant fleet as a major factor in world commerce, Marine Engineers President Jesse M. Calhoon, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Rollcall on Funds for Education

The House increased aid to educational funds on Apr. 16 when it approved an amendment to an appropriations bill that added $487 million for needed programs. The vote was 259-143.

On labor's scorecard, the 223 Democrats and 36 Republicans who voted for this amendment by Rep. Edward Roybal (D-Calif.) were right (R). Voting wrong (W) were 97 Republicans and 46 Democrats.

Job Programs Undercut:

Senate Vote Limits Economic Stimulus

ported amendment, the Senate approved its Budget Committee's resolution by a 69-22 vote. Although its spending ceiling was higher than the Administration wanted, the AFL-CIO had termed the slow pace set for economic recovery "totally unacceptable." The spending ceiling was keyed to a projected 7.5 percent unemployment rate by December 1976—20 months from now.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the amendment raising the budget ceiling that was sponsored by Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), and Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.). It included a commitment to recover $2.5 billion through tax reform. And an estimated $3 billion additional would have been quickly returned to the federal treasury through taxes paid by persons given jobs and by the savings in unemployment compensation that otherwise would be paid them.

A letter to all senators by AFL-CIO President George Meany termed the $9 billion rise in the spending ceiling "of critical importance if the economy is to be turned around." Labor's only concern, Meany said, is that the amendment doesn't go far enough.

On the showdown, a number of senators who normally speak out for progressive programs backed away from raising the spending ceiling.

President Ford continued to warn of disaster ahead if Congress exceeded his projected budget deficit of $60 billion—a figure that has already been discarded by all but hard-core conservative ideologues as unrealistically low if a dent is to be made in depression-level unemployment. Thus, supporting a Budget Committee recommendation for a projected deficit about $7 billion higher appeared a politically safer "middle ground" to some senators than voting for still higher spending.

Mondale, a member of the Budget Committee, argued in vain that unemployment was the cause of mind-boggling budget deficits and that reduction in unemployment through spending stimulus was the solution.

In a partial dissent to the Budget Committee recommendations, he and Sen. James Abourezk (D-S.D.) had put it this way:

"Each 1 percent of unemployment costs the federal government roughly $16 billion in reduced taxes and increased spending for unemployment compensation and related programs. Each 1 percent costs state and local governments in the neighborhood of $5 billion. And each 1 percent costs our economy a million man-years and over $48 billion in lost production."

On every vote, the Senate backed its Budget Committee, which is headed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) but overall is somewhat more conservative than the Senate as a whole. It beat back attempts to lower the spending ceiling by margins as great as it defeated the labor-supported effort to raise the ceiling.

The budget resolution before the House carried a spending total $3.2 billion above the Senate figure for the fiscal year starting July 1.

In terms of deficit estimates—a guess in any event since revenues depend on the condition of the economy—there are some different assumptions that rule out a direct comparison between the two resolutions.

Congressional action to establish a budget ceiling this year started off as a dry run, to test whether the complex procedures established in last year's budget reform law are likely to work when fully effective next year. The full impact of the law calls for a preliminary budget target which would be revised later in the year into a final set of legally binding figures.

The intent was to enhance the role of Congress as a co-equal branch of government and lessen reliance on the Administration in setting the levels and priorities of government spending.

With the economic collapse and the fierce clash of opinions as to the course to be followed for economic recovery, the budget controversy has become much more akin to a shooting war than to a dry run.

Wage Gains Improve In 1975 Settlements

data stem from 104 agreements in the nonfarm sector of the economy, each of which covered 1,000 workers or more.

Some 556,000 workers were covered by these first-quarter settlements, primarily in the railroad, petroleum and wholesale and retail trade industries, BLS said.

The size of settlements appears to have been influenced by the possibility of additional increases under escalator clauses," BLS noted.

Contracts containing escalator provisions, covering 62 percent of the workers under major settlements concluded during the quarter, provided for annual wage-rate adjustments of 6.9 percent over the life of the contract.

"Contracts without escalator clauses provided for annual adjustments averaging 8.8 percent. These compare with gains of 6.1 and 9.1 percent, respectively, in 1974."

During the first quarter, BLS said, new escalator provisions were introduced in 18 settlements covering 287,000 workers primarily in the railroad industry. Escalator clauses now cover about 54 percent, or 5.6 million, of all workers in major bargaining units.

Other highlights:

- Workers covered by key contracts—that is, pacts covering 5,000 workers or more—averaged 13 percent increases in the first year of the agreement and 7.5 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 10.7 and 7.8 percent, respectively, in 1974.
- The length of contracts concluded in the first three months of 1975 averaged 31.5 months. "Frontloading" of settlements occurred regardless of contract duration, BLS noted. First-year wage adjustments were substantially greater than those deferred to subsequent years of multi-year agreements.
- In the manufacturing sector, an estimated 167,000 workers received an average first-year increase of 11.6 percent, compared with 8.7 percent in 1974 as a whole. The life-of-contract gain in manufacturing rose to 8.5 percent a year from 6.1 percent last year.
- In non-manufacturing, first-year wage gains rose 12.9 percent from 10.5 percent for all of 1974. Over the life of the contract, gains were 7.3 percent annually, compared to 8 percent in 1974.

First-quarter data related to only 34,500 workers in eight settlements in the construction industry, BLS noted, since bargaining in the industry is heavily concentrated in the spring. Thus, wage adjustments in these settlements averaged only 4.5 percent in the first year and 4.1 percent annually over the life of the contract, compared with 11 and 9.6 percent, respectively, in 1974.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Job-Creating Funds

The Senate on Apr. 30 voted 64-29 against an amendment to a budget resolution that would have added $9 billion for needed job-creating programs.

Labor supported the position of the 22 Democrats and seven Republicans who voted for the amendment. Voting against the job funds were 36 Democrats and 28 Republicans.

Meany Cites Health Care As Key Goal

Meany expressed the hope that the House "can complete action on a good national health insurance bill in this session."

That would pave the way for Senate action the following year, Meany said, adding:

"If President Ford still wants to veto it, then we are prepared to take our case to the people. And we'll let the people decide: a national health insurance bill that treats all Americans as human beings or a bill to benefit the insurance companies, hospitals and doctors."

Meany expressed satisfaction that a "new wave of doctors concerned about quality and care" is supporting the campaign for legislation. And he noted that even the American Medical Association has moved somewhat from its earlier opposition to any form of national health insurance.

When the debate started, he said, "the AMA wasn't even in the same century. At least now, they are up to the 1950s."

Meany took note of the soaring cost of malpractice insurance for doctors which "winds up in every medical bill" and "is a national problem that needs a national solution."

The AFL-CIO is studying the problem, Meany said. "There has to be a way to protect both doctor and patient, to process legitimate claims, to reject the frivolous and also reduce the cost."

On the immediate legislative agenda, Meany said, there is an urgent need "to provide health care for the millions of unemployed workers who lost their insurance coverage when they lost their jobs and are ineligible for Medicaid."

Finley termed the gathering part of a nationwide grass-roots movement in support of the Kennedy-Corman Health Security bill.

Woodcock stressed the labor movement's unity in support of Health Security legislation, along with "a growing alliance of decent Americans from all fields."

Gov. Carey said of the health care campaign that "our government has no greater responsibility and our people no greater need." And Mayor Beame joined the endorsement of the bill after having issued an official proclamation declaring Apr. 30, the date of the gathering, as National Health Security Day.

Montana Law Sets Maternity Leave as Right

Helena, Mont. — A labor-supported bill entitling public and private employes to maternity leave with continuation of health benefits and the right to reinstatement has been signed into law by Gov. Thomas L. Judge.

The new law provides that pregnancy will be treated as any other disability, with hospitalization and medical benefits continuing until patient and doctor agree on a date for return to work.

Opposing passage of the bill were the telephone company and other large corporations with significant numbers of female employes.

The Communications Workers and the State, County & Municipal Employees joined the Montana State AFL-CIO in actively working for the bill's passage.

University Study Shows:

Job Health Hazards High in Small Firms

A pilot study into the job health hazards in small businesses focusing on selected areas of Oregon and Washington shows that one of every four workers is probably suffering from occupational disease and that almost 90 percent of the affected workers are unaware of their illness.

The findings are the results of a study conducted by the University of Washington under contract for the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health.

Key elements of the study were disclosed by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), who termed the results "shocking—revealing a possible horror story of national proportions."

NIOSH, which is preparing a report on the study for a mid-May publishing date, said that although the fiindings may have wide ramifications, its analysts note that the health hazards may not be applicable to all sectors of small business.

But Daniels, who played a key role in drafting the Occupational Safety & Health Act, said that the study only "touches the tip of the iceberg."

"If we had statistics from an in-depth medical survey of the nation's workers, they would truly paint a picture of disease and chronic illness as horrifying as conditions in the sweatshops of the last century."

The University of Washington study covered small businesses employing from eight to 150 workers, zeroing in on the industrial areas of Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., and Portland, Ore., and the agricultural area of Yakima County, Wash.

The published results of the pilot study tend to refute the arguments of conservative members of Congress and employer organizations seeking exclusion of smaller workplaces from coverage of the federal job safety and health law.

In every session of Congress since the 1970 law was enacted, there have been attempts to void enforcement of safety and health standards for small businesses.

Daniels noted that the pilot study, which was conducted from July 1972 through August 1974, was limited to physical examinations and laboratory work.

"Cancer and neurological diseases, for example, were not thoroughly investigated," he said. "The survey, then, understates the actual conditions that would be determined through a comprehensive investigation of worker health."

Daniels outlined some of these major findings:

- Probable occupational disease among 28.4 of every 100 workers covered in the study, indicating that if this 1 to 4 ratio is applied to the nation's total workforce 21 million persons would have an occupationally related illness.
- 89 percent of the workers with probable occupational disease were found only through the pilot study. They were not listed on workmen's compensation claims or reported on logs employers are required to maintain under OSHA regulations.

Other key points brought out in the findings show that employers provide few health services and little environmental and biological monitoring; large numbers of workers are unaware of their exposure to hazardous substances; 42 percent of job-related injuries were found only through medical questionnaires, indicating that injuries as well as disease are underreported; employers' injury-disease logs were not available in more than one-third of the establishments surveyed, although compensation claims were found for such incidents for about half of those workplaces.

Citing the 1-to-4 ratio extrapolated from the University of Washington study, Daniels suggested that the government's estimate that 100,000 workers annually die from occupational disease is too low.

He concluded that it would not be surprising to find that one of every four deaths among adult workers stems from an occupational disease.

House Panel Kills Bill To Lift Child Labor Ban

A bill that would have allowed commercial farms to hire children under the age of 12 to harvest crops by hand was killed by the full House Education & Labor Committee after a strong condemnation by the AFL-CIO.

The decisive 21-11 vote against the bill came just a week after a subcommittee had given the measure a surprising 5-1 endorsement. It would have repealed a child labor restriction that was added just last year to the Fair Labor Standards Act. Commercial strawberry growers in the Pacific Northwest put on a strong push for the bill, which was sponsored by Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.).

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller denounced the employment of young children as a threat to their health, a form of economic exploitation and a means of holding down the wages of older workers.

In letters sent to all committee members, Biemiller termed the ban on employment of children under 12 on farms "reasonable and fair" and said there appeared to be no shortage of older workers available.

The bill was also opposed by the Labor Dept., which said there was no shortage of older teenagers to work on the farms and warned that dropping the restriction would lead to pressures to employ young children in other parts of the nation.

Voting to kill the bill were 17 Democrats and four Republicans. Supporting it were seven Republicans and four Democrats.

PROPOSED REGULATIONS affecting unions under provisions of the new pension reform legislation are discussed by representatives of AFL-CIO affiliates and Labor Dept. officials. The question-answer session, sponsored by the federation's Dept. of Social Security, focused on rules governing union death, sickness and benefit plans, special joint union-employer funds, and fiduciary reporting requirements. AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman addresses the group.

Changes in Pension Reform Law Asked for Multiemployer Plans

The National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans—a coalition of 30 unions—has asked Congress to amend the new pension reform law to correct and clarify certain sections, particularly those dealing with "prohibited transactions."

The committee represents some 7.5 million workers in the construction, maritime, needle and retail and service trades. Still being formed, the organization also is offering affiliation to national pension and welfare funds in appropriate cases.

The chairman of the new group, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., stressed that the committee "is not seeking any change in the intent or thrust of the act or in any of its basic reforms." What it does seek, he said, is correction of "a number of technical defects and dangerous ambiguities, and the unintentional or hitherto unrecognized implications of certain provisions."

Appearing before the House Labor Standards subcommittee, Georgine also charged there has been "maladministration" of the law since it took effect last September.

The new Employee Retirement Income Security Act is administered jointly by the Labor and Treasury Departments. This "fragmented administration" has resulted in a bureaucratic logjam which is hampering the effective application of the law, Georgine declared.

The pension reform law distinguishes between single-employer and multiemployer plans and contains provisions permitting portability of vested pension rights when a worker changes jobs. Multiemployer funds embrace at least one-third of all American workers covered by pension and welfare plans, Georgine noted.

He said the committee's greatest concern is with sections of the law that would prohibit the use of pension funds to promote housing.

"These provisions are a time-bomb ticking away under the trustees of thousands of multiemployer plans throughout the country," Georgine said. "Coming as it does at this time in an already depressed housing and construction industry, the practical effect has been disastrous in many parts of this country." He added:

"It seems maddening that, in the absence of an exemption, a multiemployer fund can loan monies directly or indirectly to a competing non-union employer, or invest its monies in construction outside the locality where its employers and participants are working, but that somehow public policy prohibits it from investing its monies in its own community to provide work for its contributing employers and its covered union members."

Georgine noted that the committee appealed last December for a blanket exemption for multiemployer funds to allow them to continue all practices that had been legal prior to Sept. 2, 1974, when the law was signed.

An exemption, permissible under the law, would allow the funds again to be able to invest in union construction mortgages and loans so that employment in the industry could receive a shot in the arm.

However, the Labor and Treasury Departments have failed to act on the committee's exemption application, Georgine noted.

"As a result," he said, "it is now illegal for pension funds in the building and construction trades to provide desperately needed mortgage money for construction loans if union contractors are participating in the construction."

The House panel, chaired by Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.), is holding oversight hearings on the pension reform law. Georgine told its members the split in jurisdiction between the Labor and Treasury Departments has proved extremely frustrating, time-consuming and cumbersome to plan administrators and other persons interested in insuring that the objectives of the law are carried out.

"This is unconsionable, and can only be cured by placing responsibility for enforcement of the law in one agency alone," he said.

Job Losses Mount, Rate Hits 8.9%

Unemployment rose from a rate of 8.7 to 8.9 percent in April, as the recession continued to take its toll of jobs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increase meant another 200,000 workers thrown out of work, and lifted the level of unemployment to 8.2 million, seasonally adjusted. The jobless rate was the highest since 1941 and nearly double the rate of October 1973, the pre-recession low.

Total employment rose by 240,000 in April to 84.1 million. This represented the first employment gain in seven months, BLS noted.

Since last August, when unemployment began to increase sharply, the jobless count has risen by 3.3 million persons. Most of the increase in unemployment has resulted directly from job layoffs.

"Since August, the number of job losers has risen by 2.7 million, accounting for more than four-fifths of the total increase," BLS said.

Most of the April increase in joblessness occurred among adult men. BLS noted their jobless rate rose from 6.8 percent in March to 7 percent last month, the highest level for this category since July 1958 when the nation was in another severe economic slump.

The April rise was also reflected in unemployment rate increases for married men and household heads. These are key groupings since workers in these categories are responsible for the economic well-being of one or more dependents.

FULL EMPLOYMENT goals are stressed by AFL-CIO President George Meany at meeting of the federation's Executive Council. He is flanked by Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice President I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers.

'We Cannot Turn Our Backs':

Labor Bids Nation Welcome Refugees

Vietnamese refugees should be welcomed by the American people as equally as those from other nations who preceded them to the United States in quest of liberty, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The nation has an inescapable moral responsibility to do all it can to assist the arriving Vietnamese, the council said in calling on Congress to provide adequate funds for their resettlement.

"We cannot turn our backs on those who have fought for freedom without making a mockery of the principles upon which our nation was founded and by which it has served for centuries as a haven for people of all nationalities who seek liberty," the council stressed in a statement.

That point was reinforced by Federation President George Meany during a press conference as he denounced those who would refuse entry to the refugees fleeing Communist oppression.

"We've been boasting for years that we are the leading country of the free world," Meany observed. "We talk about the great bastion of democracy, freedom. We are concerned about the welfare of all peoples of the world.

"We are a nation of immigrants. And to turn our backs on people who are fleeing oppression—fleeing for their lives—and say to them that 'we are going to dump them into the sea,' this to me is about as contrary to American tradition as anything I ever heard of."

Meany pointed out that the country took in 680,000 Cuban refugees a number of years ago without upsetting the nation's economy and said he felt that they have made a great contribution to the areas where they had settled.

He noted that of the more than 100,000 Vietnamese entering the Ford, Congress Scored on Stand

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO stepped up its campaign to put America back to work, charging that President Ford and Congress are placing fears of budget deficits ahead of the overriding need to restore full employment.

At its spring meeting in Washington, the federation's Executive Council adopted a series of statements dealing with the continuing recession and rising unemployment. But it singled out for sharp criticism the President's stand on the budget and votes in Congress on the size of the budget.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told a news conference that the President and the heads of the budget committees in Congress "have an absolute lack of confidence in the vitality of the U.S. economy when they set a limit on the budget deficit, and in effect say to the 8 or 9 million unemployed 'you are going to continue to be unemployed for the next three or four years'."

The country has to face up to the fact that "we can stand a $100 billion deficit, not $60 billion, in order to put America back to work. . . . I think in a situation like this the government of the United States must be the employer of last resort."

The council noted also that "there is no upturn in sight" in the economy and the tax-cut legislation is not enough by itself to reverse the deepest and most prolonged economic decline since the 1930's.

It called on Congress to speed housing programs now before it and provide funds for restoration of track and roadbeds of the nation's railroads, and it reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's program of job creation through fiscal and monetary stimulus.

In other areas, the Council called for a massive federal commitment to child care and development programs, legislation to correct the medical malpractice insurance mess, a bill of right for nursing home patients and protection for consumers on pricing methods.

An American welcome and aid for Vietnamese refugees, U.S. reaffirmation of support for Israel, a warning for free trade unions of the Communist takeover in Portugal, a call for an end to the one-way detente policy in light of the tragedy in Indochina and the need for a strong, viable national defense were highlighted in the council's action on international affairs.

The statement on the federal budget warned that ceilings voted by the Senate and House will keep unemployment "intolerably high."

There would be no budget deficit if America had full employment, the council stressed. And only a temporary deficit big enough to put America back to work can bring about significant economic recovery.

The council resolution voiced labor's sharp disappointment that only 29 senators voted for a budget amendment to add $9 billion for job-creating programs the AFL-CIO had termed "critical to economic recovery." And it noted that the House came close to eliminating even the "inadequate job-creating funds" proposed by its Budget Committee.

"Congress must stop ignoring the need to restore the nation to a full employment economy," the council said. Members of Congress "must be told, again and again, that putting America back to work and restoring a healthy economy must be their main goal."

New System Backed In Malpractice Crisis

The AFL-CIO has called for federal legislation to set up a system of arbitration and no-fault insurance to deal with the increasingly serious problem of the costs of medical malpractice insurance.

Such a system, the federation's Executive Council said, would cost much less than the present malpractice insurance coverage that relies on tort law and "would serve the entire nation, not simply by relieving the anxiety of physicians, hospitals and insurance companies, but also by improving the quality and reducing the cost of medical care."

The council's statement pointed out that the costs of malpractice insurance are passed on to the consumer increasing "already excessively high doctor fees and hospital charges." Collectively bargained health benefit plans, Medicare and Medicaid all pay for malpractice insurance costs.

Two bills introduced by Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) "are particularly worthy of consideration," the council said. One deals with arbitration of malpractice suits; the other would establish a federal program of no-fault for medical injuries resulting pri-

AFL-CIO Fights Plans To Undermine Seniority

The AFL-CIO will support every valid effort to protect workers threatened by the recession but will oppose "any and all efforts to weaken or dilute the seniority system."

Voluntary agreements reached through collective bargaining on work sharing or other approaches are useful, the federation's Executive Council declared, but it affirmed its strong opposition to weakening and impairing seniority systems through legislative action, court decision or administrative fiat.

The council pointed out that heavy and rising unemployment has touched off attacks on the seniority system, that it is being blamed "for social conditions, particularly discrimination in hiring, that it did not cause."

The statement reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's long-held position that "full employment is the only solution to unemployment and to discrimination. And we will not stand idly by while a few would pit worker against worker for the right to be unemployed."

Defining the seniority system as "a cornerstone of the American

AID TO REFUGEES from Vietnam is in the American tradition and has the AFL-CIO's full support, President George Meany tells a news conference after an Executive Council session.

Tragedy in Indochina Tied to Detente Failure

The "tragic events" in Indochina underscore the "bankruptcy of detente" and constitute a defeat of "unprecedented magnitude" for the United States, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council called on the Administration "to abandon its calamitous one-way detente with the Communist superpowers and to replace it with a standard of complete reciprocity in all of our dealings with Communist states."

This standard, the council asserted, "demands the immediate and substantial cessation of worldwide Communist subversion and aggression."

The North Vietnamese conquest of South Vietnam, the council pointed out, "provides fresh and irrefutable evidence that Communist powers cannot be trusted to live up to international agreements if those agreements stand in the way of their own expansionist designs. . . ."

Citing the "outrageous violation" of the Paris peace accords by the Soviet Union and China in resupplying and rearming North Vietnam, the council said the United States "did not honor its commitment to South Vietnam" and that the "strong sentiment in the Congress against aid to South Vietnam helped to demoralize our ally while giving the enemy a green light to go all the way."

There is no evidence, said the council, that the Russians or the Chinese "acted in the spirit of detente to restrain Hanoi or even to assist in an orderly transfer of power. Nothing short of conquest would satisfy the North Vietnamese and their patron states."

In the interest of world peace, the council concluded, one-way detente must be abandoned. In addition vigorous and intensive efforts by the United States are needed "to repair and reinvigorate our relations—economic, political and military—with the other democratic nations of the world. They must be convinced that henceforth the United States says what it means and means what it says."

Mayer, Gold Named To AFL-CIO Legal Posts

AFL-CIO President George Meany has announced the appointment of Robert C. Mayer as associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO and Laurence Gold as the federation's special counsel.

Mayer, who holds degrees from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, Georgetown University and George Washington University Law School, has been associated with the law firm of Woll & Mayer for 20 years. He will continue as a partner in the firm. J. Albert Woll is the AFL-CIO general counsel.

Gold, a graduate of Princeton University and Harvard Law School, was associated with the Woll firm since 1964 prior to being named special counsel. He succeeds Thomas E. Harris who resigned to become a member of the Federal Election Commission.

Gold, 38, served earlier with the National Labor Relations Board in the general counsel's office. Since 1970 he has been a lecturer in law at the National Law Center of George Washington University. Born in New York, he is married and has two children.

Mayer, 51, a native Washingtonian, is active in the American and District Bar Associations. He is married and has five children.

Studies Center Slates Open House on May 11

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will hold open house May 11 for the general public at its Silver Spring, Md., campus from 2 to 4:30 p.m.

The District of Columbia Federation of Musicians, in cooperation with the center, will stage band concerts at 2:30 and 3:30 p.m. Free refreshments will be served to the visitors. The Studies Center is located at 10000 New Hampshire Ave. in Silver Spring.

'Massive Commitment' Sought:

Federal Day Care Program Urged to Fill Growing Need

"A massive federal commitment to the provision of early childhood development and day care" throughout the country for all children who need these services has been called for by AFL-CIO.

The federation's Executive Council outlined a 10-point program for congressional enactment to meet the needs of the "large and growing numbers of women (who) have to work" and are being forced to leave their children without the care and attention they need.

The council declared that responsible elected officials should be the "prime sponsors" of child care programs and that "the AFL-CIO believes that there is great merit in giving the public school systems this prime sponsorship role."

It stressed that only public and non-profit groups should be permitted to participate in the program, that "there is no legitimate role for profit-making entrepreneurs in child care programs."

Citing the statistics on the marked rise in the number of working mothers and the added factors of rising unemployment and inflation, the council statement stressed that lack of adequate child care is a problem for the poor, the working poor, lower middle class and middle class women. Only a small percentage are able to get good licensed care for their children which meets federal standards.

The statement pointed out that some local efforts in the child care field have been undertaken over the years with some success. "Thousands of children have received beneficial, high-quality services from programs developed by labor unions, parent cooperatives and local community organizations and church groups."

Such programs fill an important need in the communities they serve, the council said, and "these programs, like the excellent centers operated by a number of AFL-CIO affiliates, should be encouraged and continued."

While noting that in most communities the school system would be "the appropriate prime sponsor of the child care and early childhood development program, with the responsibility for planning programs, distributing funds and monitoring programs," where the school system is unwilling or unable to undertake the responsibility some other appropriate public or non-profit community organization should be eligible.

It was noted also that not all services need be actually offered in public school facilities, allowing for in-home child care, group day care homes for young children and special services for the emotionally and physically handicapped.

The federation's program includes the following elements:

- Achievement as rapidly as possible of the goal of free, high-quality comprehensive early childhood education and child care services for all children who need them. Since the program will necessarily require a period of time to get fully underway, gradually increased funds should be provided toward earliest achievement of this goal.
- Coordination by the prime sponsor of a range of programs, including health, nutrition, counseling and other necessary support services and child care in a variety of settings including family and group care homes.
- Insistence that all services must meet federal requirements and standards as well as all local school and facility codes and laws.
- Denying profit-making operators eligibility to receive federal funds.
- Declaring existing public and private non-profit programs that meet federal requirements, eligible to receive funds.
- Providing for effective parent involvement in these programs since they are programs parents voluntarily choose.
- Requiring that all construction, renovation and repair undertaken under the program must conform to the prevailing wage standards of the Davis-Bacon Act.
- Providing for training, retraining and in-service training of professional and paraprofessional staff.
- Providing full protection of the job rights and employment conditions of workers in child care programs.

Congress Action Pushed To End Housing Slump

Labor called for "strong action" by Congress and the Administration to end a two-year depression in the housing industry so that America can provide "decent homes for its people and jobs for its workers."

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement termed high interest rates the "major roadblock" to a housing revival. The high cost of money drives up builders' costs and puts monthly payments too high for the budget of most American families, the council said.

"We firmly believe the key to increasing home construction is 6 percent mortgage interest rates," it added.

Neither the House nor the Senate version of a middle-income housing bill now in conference fully meets the AFL-CIO's objectives, but each version has some desirable features.

The Executive Council statement urged inclusion in the final bill of a House provision that would allow home buyers to obtain mortgages at a fixed 7 percent rate. It endorsed Senate provisions expanding housing assistance for the elderly and continuing a program of mortgage purchases by the government whenever housing starts drop below a specified level.

The council urged, however, that mortgages intended for government purchase carry interest rates no higher than 6 percent. Funds now available for mortgage purchases are going unused, the resolution noted, because prospective homebuyers can't afford the high interest costs.

Further, the council proposed, to avoid another sharp decline in homebuilding, "Congress must mandate the Federal Reserve Board to allocate credit so that interest rates will remain low and homebuilding can be sustained at a level required to meet the needs of American families."

The AFL-CIO position on the House and Senate versions of the emergency housing bill has been sent to all members of the conference committee by Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

U.S. Called On To Stand Firm Behind Israel

The AFL-CIO strongly reaffirmed its full support of Israel and demanded that the Administration "cease sowing doubts as to our commitment to the only democratic state in the Middle East."

The federation's Executive Council said the pertinent and immediate question is "to reassert, not reassess America's commitment to democracy in the Middle East, to Israel."

The council pointed out the strong AFL-CIO support for Israel going back to the formation of the state in 1948 and the founding of Histadrut—the free trade union movement of Israel—50 years ago. The bonds with Histadrut "have become unbreakable," the statement said.

Israel's quest for survival for fair and secure boundaries, for peaceful relations with her Arab neighbors deserves the "unambiguous support of our government, not careless rhetoric that can only strengthen the hands of Israel's aggressive enemies," the council declared. The solution to the Palestinian problem, it added, will be found "in face-to-face negotiations between Israel and the Arab states, not in the inhumane actions of Arafat's terror squads or in the bombastic speechmaking that passes for discussion in the United Nations."

Council Presses Top Priority for Jobs

Ford, Congress Hit For Stand on Deficit

The statement hit hard at President Ford's insistence that the deficit cannot exceed $60 billion "no matter how unemployment spirals upward."

The publicly held national debt is a much smaller percentage of America's total production of goods and services than in most of the period since World War II, the council noted. And if the jobless rate were at the same level as when Richard Nixon became President, "America would be enjoying a budget surplus."

Labor has confidence in the nation's ability to resume economic growth, but it will take "a much larger federal deficit" than Congress is contemplating "to create jobs and get Americans back to work."

Programs that are neglected or underfinanced in the budget ceilings set by the House and Senate include accelerated public works, public service employment, aid to the cities, housing, railbed repair and health insurance for the unemployed, the council said. It noted that the House and Senate will have an opportunity in September to update their budget resolutions, but warned that it might be "too late" at that time.

Because of the urgency, "the AFL-CIO will continue to call upon the budget committees to face their real responsibilities and report supplementary resolutions well before the summer recess."

Meanwhile, the council pledged, labor will continue to seek quick action by Congress on job-creating measures and aid for the unemployed. The AFL-CIO also will intensify efforts "for tax justice, statutory lowering of interest rates and legislation to stop the export of American jobs," the statement declared.

Meany told reporters that the recent Washington rally for jobs sponsored by the Industrial Union Dept. was a "very impressive demonstration" in terms of 60,000 people coming to the capital to "let their government know how they felt about the job situation."

He noted in reply to a query that the AFL-CIO is supporting the Farm Workers' lettuce and grape boycott and will continue to support the union in its fight against the Teamsters and growers.

There is a feeling, he said in reply to another query, that as time goes on smaller unions in the federation realize they can do a better job by merging with a larger union and the AFL-CIO is encouraging voluntary mergers.

The council voted contributions to the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the National Assembly of Health & Voluntary Agencies and approved the 1975-76 operating budget for the Labor Studies Center of $1,309,256.

The next council meeting was set for July 30-31 in Chicago.

MEMBERS OF THE AFL-CIO Executive Council meet in Washington to update labor's program in view of continuing high unemployment and an inadequate response by both the Administration and Congress.

Situs Picketing Rights Called Long Overdue

Passage of a construction site picketing bill is long overdue, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

A council resolution reaffirmed labor's united support for what is called "situs picketing"—the right of a union to picket a multiemployer construction site if it has a dispute with one of the subcontractors working at the site.

Four Presidents from both political parties have endorsed the concept of the legislation which, the Executive Council stressed, would bring about "equal treatment of craft and industrial unions."

Legislation to restore the on-site picketing rights that were sharply curtailed by a Supreme Court decision has been introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Labor Backs Bill to Require Price Marking

The AFL-CIO announced its strong support of legislation pending in Congress to require that any consumer product sold at retail have its price clearly marked on it.

"We urge our state and local central bodies to support similar legislation at the state and local level," the federation's Executive Council added in a statement.

"For consumers trying to make ends meet during a time of continued inflation, removing prices from products makes comparison shopping virtually impossible," the council said. Elimination of price marking also means lost jobs, the council noted.

Supermarkets recently have stepped up their efforts to install computerized checkout stands and thus do away with the need for marking prices on consumer commodities.

The council also urged immediate congressional action on legislation to repeal the antitrust exemption for so-called "fair trade" laws, statutes in 36 states which "are nothing more than legalized price-fixing costing consumers an estimated $2 billion a year."

AFL-CIO Fights Plans To Weaken Seniority

labor movement" and the worker's answer to arbitrary decisions by management in determining employment rights and promotion priorities, the council termed it "a tangible asset for any worker," the most valued possession "next to the union card itself."

In an effort to limit the economic impact of rising unemployment some unions have negotiated provisions for early retirement, sharing of reduced work during a temporary emergency period and other voluntary agreements, it noted.

In contrast to this voluntary approach, however, "there have been calls for the destruction of the seniority system and creation of 'phantom seniority' or the imposition of forced work sharing," the council said. Some federal, state and local agencies have suggested their readiness to prescribe regulations for guidelines for such programs, the statement added.

The council stressed the importance of "leaving the decision as to work-sharing a voluntary one to be adopted when the parties most familiar with its potential impact on a particular workplace see it as the most rational solution."

Noting that forced work-sharing has been championed as a device to prevent "disproportionate layoff of minority employes," the council said that "in most American industries substantial numbers of minority employes have been employed and those employes thus have a substantial investment in the utilization of plant seniority as the determinant of who will remain at work during periods of economic downturn."

American workers, regardless of race, the council asserted, "do not think it inequitable that the more senior workers are protected in times of layoff." The principle is widely accepted that "the longer service employe has priority in job allocation." It added:

"Forced work sharing violates that principle. It is nothing more than 'poverty-sharing.' By forcing all workers to share the brunt of economic downturn, work-sharing inevitably would tear apart the solidarity necessary to achieve real economic gains for all workers."

Portugal Rule Hit as Threat To Freedom

The AFL-CIO called on all free trade unions and democratic governments to protest and condemn the Communist-military alliance in Portugal that threatens freedom, democracy and peace in that country.

The federation's Executive Council also called on the United States to grant economic assistance only to a democratic government in Portugal and to speak out against the "increasing evidence of basic violations of human and trade union rights," violations which should also "be the subject of inquiry at the United Nations."

Despite the results of the recent elections for a constituent assembly, which "clearly established the moderate Socialist and Popular Democratic parties in the majority," the Armed Forces Movement has declared itself above any elected forms of government, the council noted.

An entrenched minority of the military has taken over the regime and aligned itself with the Communist Party, the council charged, with the consequence that Intersindical has become the sole labor confederation controlled by the "Soviet-run, Prague-based, World Federation of Trade Unions."

The council declared that "we do not agree with some western commentators who argue that the Portuguese people are so conditioned by years of submission to a right-wing dictatorship that they will now accept yet another dictatorial regime, this time dominated by the Communist Party, lavishly financed by the Soviet Union."

U.S. Urged to Maintain Defenses To Deter Totalitarian Aggression

Until balanced and enforceable arms control and limitation agreements are reached, American military power must be sufficient to "effectively deter even the threat of attack," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

That threat from the "military power of totalitarianism" must be met by the President and Congress who must do "what must be done to provide for the common defense," the council said, including greater costs if they are required.

"No burden we must bear is too heavy to endure if the alternative is to live under dictatorship, or the constant prospect of war," the statement said.

The council urged U.S. representatives to arms control and arms limitation talks "to continue to press for agreements that will end the arms race. But such agreements must clearly be mutual, not one-sided; they must be balanced, not ridden with subtle concessions on our part; and they must be enforceable, not ringing public-relations declarations of no practical consequence."

The statement noted that the defense budget proposed by Sec. James Schlesinger may not be large enough and additional funds may be needed to keep pace with inflation. "If fat can be found in the present budget, and if greater defense capacity can be achieved at no further cost, we will warmly approve. But if greater costs are required—so be it."

The council traced the "vast growth in the military might of the Soviet Union and its allies and the relative decline in the defense capability of the democratic world, especially the United States." Soviet might has "surged far beyond a mere defensive capability" with new missile systems and multiple warheads and large numbers of men under arms with conventional weapons and increasing supplies of tanks, artillery and mortars, the council pointed out.

It said the Soviet navy has as many surface combat ships as the U.S. and "more than three times our submarine strength. Their ships are newer and faster and have immense and sophisticated fire power."

In contrast, the council said, the U.S. "appears to be drifting toward unilateral disarmament. Current defense spending constitutes the lowest percentage of our GNP since our demobilization after World War II. In constant dollars, our defense spending has steadily declined, yet the proportion of our defense budget that goes for manpower and other personnel benefits has risen substantially. Our allies and our adversaries alike must now question our capability to effectively wage war and only that capability, clearly perceived, can effectively deter war."

Labor Who's Who Deadline May 30

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis has urged trade unionists who have received biographical information forms for a forthcoming directory, "Who's Who in Labor," to return the completed forms by May 30.

The volume is being compiled by Arno Press, Inc., with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. It is expected to include information on about 3,500 labor officials representing international and national unions, regional and local bodies, trade and industrial departments.

AFL-CIO President George Meany has urged union leaders to cooperate in the venture, noting that the volume will be of value to the labor movement and the academic community.

New System In Malpractice Crisis Backed

marily from medical services rather than injury or disease.

The council recommended, however, federal legislation "providing for a single program including both arbitration and no-fault insurance. Under such a system, an impartial arbitration panel would make a determination as to whether medical treatment contributed to an unfavorable outcome.

"If the unfavorable outcome occurred in spite of the fact that the treatment conformed to acceptable standards of care, there would be no award. If, however, the panel determined that the medical treatment contributed to the unfavorable outcome, a no-fault award would be made."

Such an award would cover all necessary and reasonable expenses for treatment and rehabilitation, homemaker and other services and loss of current and future earnings.

Under the proposal physicians would continue to pay premiums for malpractice insurance to obtain the no-fault coverage and recourse to impartial arbitration. They would be required to comply with state license requirements and meet minimum federal standards as well as take periodic re-examinations and accept review of their services by a professional review group.

The cost of malpractice insurance premiums is only one part of the cost to consumers, the council noted. Fear of suits causes doctors to practice defensive medicine providing for extra services not normally required. This involves a cost of from $6 to $8 billion over and above the premium payments to insurance companies.

The council ascribed the cause of skyrocketing escalation of direct and indirect cost for malpractice insurance to deterioration of the doctor-patient relationship, million dollar plus settlements, the contingency fee system of payments to trial lawyers, and the high cost of litigation under tort law.

A more adequate social insurance program, including national health insurance and income maintenance payments for temporary and permanent disability, would handle the malpractice problem more equitably and economically, the council said.

Recession Toll Sends Jobless Rate to 8.9%

The rate for household heads rose over the month from 5.8 to 6 percent while the rate for married men went from 5.2 to 5.6 percent.

Both the level and the rate of unemployment for the three worker groups—married men, household heads and adult men—have doubled over the past year, BLS observed.

Besides the 8.2 million workers officially classified as unemployed in April, there were hundreds of thousands of "discouraged workers" not counted among the jobless. BLS compiles their number on a quarterly basis. In the March quarter, there were 1.1 million discouraged workers—men and women who have given up looking for work because they felt they could not get a job.

This is the highest number of "discouraged workers" since BLS began the count in 1967.

Another indication of the severity of the current recession was reflected in BLS statistics showing that the number of persons who were jobless for 15 weeks or more rose by 410,000 to a level of 2.4 million in April. More than half the increase was among workers unemployed six months or longer.

As a result of this lengthening in the jobless period for many workers, there was a marked jump in the average duration of unemployment, by 1.5 weeks to 12.9 weeks, BLS said. This was the highest level in more than 10 years.

Among the major industries, increases in joblessness were concentrated in construction, manufacturing, transportation and public utilities industries and among the blue-collar occupational grouping, BLS said. Jobless rates of 19.3 percent in construction and 12.2 percent in manufacturing were all-time recorded highs.

The rate for young Vietnam-era veterans—those 20-24 years—soared to 22.8 percent in April from 17.5 percent the month before. The rate for non-veterans in the same age group was 10.4 percent, about the same as in March.

The unemployment rate of workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs reached 6.8 percent last month, up from 6.4 percent in March. Fulltime workers had a jobless rate of 8.7 percent, an increase of four-tenths of 1 percent from March. The rates for other major demographic groups—adult women (8.6 percent), teenagers (20.4 percent), whites (8.1 percent), and blacks (14.6 percent)—were all about unchanged in April but remained at or near record-high levels, BLS said.

The average workweek—at 36 hours on a seasonally adjusted basis—was only one-tenth of an hour higher than in March. The slight increase followed an almost steady downward trend since last fall.

Average hourly earnings in April rose one cent to $4.44, seasonally adjusted.

Stimulus to Jobs Cited In Railbed Repair Plan

Legislation urged by the AFL-CIO to fund essential repairs to railroad roadbeds and facilities has been approved by the Senate Labor Committee despite Administration opposition.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution termed it one of the "important programs" to stimulate the economy. In addition to the direct employment on the railroads, the council noted that it would also create jobs in the manufacture of steel rails and railroad equipment.

Earlier, President Harold C. Crotty of the Mantenance of Way Employees spoke for the 19 unions of the Railway Labor Executives' Association at joint hearings of the Senate's Commerce and Labor committees.

Crotty termed the condition of tracks and roadbeds "a menace to safety" and noted the rise in derailments and other accidents. The number of roadbed workers on the railroads dropped from 91,970 in October 1974 to 75,519 in March, he said.

The labor-endorsed bill, expected to create 40,000 jobs, would authorize $600 million for labor costs and $100 million for materials.

Railroad management officials testified that large numbers of workers could be employed immediately on roadbed repair if the money were available and urged approval of the legislation.

Transportation Sec. William T. Coleman testified that the Administration opposes the bill. "With respect to the unemployment problem," he said, "we believe we should await the impact of budgetary and other actions already taken by the Administration. These actions should help bring about an upturn in the economy which will provide more jobs."

Alaska Pipeline Arbitrator Named

D. Quinn Mills has been named to take over as the impartial arbitrator in jurisdictional disputes that may arise on the Trans-Alaska pipeline project.

His appointment was announced jointly by President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and William J. Curtin, representing the Alyeska Pipeline Service Co.

Mills succeeds John T. Dunlop, who resigned when he became Secretary of Labor. Like Dunlop, Mills is a former chairman of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee.

'We Cannot Turn Our Backs':

Labor Bids Nation Welcome Refugees

country only about 30,000 will be seeking jobs since the total includes children, grandparents and other relatives.

Even with 8.2 million officially unemployed, Meany said that "if this country can't absorb another 30-40,000 people and try to find some way for them to make a living, then I feel that in a sense we are denying our heritage."

To those who say that the nation cannot absorb the refugees, Meany asked:

"Why? Do we have a guilt complex?

"Whether we should have been in Vietnam or not, is not the question anymore. Maybe we should not have gone in, but we did go in. And we put these people to work on our side, working in our military establishment, and put them into positions where their lives were in jeopardy when the Communists moved in.

"To deny them the right, to deny them a welcome in this great country is something that is absolutely contrary to my concept of what the whole American nation is all about."

In its statement, the council urged Congress to immediately appropriate enough funds to ease the resettlement problems of the Vietnamese without burdening the hard-pressed resources of state and local governments.

It also called on union members to make the refugees welcome in their communities, suggesting that the problems the Vietnamese face can be overcome by good will and generosity.

In addition, the council directed the federation's Departments of Community Services and International Affairs and the Human Resources Development Institute to cooperate with government and voluntary programs to aid the refugees in finding jobs and housing and obtaining needed social services.

In response to a reporter's question, Meany said that the State Dept. has been able to evacuate about 70 Vietnamese trade union officials and their families—a group of about 250 in all.

He said it was his understanding that Tran Quoc Buu, president of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT), was among the refugees going to Guam.

Meany said the AFL-CIO submitted a list of CVT officials who were marked for execution by the invading Communist forces to the State Dept. for evacuation, "and I have been told by the Secretary of State that they are out."

"Of course, this does not take care of the thousands of others who are marked because of the fact that they worked for the military establishment," he said.

Death of CVT

The following appeared as an editorial in the Wall Street Journal, May 6, 1975:

Officials of the AFL-CIO are finding that the Communist take-over in South Vietnam is following a familiar pattern. The non-Communist labor leaders are the first to go. The official radio of the new Saigon regime reported over the weekend that the headquarters of the South Vietnamese Confederation of Trade Unions (CVT) had been seized "by 3,000 workers," that its members were ordered to join a new "revolutionary labor organization," and that the president of the CVT, Tran Quoc Buu, had been branded a "traitor."

The AFL-CIO reports that Mr. Buu and possibly 60 colleagues and their families have been rescued. (The roster is incomplete since AFL-CIO sponsored refugees are still making their way over the Pacific escape route.) But the union knows that many local CVT leaders have not been as lucky.

According to mid-April accounts of CVT sources the advancing Communist forces were systematically rounding up CVT members. In Da Nang, CVT officers were arrested and required to turn over all records. At Ban Me Thuot, former union officials were put on a nonsubsistence ration. In Binh Long and Binh Dong, CVT officers were shot. In Quang Ngai, Quang Tin, Pleiku, Kontum, Hue, Dalat and Nahtrang, CVT provincial council leaders and members have been arrested and have not been seen or heard of since.

AFL-CIO leaders have seen this happen before. Communists bitterly resent competition in representing the proletariat, especially when their rivals are more concerned with improving the workers' lives than with installing a Communist view; the quickest way to remove such competitors is to shoot or arrest them. This experience has made American labor leaders among the strongest proponents of American asylum for South Vietnamese refugees. In a recent letter to congressional leaders, George Meany urged, "If we do not stand by these desperate people, how can we ever claim to conduct a credible foreign policy? . . .

"If the doctrine of 'detente' retains any meaning, then let it now be put to the test. Let us make it clear to the Soviet Union and China that we expect their cooperation in restraining Hanoi, and that detente will never survive the slaughter of our friends in South Vietnam."

Some congressmen, including erstwhile liberals, seem about to embark on a sordid campaign to save American workers from competition from South Vietnamese refugees. Before they begin, they would be well-advised to heed what American labor has to say.

Tax Cut Not Enough:

Bigger Stimulus Demanded To Turn Economy Around

The Tax Reduction Act of 1975 is not enough by itself to reverse the nation's deepest and most prolonged economic decline since the 1930s, the AFL-CIO Executive Council made clear at its spring meeting in Washington.

While the tax-cut legislation may help slow down the pace of falling economic activity, the council stressed that "the bottom has not yet been reached" and "despite optimistic Administration rhetoric, there is no upturn in sight."

"Substantial job-creating and income-generating measures by the federal government are needed immediately—in addition to the tax cut—to turn the economy around and put America back to work," the statement declared.

"The most pressing issue on the national economic agenda is to rapidly achieve a full-employment, prosperous economy—for social cohesion and progress, as well as for straightening out the government's recent fiscal problems, which have been created by its own utterly wrong-headed economic policies."

Those policies have resulted in a depressed economy featuring:

● The highest jobless rate in 34 years. At 8.9 percent last month, the nation's unemployment rate translated to 8.2 million workers out of jobs. But when 1.1 million "discouraged workers" are added to the total, "a more accurate unemployment rate would be 10 percent, or 9.3 million jobless," the council said.

● Depression-level, double-digit unemployment among some worker groups. Teenagers had a jobless rate of 20.4 percent; construction workers, 19.3 percent; unskilled workers, 17.2 percent; semiskilled, 14.9 percent; black workers, 14.6 percent; factory workers, 12.2 percent.

● A drop in consumer buying power "so great that the $24 billion tax cut will offset only a small part," the council said. The slide in the buying power of the average worker's weekly take-home pay has been so extensive that "it would now require an increase of $65 billion in after-tax personal income merely to bring the per-capita purchasing power of the American people back to where it was in the summer of 1973, before the recession started."

● A 60 percent decline in housing starts in the January-March quarter from the same period of 1973. Building permits over the two-year period were off by 68 percent.

● A 12.1 percent slide in industrial production from March 1974 to March 1975.

The council also cited lower retail sales in March, near-rock-bottom levels of consumer confidence, a sharp reduction in plant capacity, and higher interest payments and falling tax revenues at state and local governmental levels.

In the face of these conditions, the council noted, the Federal Reserve Board has failed to provide sufficient growth of the money supply for the much lower interest rates that are needed to spur the economy.

"Interest rates on short-term loans have moved, but rates on long-term loans for mortgages and business expansion remain close to last summer's record peak," the council pointed out. Only two weeks ago, instead of decisive measures to cut mortgage interest rates, the Ford Administration boosted the rate on government-backed FHA and VA mortgages from 8 to 8.5 percent.

"These appalling monetary policies, which threaten to prevent a healthy economic recovery and to maintain high employment through the remainder of this decade, are compounded by the Administration's drive to maintain a very tight lid on job-creating measures," the statement observed.

The President's budget report last February projected four successive years of the highest jobless levels since 1941, and "a totally unacceptable" 5.5 percent rate as late as 1980.

"Yet majorities of both houses of the Congress have decided on a tight ceiling that will curb needed measures to stimulate job-expansion," the council said. "If such a ceiling is maintained, the number of jobless will be between 7 and 8 million at the end of 1976."

An "anemic" economy, with high joblessness in the coming years, will perpetuate large federal budget deficits, "which the Administration and congressional majorities say must be eliminated," the council noted.

"The basic deficit in America is not in the federal budget, but in jobs and earnings," it said, adding:

"One clear lesson from the economic history of the years since World War II is the necessity of a balanced, full-employment, prosperous national economy. This is the simple, sure way to cut the deficit in the period immediately ahead."

Nursing Home Reform Bill Given Support

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to enact legislation that would guarantee the rights of nursing home patients and end the mistreatment of the elderly.

The Executive Council noted that recent investigations have revealed numerous abuses of the more than one million patients under nursing home care, including unsanitary and unsafe conditions, improper use of drugs, and profiteering and cheating by some operators of the facilities.

It urged Congress to further investigate "this appalling situation" and pass a Bill of Rights for the patients that would effectively monitor all nursing homes and raise the standard of care.

The council cited a Senate subcommittee report which concluded that life-threatening violations of state and federal regulations could be found at more than half of the nursing homes in the country.

"Since many nursing homes receive both state and federal funds," the council said, "legislation must be enacted which will guarantee the rights of patients and eliminate abuses."

Sidney Hillman Awards Mark 25th Anniversary

New York—The Sidney Hillman Foundation presented its 25th annual series of awards to reporters, writers and broadcasters for important achievements in mass communications.

Murray H. Finley, president of the Clothing Workers and of the foundation named for the union's first president, presented the $750 checks and scrolls at an awards luncheon.

Finley said the awards reflect the "social involvement" of Sidney Hillman until his death in 1946 and the labor movement's concern with public issues, communication, education and the free expression of opinions.

The list of award winners, he told the luncheon gathering, reflects "a panoramic view of 25 years of history."

From the earliest years of the Sidney Hillman awards, Finley said, "one gets a picture of America groping its way to a new role in the world, but disrupted by a massive threat to our civil liberties."

Then, "in the mid-50s begins a long series of awards for books and articles on racial issues and civil rights. . . . In the 1960s, awards are made in the area of poverty and the disadvantaged, our urban crisis, and the beginnings of national concern with the environment and conservation."

All of these issues, plus international affairs, are reflected in the awards of recent years, Finley said.

The awards went to:

● Richard J. Barnett and Ronald E. Muller for their book, "Global Reach," an in-depth study of multinationals and their adverse effect on workers.

● The Boston Globe for "forthright and sensitive" coverage of that city's school integration crisis.

● Seymour Hersh of the New York Times for articles dealing with illegal CIA activities in the United States.

● The Columbia Broadcasting System for its documentary film, "The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman."

● Noel Mostert for his book, "Supership," on the giant oil tankers.

Also, a special award went to New York's educational television station, WNET, for the quality of its programs over the years.

Furniture Strike Fights Welfare-Level Wages

Sumter, S.C.—Nearly 1,000 Furniture Workers are striking the Georgia-Pacific plant here for a new contract to provide decent wages without forcing members to seek public assistance to meet living expenses.

The UFWA accused Georgia-Pacific of making taxpayers supplement its low wages through welfare payments.

UFWA's southern vice president, Leroy Clark, charged that wages are so low at the Georgia-Pacific furniture plant that many workers must apply for public welfare even though they work full time.

Hourly wages at the plant are just pennies above the minimum wage—ranging from $2.16 to $2.50—even for many workers who have been working there 10 years, the union pointed out.

The UFWA members went on strike Apr. 25 after eight collective bargaining sessions in which the company failed to improve its position despite the efforts of federal and state mediators.

Clark noted that although the cost of living rose 12 percent last year, the company's offer on wages was only 8 percent.

"That really was a wage cut," Clark stressed, "and the people here just couldn't afford to take it."

Shortly after the strike started, more than 175 members of UFWA Local 273 who had been picketing the facility were arrested on charges of "parading without a permit."

They were hauled off to Sumter County Jail and bond for each person was set at $300—$100 for parading without a permit and $200 for violating a local court injunction limiting the number of pickets to two.

A federal district court judge has since thrown out the charges and directed police to refrain from employing similar charges against the pickets in the future, UFWA President Carl Scarbrough reported.

But on the same day of the federal court's action, the company was back in the local court attempting to secure a new injunction limiting the picketing, Scarborough said. The local court has taken the company's plea under advisement.

Other key issues in the dispute involve working conditions and substandard benefits.

The UFWA said plant rules require workers to sign a book before they may use plant toilets and they must get a statement from a physician in case of illness. Although workers pay two-thirds of their medical insurance costs, they are not permitted to choose their own carrier, the union also pointed out.

Court Asked to Protect Aid Rights of Disabled

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to give disabled workers and their dependents the same protection against loss of benefits that are accorded welfare recipients.

Under present social security rules, the government can disqualify a worker from disability benefits and end his monthly payments before allowing him to challenge the disqualification at a full hearing.

A brief filed by the AFL-CIO supports the position taken by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals—that a disabled worker is entitled to a hearing before losing benefits, not just later.

The AFL-CIO brief suggested that the precedent to be applied was set in a 1969 Supreme Court decision that welfare recipients couldn't be dropped from the benefit rolls before having an opportunity for a hearing on the evidence.

Disabled workers and their families are certainly entitled to the same degree of protection, the AFL-CIO urged.

The brief pointed out also that the decision as to whether a person is totally and permanently disabled often rests on conflicting medical evidence that is best explored in full hearings.

Further, a majority of hearings requested and held for persons dropped from the disability rolls resulted in restoration of benefits.

The percentage of reinstated benefits over the five most recent years has ranged from 53.7 to 58.6 percent, the AFL-CIO brief noted.

Machinists Set Vote on Pact In Aerospace

St. Louis—Striking Machinists at McDonnell Douglas Corp. here were set to vote May 11 on a tentative agreement that would end their four-month walkout.

The agreement was reached following an 11-hour bargaining session at the offices of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in Washington.

About 11,500 IAM members left their jobs Feb. 10 after the giant aerospace firm refused to meet union goals for a new contract. Terms of the proposed settlement were not disclosed pending the ratification vote.

About 7,000 other Machinists at the firm's plants in California and Florida accepted a new pact in mid-April, and concluded their strike.

McDonnell Douglas produces military and civilian aircraft and missiles, including the F-4 Phantom and the F-15 Air Force fighter.

Ignoring the Facts

THE AFL-CIO is appalled at the actions taken by the Senate and House on the first budget resolutions. Like the President, the Congress is focusing on the dollar deficit and ignoring the real cause of this deficit. Like the President, the Congress is ignoring the human needs of millions of Americans desperately seeking help.

Neither the President nor the Congress recognizes these two fundamental economic facts of life:

● During periods of severe economic recession and depression federal revenue drops drastically. A deficit can be avoided either by providing the stimulus necessary to revitalize the economy or by slashing vital human programs.

● For every 1 percent drop in unemployment, the Treasury gains $16 billion in tax revenues and reduced social costs. When Richard Nixon became President, unemployment was below 4 percent. If joblessness was at the same rate today, America would be enjoying a budget surplus.

Both the President and the Congress ignore these facts. The President has set as his goal a $60 billion deficit total, no matter how unemployment spirals upward. The Congress refuses to challenge the President.

The President's insistence on an arbitrary budget deficit ceiling of $60 billion indicates that he lacks essential faith in America's economy.

We in the trade union movement have absolute confidence in the ability of this nation's economy to recover from this current economic emergency, but only if it is given the opportunity to grow and expand. This will require a much larger federal deficit to create jobs and get Americans back to work.

THE PRESIDENT'S projected federal deficit of $60 billion, as a percentage of today's gross national product, is far too low for this recessionary period. In fact, this country supported a much higher deficit at a time when its economy was smaller and its gross national product much less.

The nation can—and must—revive the economy again. The Congress must ignore the President's goal and use facts, not myths, to determine what the economy needs to achieve full employment. If they don't there will be no recovery and unemployment will remain intolerably high.

The congressional budget process was created to establish national priorities. The action taken in the Senate and House last week demonstrates that priorities have been replaced by politics.

Both the Senate and House budget resolutions are totally inadequate. In terms of funding, they either reject or underfinance essential programs, such as: accelerated public works, public service employment, aid to the cities, housing, railbed repair, and health insurance for the unemployed.

Congress must stop ignoring the need to restore the nation to a full employment economy. Its members must be told, again and again, that putting America back to work and restoring a healthy economy must be their main goal.

Portuguese Election Results Mask Dire Threat to Freedom

By John P. Roche

AGAINST THE BACKGROUND of chaos in the Far East, the results of the Portuguese elections were very cheering. With the Communists receiving only one-eighth of the vote, and the two democratic left parties— the Socialists and the Popular Democrats—getting almost two-thirds, it might seem as though our concern about Portugal was vastly exaggerated. The difficulty with this optimism is that the assembly elected is totally without power. Its task is to draw up a constitution providing for the election of a future government. In the meantime, as Premier Vasco Goncalves emphasized on the morning after, the Armed Forces Movement (AFM) is going to run the store.

The AFM appears to have learned one of the "lessons of Chile": it has been vigorously purging the officer corps of "non-progressive" elements. No serious commentator doubts that the attempted coup by "the Spinola clique"—which led to the flight and exile in Brazil of the former President and a number of his close associates—was a Communist-sponsored setup. Spinola, who led the revolution against the old dictatorship, was too dangerous a rallying point for anti-Communists in the military to be left on the loose. Goncalves, the real authority in the nation, has been working hand in glove with the veteran Communist Alvaro Cunhal, going so far as to ban the Christian Democratic Party and the Maoists from participating in the election and forcing the establishment of a single national trade union dominated by the Communists.

Despite the election returns, then, Portugal is run by a left-wing military junta. Indeed, Goncalves also made it clear that if the democratic majority in the constituent assembly decided it should take over the country from the AFM, they (that is, the two-thirds) would be suppressed. (As a sidenote, if this pronouncement had come from Greek Colonels or Chile's General Pinochet, we could anticipate demonstrations outside the White House. But apparently a pro-Communist military junta is by definition not a "brutal, repressive dictatorship.")

If what happened in post-World War II Hungary and Czechoslovakia is any precedent, what we can anticipate is the installation of the salami slicer. True, the Soviet army is not at hand to prevent unfortunate experiments in democracy such as the 1968 "Prague Spring," but that can be cancelled out if the Communists achieve total control of the Portuguese armed forces. The salami slicer (a term attributed to the Hungarian Communist Rakosi) is used to cut down, little by little, the cohesion of the democratic bloc. We have seen one instance already in the suppression of the Christian Democrats on the spurious ground that they were involved in the Spinola non-coup.

THE PRIME TARGET is the Socialist party, led by Mario Soares, which got over 37 percent of the votes. Soares, who has been walking a high wire, is now automatically caught in an enfilade: the democratic forces, both in his party and in the Popular Democrats, are bound to call for a diminishment of military power. If, however, he takes the lead in this demand, three things are likely to happen: First, the Communists will accuse the Socialists of deserting the working class to collaborate with the "bourgeois" Popular Democrats. Second, the Communist-dominated national workers' syndicate will call on the military to prevent a "sell-out to the western imperialists," that is, NATO. And third, the Communists will infiltrate the Socialist party and organize an anti-Soares split.

If, however, Soares refuses to take the leadership in the democratization of Portugal, his standing with the democratic majority will collapse. One can expect some remarkable statements from that poor man over the next few months as he tacks upwind. He has already let fly with an Aesopian attack on the AFM, disguised as an assault on the Communists for wanting to establish "centralization without democracy." Next week he will probably compensate by, say, calling for a total Portuguese disengagement from NATO.

In short, Portuguese democracy is in dire jeopardy, and the sad truth is we can do very little to help. There is, of course, no NATO equivalent of the Brezhnev Doctrine, and any American efforts to aid Portuguese democracy would, in the present climate of opinion, strengthen the hand of the AFM. This seems to be one of those occasions when the only thing on the shelf worth buying is time.

Protection for Workers:

Seniority Principles Affirmed As Basic to Labor Movement

Excerpts from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on Seniority and Layoffs, Washington, D.C., May 6, 1975.

THE SENIORITY SYSTEM is a cornerstone of the American labor movement. It is the worker's answer to arbitrary decisions by management in determining employment rights and promotion priorities.

Because seniority translates length of service into a vested right, it is a tangible asset for any worker. Next to the union card itself, seniority is a worker's most valued possession. Seniority is a contractual right, and, as such, is indivisible.

Today, with unemployment mounting daily, the seniority system is under attack, not for what it does but for what it does not do. The seniority system is being blamed for social conditions, particularly discrimination in hiring, that it did not cause.

In an effort to limit the economic consequences of the downturn, some unions have negotiated collective bargaining provisions providing incentives for senior employes who wish to do so to elect layoff or early retirement, thereby providing work opportunities for junior employes. Some unions, through voluntary agreements, reached through collective bargaining, have provided for the sharing of reduced work by all employes in the unit during a temporary emergency period, in preference to laying off any, when that course maximized the economic-yield to the group as a whole.

As contrasted with these voluntary solutions there have been calls for the destruction of the seniority system and the creation of "phantom seniority" or the imposition of forced work sharing. Some federal, state and local agencies have suggested their readiness to prescribe regulations for guidelines for such programs.

Those who tout "phantom seniority" for an unidentified class or group of workers or prospective workers would place upon other workers the full burden of correcting the effects of discrimination they did not cause.

Those who tout forced work-sharing without regard to seniority would visit the full cost of economic recession upon employes, with the result that workers as a group would receive a smaller share of the national product than they enjoy even under the less than adequate programs presently in force.

There may be particular situations in which work-sharing may maximize the economic yield to the workforce, but that fact simply highlights the importance of leaving the decision as to work-sharing a voluntary one, to be adopted when the parties most familiar with its potential impact on a particular workplace see it as the most rational solution.

In some quarters, work-sharing has been championed as a device to prevent the disproportionate layoff of minority employes. Those who make this contention obviously are not familiar with the patterns of minority employment in American industries. In most American industries substantial numbers of minority employes have been employed—and those employes thus have a substantial investment in the utilization of plant seniority as the determinant of who will remain at work during periods of economic downturn. According to Commissioner of Labor Statistics Julius Shiskin, the best evidence available is that white male workers and black male workers have been hit by layoffs about the same in the current recession, and that men have been hit harder by layoffs than women. Thus, work-sharing harms the interest of all workers equally.

THE AMERICAN WORKERS, regardless of race, do not think it inequitable that the more senior workers are protected in times of layoff, nor would they think it equitable that those workers be forced to surrender a portion of work to junior employes whose needs may be less, whose opportunities for securing other employment are greater, and whose investment of labor in the enterprise has been shorter.

Trade unions are made up of young and old, men and women, whites, blacks and other minorities. One of the principles which all these groups and indeed most Americans have accepted is that the longer service employe has priority in job allocation. Forced work-sharing violates that principle. It is nothing more than "poverty sharing." By forcing all workers to share the brunt of economic downturn, work-sharing inevitably would tear apart the solidarity necessary to achieve real economic gains for all workers.

In sum, unemployment is a social problem, just like discrimination. Both must be corrected; it is not an either-or proposition.

Therefore, we reject the spurious notion that the seniority system must be destroyed just when it is needed most to protect all workers, without regard to race or sex. The AFL-CIO will continue to support every valid effort to protect workers threatened by the current recession while opposing any and all efforts to weaken or dilute the seniority system —be it by legislative action, court decision or administrative fiat.

We repeat what we have often said: Full employment is the only solution to unemployment and to discrimination. And we will not stand idly by while a few would pit worker against worker for the right to be employed.

Violations Increase:

Stiffer Enforcement Pressed To Curb Cheating on Wages

VIOLATIONS of the federal Wage & Hour Law have mushroomed to a $100 million a year pace as the recession has deepened, Service Employees Economist Rudolph Oswald declared in a network radio interview.

Most often, he stressed, the victims are the nation's lowest-paid workers—those who are hurt most when "unscrupulous employers cut corners" on the minimum wage and overtime rates spelled out by law. He said that the sharp jump of violations in the past year, up more than 17 percent over a year ago, is largely due to a growing number of employers trying to hedge against the recession and business slump by shortchanging their employes on wages due.

The way to end this "robbery from workers," which has persisted since the Fair Labor Standards Act became law in 1938, is full enforcement and more than just slap-on-the-wrist fines and orders to simply pay the wages that should have been paid all along, Oswald said. Oswald, who is research director for the SEIU, was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference.

Oswald said that while wage-cheating crops up in all types and sizes of industries and establishments, it is most common in unorganized job situations, where the workers have no union to represent them. He said that many non-union workers are afraid of being fired if they complain about not being paid the full wage due them, so they don't even report the shortages to the Labor Dept. But, he emphasized, the law provides that the names of complainants be held in confidence, and workers who have been shortchanged shouldn't hesitate to report those violations.

Oswald also scored the attempt by some agricultural interests to loosen the child labor law so that children under the age of 12 can be hired as farm workers. He warned that such relaxation could revive the exploitation of young children this country abolished generations ago. And, he added, the idea makes little sense when there is so much unemployment that older workers can't even find jobs.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE 13TH ANNUAL Manpower Report of the President may not provide the answers to the current economic crisis but it does set the record straight on the past.

The most recent Manpower Report of the President should be required reading for those who seek to downgrade the New Deal programs. It notes, for example, that "by far the most important public hiring program of the 1930s, in both numbers employed and impact on later programs, was the Work Progress (later Work Project) Administration (WPA)."

The WPA employed more than 3 million workers at its peak in 1936, at a time when more than 9 million were out of work, and averaged about $1.4 billion annually in wage payments from 1935 until its termination in 1943.

Another vital New Deal program was the Public Works Administration (PWA) which concentrated on accelerating federal spending for the construction of public facilities on the assumption that increased spending would generate jobs in the private sector. It placed an emphasis on capital-intensive construction to create the maximum number of jobs through direct employment.

It should be understood that WPA was enacted prior to unemployment insurance and most unemployed and their families survived through degrading relief rolls. WPA sought to give unemployed workers temporary jobs.

The Manpower Report continues:

"State, local and federal government agencies initiated and implemented projects which ran an imaginative gamut from bridge building to the writing of a famous series of state guidebooks.

"Although there were other aims, such as maintaining or developing employes' skills and accomplishing worthwhile public services, they were less important than income maintenance."

This led to charges of "leaf-raking" or "make work" but the Manpower Report lists what WPA workers actually accomplished over a span of eight years:

- Built 651,000 miles of roads.
- Built 16,000 water and sewer systems.
- Erected 2,300 stadiums.
- Renovated 85,000 public buildings.

"Although the efficiency of some of the project operations may be faulted," the report says, "there can be no doubt of the real and substantial accomplishments of WPA."

It noted that criticism has been heaped on WPA for the size of the program in relation to the numbers of unemployed. However, in the absence of an unemployment insurance program, the only other answer would be to provide a job for every family in need. As it was, no more than 25 to 35 percent of the unemployed held WPA jobs at one time.

THE WHOLE QUESTION of hiring priorities was also a controversial point in the WPA. In general, the program focused on previously-employed family heads certified as needy. A total of 97 percent of those hired in 1939 had previous private-sector jobs. Youths under 18 were not hired because they were eligible for other programs.

Another controversial issue in WPA was the wage scale. Since the program was intended as temporary work to replace relief payments, wages obviously had to be set above the dole. However, it was also set below the prevailing wage on the theory it would encourage workers to leave public payrolls for private sector jobs.

In summing up, the Manpower Report observed:

"Although WPA and the other New Deal job-creation efforts designed to combat massive unemployment lacked such 'modern' program components as affirmative action, human resource development, and job restructuring, they nevertheless raised the still-critical issues of scale, permanence, hiring priorities, wage levels and training emphasis."

WAGE CHISELING employers who cheat on the wage-hour law rob workers of more than $100 million a year, Service Employees Research Director Rudolph Oswald, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Inflation, Recession Combine To Boost Bankruptcy Rate

By Sidney Margolius

WITH MANY FAMILIES pressed by record living costs, big debts, inflation-caused higher tax brackets and sometimes work cutbacks, bankruptcies are headed this year for a new high.

For 1975, bankruptcies are expected to total 235,000, reports Robert Gibson, President of the National Foundation for Consumer Credit. This compares with 195,000 last year and 207,000 in the previous high year of 1967.

About 90 percent of all bankruptcies are personal bankruptcies and the rest are business.

The increase this year represents a startling jump of about 23 percent on top of the 8 percent jump in 1974. Nor does the bankruptcy figure include the many near-bankrupt situations such as wage garnishees. My own estimate is that there could be several million garnishees a year in the United States.

This spring many working families must thread a narrow path between high living costs and unemployment threats, taking care to avoid repossessions of valuable possessions and even loss of homes. If threatened by repossession, keep in mind that you may be liable for a deficiency judgment for the balance on the debt plus repossession costs, even though you also lose whatever you paid on the goods. You may be able to cut your loss if you can arrange a private sale of the merchandise.

At least some help in fighting the inflation in your own home is available from the more stable prices of food at this time, if you plan and shop knowledgeably. In general, note that prices of some fresh foods currently have subsided, but tags on many canned and processed foods are still high. The processed foods lagged behind on the way up but now are lagging on the way down. As one of many examples, fresh potatoes dropped from 18 cents a pound a year ago to 12 cents now. But frozen French fries went down only three cents for a 24-ounce package from 76 cents to 73 cents, according to one survey. Note that you pay for the frozen French fries at the rate of 50 cents a pound.

Clothing prices also have stabilized and some even have come down this spring, especially synthetics such as polyester and nylon. Shoes, however, remain a cost problem. For many families shoes actually are the largest part of the clothing expense, and usually purchases cannot be postponed, especially for children.

Many families now try to beat the price of kids' shoes by buying sneakers. Some of the highly-styled, brand-name sneakers can cost $8-$10 and even as much as $20, especially if they have a tieup with a famous basketball star. It's revealing to see that sneakers have gone up about twice as fast as shoes this year.

Undoubtedly, you've observed the wide difference in prices between national brands sold by specialty shoe shops and standard department stores and shoes sold by chains and mass-merchandising or discount stores. The mass stores often are a little cheaper than the chain stores even though some well-known chains themselves operate the shoe departments in the discount stores. Another source for reductions in shoes is outlet stores, sometimes located at factories. Such stores are not available in all areas, but usually most large towns have one or two.

THE MAIN REASON for the difference is cost between the specialty shops and department stores on one hand, and the chains and discount stores on the other, is not only the quality of materials and construction, but also the care in fitting. The more expensive stores take more care and also carry a wide range of sizes and lasts (shapes). The cut-rate chain stores do not always have as experienced fitters or take as much time, and in the discount stores you may have to do the fitting mainly yourself or with only a little guidance from the few salespersons available.

But beware of cheap imported shoes often found in discount stores and some chain stores. These sometimes are made without a last, consisting simply of an upper stitched to a flat synthetic sole. As well as lacking durability, such shoes can be harmful to feet. The best-fitting last often is the so-called "combination last" with snug-fitting heel and broad toe.

Food buying calendar: Relatively low prices of beef have helped keep down prices of chicken and pork. We suggest these best buys in order of descending value: ground beef, smoked pork shoulder, broilers, turkey and chuck roast.

Sometimes Simple Directions Don't Lead from Here to There

By Jane Goodsell

AFFIX KNURLED knob (c) to pinion shaft (K), leaving ⅜" exposed (see Fig. 4, Section III). Insert two strips (F1 and F2) into slots (cd & ef) at right angles to points M & M2, fastening securely with No. 3 staples (chisel pointed) and . . . .

"A small smile lifted one corner of Grayson's mouth. 'But it's perfectly simple, Inspector,' he said. 'It was clear that we had our murderer when he didn't ring the bell when his key didn't fit into the lock. You see, he thought that Claggett had given him back the key to his own apartment, whereas Claggett actually got that key mixed up with the key to Mrs. Autrey's apartment. So when Burns tried the key and found it didn't fit, he realized Claggett's mistake, and he knew that Mrs. Autrey had his key, and that it was only a matter of time before she'd realize what had happened, so naturally he had to kill her before . . . ."

Drug Chain Learns Title Doesn't Make Executive

It takes more than a job title to exempt an "executive" from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, a drug store chain discovered.

A Labor Dept. investigation resulted in a consent court order obligating the Walgreen Co. to pay a total of $425,000 in back wages to 420 workers in six southern states.

The bulk of the violations occurred at stores in Florida, where 249 workers will collect a total of $294,194, and in Tennessee, where payments of $120,302 will go to 150 workers. Payments were also due at stores in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky and Mississippi.

In most cases, the company had not paid overtime rates to persons with such titles as assistant managers or management trainees.

It's the job and its pay scale that determines whether a person is exempt from the overtime pay requirement, not the title. The payments ordered by the court cover wages due since Apr. 1, 1971.

'Society's Outcasts':

Union Study Details Mental Care Scandal

MENTAL PATIENTS by the thousands are being thrown out of institutions and onto the streets to become "society's outcasts," according to a study prepared for the State, County & Municipal Employees.

It paints a "scandalous" picture of a once-accepted policy of "deinstitutionalization" of mental patients being perverted into "a marriage of convenience between state officials who want to cut their budgets and private operators who want to turn a quick buck."

The study, "Deinstitutionalization—Out of Their Beds and Into the Streets" was made for AFSCME by Henry Santiestevan, a former newsman, UAW public relations director and a consultant on social issues for labor, Mexican-American and anti-poverty groups. His report is based on interviews with health care professionals, social workers, investigative reporters and patients themselves.

While the union represents 200,000 health care workers and employes of institutions, its leaders emphasize that protecting patients, not jobs, is the major concern. In fact, AFSCME says it has been relatively successful in protecting jobs in institutions.

In the early 1960s it was found that many of the state-run mental hospitals lacked the facilities and care for patients. President Kennedy proposed a program of community mental health care centers. In 1963, Congress passed a bill with the goal of establishing 2,500 such centers.

But only 626 of the planned 2,500 centers have been funded over the past 11 years. And President Ford last year vetoed a bill calling for more funds for such centers.

Santiestevan in a tour of five states found that hundreds of mental hospitals meanwhile are emptying their beds, turning their patients out into the streets, or "dealing" them off to private nursing homes "which have become one of the greatest scandals of our nation."

His report cites examples in which nursing home owners actually "bid" on patients, coming to hospitals and picking out those they want—usually the least disturbed. The homes then collect federal money for patients. He cites one instance in which a hospital official was discovered to be the owner of a nursing home.

Former California Gov. Ronald Reagan comes in for a scathing attack in the report for a "cynical effort" to close all of his state's mental hospitals. Santiestevan notes that he was thwarted by the legislature after it uncovered widespread exploitation, suicides and crime among released mental patients.

Santiestevan proposes three steps towards "a workable program of decent mental health care"—an end to governmental "bankrolling" of racket nursing homes and board-and-care facilities; a temporary moratorium on discharging mental patients from institutions until plans can be carefully worked out with representatives of health professionals, community groups and unions; and meaningful development of community health centers.

Too many people have "come to view mental patients as bodies with money attached," Santiestevan concludes. "But there is a coalition of conscience that knows that a society is judged by how it treats the most helpless."

At 75th Anniversary Convention:

Legislative, Contract Goals Set by Rail, Airline Clerks

By James M. Shevis

The Railway & Airline Clerks, at their 75th anniversary convention in the nation's capital, tackled a heavy agenda of internal business and set key legislative and collective bargaining goals for the next four years.

The 900 delegates to the union's weeklong convention also re-elected President C. L. Dennis to another four-year term. Dennis was chosen over his only opponent, J. C. Fletcher, by a vote of 878 to 632. The total votes cast were larger than the number of delegates because of a weighted system of voting.

Dennis's election followed early convention action revoking a union rule that had established a 65-year age limit for presidential candidates. Dennis is 66. The weighted vote favoring the rule's repeal was 866 to 675.

D. A. Bobo defeated R. M. Curran for the post of secretary-treasurer. The vote was 868 to 642. Bobo was elected to the office by the union's executive council last January upon the death of D. J. Sullivan.

Delegates also elected 11 vice presidents, three assistant vice presidents and nine members of the board of trustees.

In his keynote address to the delegates, Dennis declared that the union "can be proud of what we have accomplished in the 75 years since a group of courageous men met in that cigar store in Sedalia, Missouri, where BRAC was founded. Just the act of surviving was a great accomplishment in those long hard years.

"Many unions have faltered and died in that period, but BRAC has lived and grown from a dozen men in Sedalia to a family of some 300,000 women and men, working united under the banner of BRAC."

Dennis cautioned, however, that the union still faces many challenges requiring "the same sense of unity that has guided us and shaped our victories in the past."

Boosting benefits to jobless railroaders is one such challenge, he observed. BRAC and other rail unions are seeking quick congressional approval of legislation increasing benefits under the Railroad Unemployment & Sickness Insurance Act.

Under that law, unemployed railroad employes today receive the "ridiculously low" figure of $12.70 a day, or $63.50 per week, he noted. Historically, railroad unemployment compensation has been about 60 percent of the average daily rate, he observed.

"Therefore, based on today's average daily rate," he said, "unemployment compensation should be $30 a day, or $150 a week."

Dennis urged delegates to contact their congressional delegations during their stay in Washington, and ask them to support the pending legislation to improve railroad jobless benefits.

"We must return railroad unemployment compensation to its historic 60-percent relationship, and move benefits up to the $30-a-day range," he declared.

On the collective bargaining front, Dennis expressed determination to update and improve the union's agreement with the nation's major railroads. He insisted that in BRAC's current dispute with the carriers, the union "will not sign a contract that does not adequately protect our members."

Dennis said the railroads so far have offered nothing on job stabilization even though workers currently must have 13 years of seniority to be "protected" employes on some railroads. He said the union would insist on job stabilization agreements that will apply on all carriers.

Any settlement, he said, must also include adequate wage increases, better dental and vacation plans and a cost-of-living escalator clause.

If the union does not like the recommendations of a special presidential board investigating the dispute, Dennis said, "we either can negotiate with management to change them or we can turn them down and then, if we can't reach a settlement, we can strike."

BRAC negotiators plan to meet the three-member presidential panel May 12 to offer rebuttal arguments to management proposals, he reported.

In his remarks to the delegates, Dennis blamed government mismanagement since the union's last quadrennial convention for the "scandalous" joblessness that besets the nation today.

"It was the product of experts and politicians more concerned with profits than with people," he declared. "Its architects were high officials and economists in our government whose eyes are focused on Wall Street, not on Main Street."

Dennis reported that other key legislative goals in the months ahead include enactment of National Health Security and congressional action to outlaw the airline industry's so-called mutual aid pact, under which a struck carrier's costs are underwritten by other airlines.

On the opening day of the convention, the delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada voted overwhelmingly to reaffirm a $5.50 monthly dues increase approved at the union's 1971 convention.

Several members of BRAC Lodge 2151 had challenged the increase, alleging it did not have adequate approval. A settlement was reached in U.S. District Court in Chicago in which both sides agreed that the dues increase would be valid if delegates at the 1975 convention approved it by a two-thirds margin.

The vote to validate the 1971 action was by a ratio of 11 to 1, and brought an end to the lengthy litigation.

Among the speakers at the convention, Senators Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) and Richard Schweiker (R-Pa.) both pledged support for federal aid to rebuild the deteriorating railroad industry.

Hartke is chairman of the Senate Surface Transportation subcommittee. Schweiker is a member of the Senate Transportation subcommittee and of the Labor & Public Welfare Committee.

Hartke also declared his support for the elimination of the mutual aid pact which, he said, "destroys all incentive for an airline company to bargain in good faith with employes, and consequently weakens the industry and eventually the national economy."

"We have to stop MAP by law and I'm going to help you lead that fight," he pledged.

Other speakers on the opening days of the convention included Rep. Barbara Jordan (D-Texas), Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.), Rep. Harold T. Johnson (D-Calif.) and Al Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

CONVENTION DELEGATES attending the 75th anniversary convention of the Railway & Airline Clerks hear President C. L. Dennis tell of the problems and challenges facing the membership. Dennis, who was re-elected to a fourth four-year term, said the most immediate problem was gaining congressional enactment of a bill to increase benefits for jobless railroad workers.

NLRB Remedies Weak When Employers Balk

The increasing number of employers who simply go through the motions of collective bargaining without making an honest effort to reach agreement underscores the need to amend federal labor law to provide stronger enforcement powers and more adequate remedies.

This kind of "surface" bargaining not only denies workers their basic rights under the National Labor Relations Act, but impedes industrial peace, Benjamin M. Shieber declares in the American Federationist magazine.

The disputes and strikes that resulted from the refusal of employers to bargain with their workers led to the enactment of the law in 1935, Shieber notes.

"Today, 40 years after the enactment of the Wagner Act, strikes often follow an employer's use of surface bargaining tactics as employes seek to attain through strikes the right to collective bargaining that is guaranteed them by the act," he observes.

Shieber, a law professor at Louisiana State University, cites a dramatic increase in the number of employers attempting to evade meaningful collective bargaining as disclosed by charges filed with the National Labor Relations Board.

"In 1958, 1,039 such charges were filed with the board, constituting 17.1 percent of all charges filed against employers. By 1972, the number of such charges had risen to 6,023 and constituted 34 percent of all charges against employers.

"Also the number of charges under this section of the law which the board found to have merit rose from 34 percent in 1963 to 42.8 percent in 1974, while the merit factor for all unfair labor practice charges remained in the 31 to 36 percent range."

Surface bargaining has been held an unfair labor practice under section 8(a)(5) of the act which requires employers to bargain in good faith with employe representatives.

Shieber notes that in its first annual report, the NLRB stated that "collective bargaining is something more than the mere meeting of an employer with the representatives of his employes; the essential thing is rather the serious intent to adjust differences and to reach an acceptable common ground."

Through the years, the courts have upheld the NLRB's interpretation that surface bargaining is a violation of the law. But Shieber points out that it is easy for employers to mask surface bargaining because the legal requirements of good faith bargaining are easy to satisfy.

"The NLRB itself has acknowledged that it is difficult to prove that surface bargaining occurred," the author asserts.

"However, the ineffectiveness of present law does not stem merely from the ease with which employers can evade the obligation to bargain in good faith. Even if an employer is held to have engaged in surface bargaining, the remedies now available to the board are inadequate."

Shieber describes that action as ineffective, "because the remedy orders the employer to do nothing more than comply with the legal requirement of good faith bargaining after the employer has intentionally refused to comply with the law for two or more years."

When an employer flagrantly uses the bargaining process to frustrate any agreement, the NLRB orders him to give the union access to the company bulletin board and submit an updated list of workers and their addresses to the union.

The employer also is ordered to reimburse the board and the union for all reasonable expenses in the preparation, presentation and conduct of the NLRB case.

But through all the delays, the employer gains time and saves the additional labor costs that an agreement may entail, Shieber observes.

"What is needed is a remedy that will make collective bargaining effective when bargaining begins, even if that is after an extended delay."

He calls for amendments to section 8(d) of the labor law based on policies developed by the War Labor Board during World War II. This would require, if so requested by either party, the inclusion in any agreement of three key points:

- No employe shall be discharged or otherwise disciplined without just cause.
- Any dispute over the application or interpretation of the agreement shall be settled through arbitration.
- There shall be no strikes or lockouts over disputes involving the application or interpretation of the agreement.

Such amendments would greatly reduce employer surface bargaining and provide improved protection fro workers, he suggests.

Key House Vote on Budget Ceilings

The House on May 1 supported the AFL-CIO position that persons on the social security rolls should receive their full cost-of living increase this summer and federal employes should get the pay adjustment needed to maintain comparability with private industry next fall.

It voted 234-171 for an amendment sponsored by Rep. Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) to the budget resolution which eliminated a proposed 5 percent ceiling on pay and a 7 percent ceiling on social security improvements.

Right votes (R) for the amendment were cast by 217 Democrats and 17 Republecans. Voting wrong (W) were 118 Republicans and 53 Democrats.

Unions Warn Trade Panel:

More Job Losses Foreseen In New Wave of Tariff Cuts

Efforts to revitalize the nation's economy and get the millions of jobless back to work will be further undermined if imports are increased through a new round of tariff reductions being considered by President Ford, organized labor told the International Trade Commission.

Representatives of AFL-CIO affiliates testified at continuing hearings throughout the country that any easing of duties on imports would in effect subsidize foreign competition that erodes jobs and destroys entire industries.

When workers lose their jobs because of imports, the unions observed in their testimony, unemployment rolls increase, less taxes are paid on earned wages, the government must subsidize more food stamps and the nation's imbalance of payments worsens.

The Trade Commission, formerly the U.S. Tariff Commission, is holding the hearings to determine the impact of tariff reductions through trade agreement negotiations under the Trade Act of 1974.

In January, Ford gave the commission a list of 6,800 articles on which he will consider granting concessions in international trade negotiations. This was followed in March by a list of 3,100 items on which the President will consider eliminating duties on imports from so-called developing countries.

The severe economic impact of imports is affecting a wide range of occupations, the union pointed out. Although jobs in manufacturing in the United States have been hit the hardest, the toll in unemployment and underemployment has reached even into the performing arts and entertainment industries.

Among the most adversely affected by U.S. foreign trade policies of the past decade have been the workers in the shoe, textile, auto, apparel and electronics industries.

At hearings conducted in Boston, Presidents George O. Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers and John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers told the commission that the policy of unchecked and unregulated imports has contributed to the frightening decline of the American shoe industry.

"Tariff reductions, tied in with a struggling economy and runaway inflation, could kill it," Mara warned in urging the commission to support no further reductions in U.S. tariffs on imported shoes.

Fecteau said that while there is a definite need for international trade and the elimination of trade barriers, such labor-intensive industries as shoemaking must be protected from the extremely low wages paid abroad.

Sec.-Treas. Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers told the hearing panel in Washington that it is a paradox to even consider a reduction in duties on imported women's and children apparel when the government's official statistics showed that one of every five experienced garment workers in the country was unemployed in March—normally the pre-Easter peak of the spring production season.

Chaikin went on to trace the demise of the U.S. silk scarf industry in the early 1950s because of low-wage imports from Japan. Many domestic scarf makers turned to importing and got rid of their workers. But he noted that as often is the case with fashion merchandise when price debasement kills consumer interest, the market evaporated for the Japanese imports.

Intense domestic competition in the garment industry, coupled with the influx of low-wage imports have also held down earnings of apparel workers, he pointed out. Their wages generally lag behind those of other industrial workers.

Imports have also taken their toll in jobs in the service and entertainment industries, John C. Hall of the Theatrical Stage Employes testified in Washington. He noted that while there has been a severe drop in domestic production of video tape programs and feature films over the past 25 years, imports have increased sharply.

"At present, during a typical week, 40 percent of my union of 70,000 men and women are out of work," Hall reported. "And the same dismal picture prevails for our sister unions engaged in film and tape production."

Hall, an international representative for IATSE, pointed out that the decline in jobs came while there has been a major increase in demand for film which is being filled by foreign production, not domestic producers.

He said the same countries that are restricting entry of U.S.-made films into their markets are bolstering their production, often with American capital, to flood the lucrative and open U.S. market.

Hall noted that video tape imports tripled in the 1967-73 period while film imports rose 10 percent over the past ten years. A portion of the film imports are runaways—productions made abroad by American companies with American capital.

Hall also expressed concern about the impact of foreign-made productions on the nation's culture, stressing that "we are rapidly becoming a 'client' state culturally as well as economically."

"As good clients, we will buy our entertainment, our information, in sum, our culture from others," Hall observed.

At hearings in New York, Sec.-Treas. Lowell Daily of the Furniture Workers submitted a long list of piano plant closings and layoffs of piano craftsmen caused by imports.

He noted that the failure of many domestic piano manufacturers coincided with reductions in tariffs during the 1950s and '60s.

When further tariff cuts were halted on imports of upright pianos for a three-year period in 1970, Daily said the action did give the surviving companies "breathing room," but the remedy came too late for the companies that had failed and workers who lost their highly skilled jobs.

"We feel that the help we received in 1970, and which was successful, did permit the high quality shops to run at a more decent pace and remain in business as competitors to the foreign market—and for this assistance, the government has our gratitude," Daily said.

He pointed out, however, that the assistance was not sufficient for low-cost pianos, and serious layoffs resulted in most piano factories last year. The halt in tariff cuts did not apply to grand pianos, either, he pointed out.

Daily testified on behalf of the seven-union National Piano, Organ & Musical Instruments Council, of which he is director.

DUTY REDUCTIONS on imported apparel would cause additional layoffs in the depressed domestic clothing industry, Sec.-Treas. Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers tells the International Trade Commission. Chaikin was joined at the hearing by ILGWU Research Director Lazare Teper, right.

Jobless Aid 'Triggers' Called Dismal Failure

The Administration and the AFL-CIO differed on whether a complex system of "triggers" keyed to national and local unemployment rates is needed to continue an emergency program of jobless benefits beyond the maximum provided under permanent legislation.

AFL-CIO Social Security Directory Bert Seidman noted that the various off-and-on triggers that Congress had written into extended benefits programs have had to be revised 10 times in the past five years.

He described the concept as "a dismal failure" in testimony before the unemployment compensation subcommittee of the House Ways & Means Committee.

Earlier, Assistant Sec. of Labor William Kolberg had proposed to replace expiring temporary legislation with a revised program that would enable persons whose last job had been covered by state unemployment compensation programs to draw up to 65 weeks of benefits through 1976 and those whose last jobs had not been covered to collect up to 39 weeks of payments.

The duration of extended benefits would be cut back or eliminated if the rate of insured unemployment fell below specified national or local levels.

Seidman saw no need for an elaborate system of statistical triggers in view of the expected long duration of the unemployment crisis.

He urged simple legislation that would provide every wage and salary worker with entitlement to at least 65 weeks of unemployment compensation—with benefits beyond the regular jobless compensation program federally financed.

"The 65-week entitlement should remain in effect until the nation is no longer plagued by large-scale unemployment," Seidman said.

He reiterated also the AFL-CIO's testimony two weeks ago before the same subcommittee urging a permanent overhaul of the nation's "outmoded and fragmented" unemployment compensation system.

Bricklayers Get New Training Pact

The Bricklayers received a new Labor Dept. contract to provide pre-apprenticeship training for 300 disadvantaged workers and to upgrade the skills of 75 qualified craftsmen in 20 states.

Fifteen training opportunities will go to each of the 20 states under the one-year, $561,742 contract. The states are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Mexico, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Fire Fighters Present News Media Awards

Thirty-three prizes and awards were presented to reporters, photographers and newscasters among the more than 350 entries in the Fire Fighters' 1975 media contest.

The IAFF competition is held annually to recognize members of the news media who depict the professionalism and hazards of fire fighting in the United States and Canada through their stories, pictures and commentary.

First prize winners in each of six categories received $500 and plaques, while second place winners received $250 and certificates. Twenty other entrants were given citations of honorable mention and one special citation award also was made.

IAFF President W. Howard McClennan said in commenting on the awards he was highly gratified at the news media awareness of the difficulties and complexities of fire fighting.

"The fact that we had a record number of entries—more than 350—in this year's contest shows that we are getting our message across to the press and the electronic media, and through them, to the public we protect from disaster by fire," he noted.

The entries were submitted by IAFF affiliated locals. This year's judges were Albert J. Zack, AFL-CIO director of public relations; Alan Adams, a Washington writer, and James Weber, a union magazine editor with Merkle Press, Inc.

The top prize winners in the six major categories are:

- Brian Kates, Jennie Tritten and Dave Hartley of the Yonkers (N.Y.) Herald Statesman for a series of news and feature stories and editorials that explained and supported building code improvements fostered by Yonkers fire fighters. The entry was submitted by IAFF Local 628 for newspapers of less than 100,000 circulation.
- Jerry Belcher of the Los Angeles Times for what the judges describe as one of the best-written accounts of the problems and dangers fire fighters face on the job. Local 288 submitted the entry for newspapers of more than 100,000 circulation.
- Gary L. Fait of the Flint (Mich.) Suburban News for a news photo showing fire fighters scrambling for safety as a fiery wall collapses. Local 352 submitted the entry for newspapers of less than 100,000.
- James P. Feso of the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press for a photo of a fire fighter administering mouth-to-mouth resuscitation to an infant atop a ladder during an apartment fire. The entry was submitted by Local 21 for newspapers of more than 100,000 circulation.
- Roy Sova and Beverly Oxley of television station WBNG in Binghamton, N.Y., for a series of programs on the complex problems of fire prevention and fire fighting in urban areas. Local 729 submitted the entry.
- Jim Miller of radio station WEST in Easton, Pa., for a graphic account of how political pressure can interfere with the proper operation of a fire department. Local 713 submitted the entry.

The judges also awarded a special citation to Tom Kelly of the Associated Press for outstanding comprehensive journalistic coverage of a night club fire in Port Chester, N.Y.

Council Issues Disputes Plan Interpretation

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has adopted the following interpretation of the federation's Internal Disputes Plan as it pertains to the finding of violations by the impartial umpire:

"It is the opinion of the Executive Council that where the conduct of the offending union is found to have constituted a substantive violation of Article XX, a mere offer to discontinue that conduct or to rectify the past wrong is not sufficient to avoid a formal determination of the violation by the impartial umpire.

"In the absence of such a formal finding that the offending party had violated Article XX, the complaining union is left without any ability to require compliance with the principles of Article XX. Consequently, where there is sufficient evidence of a substantive violation to enable the impartial umpire to make a finding of a formal violation, he is required to do so."

The interpretation grew out of a case involving two AFL-CIO affiliates seeking to represent public sector workers in Ohio.

Filibuster Odds Shift:

Senate Takes Up Consumer Voice Bill

A labor-supported bill establishing an independent federal agency to represent consumer interests advanced to the Senate floor, and opponents appeared to be running out of ways to block it.

During the past two Congresses—last year and in 1972—similar bills were talked to death. The Senate was unable to muster the two-thirds vote then needed to break a filibuster.

This year, new Senate rules make it somewhat easier to limit debate and several diehard opponents of the past are no longer in Congress. If the rule allowing 60 senators to end debate had been in effect last year, the filibuster would have been broken. An early cloture vote is planned to head off a filibuster this year.

Opponents are expected to try a tactic that came within one vote of winning in the Senate Commerce Committee—adding an amendment that would drain support from the bill by threatening to disrupt the whole machinery of union-management relations.

The Senate bill would allow the consumer advocacy agency to intervene before most government regulatory bodies on a broad range of issues. But labor-management issues would be excluded, and the agency would have no authority to intervene in actions of the National Labor Relations Board, the National Mediation Board or in proceedings affecting wages or working conditions.

Consumer groups are allied with the AFL-CIO in opposing the anti-labor maneuver. But the battle is expected to be re-fought on the Senate floor.

The margin of Senate passage is likely to determine the eventual fate of the legislation. President Ford, like President Nixon before him, has indicated he will veto the bill in its present form—or in virtually any shape that still has teeth in it.

In other congressional developments:

- The House prepared to act on a labor-supported bill that would bar federal savings and loan associations from offering home mortgage loans at variable interest rates that would rise or fall with fluctuations in the market price.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote House members that variable rates would aggravate inflation by requiring increases in mortagage payments at the time when a homeowner's income is being eroded by other price hikes.

- There appeared to be growing bipartisan support for President Ford's request for some $500 million in resettlement aid for the Vietnamese refugees. House Speaker Carl Albert's comment was that "we've spent billions on the war and I think we can spend a little more on humanitarian aid."
- The Senate Commerce Committee approved a bill that would partially remove controls on natural gas—thus sending prices substantially higher—but stop short of the full decontrol sought by big producers and the Administration. A major floor fight over the legislation is likely next month, when it is expected to reach the Senate floor.
- The Senate voted to continue the Council on Wage & Price Stability, a token remnant of the era of controls, until June 30, 1976. It approved an amendment giving the council authority to subpoena price data from business firms. The legislation does not authorize any resumption of wage-price controls.
- The House voted final approval of federal strip-mining legislation similar to a bill President Ford vetoed last December. The 293-115 vote is more than the two-thirds margin that would be needed to override a new veto.

Handicapped Workers Hard Hit By Nation's Economic Downturn

Handicapped Americans face difficulty enough finding work in good times but in the current recession the obstacles are almost overwhelming, the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped declared.

"National priorities tend to affect the handicapped adversely," the committee notes in a new study, The Impact of Unemployment on Handicapped People. "Simply, handicapped people are not a national priority, particularly not in a time of economic crisis."

The study was prepared by an advisory committee that included Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Frank Fernbach, assistant to Steelworkers President I.W. Abel.

The study quotes a Los Angeles vocational rehabilitation official who observes that handicapped workers are being hit hard by employers "consolidating bodies."

"In a good economy, the employer is willing to break a job up. He'll give out parts that can be done, say, standing up, parts that can be done sitting down—more people fall heir to more segments of a job.

"When a recession hits, they stop doing that. They don't parcel out. They don't use workshop people they've used before. They won't use mentally retarded people because they won't use anybody who may not be able to stand up under pressure."

Another California vocational rehabilitation official sums it up this way:

"Today's employer wants the best labor he can get for the least money. It's practically a begging situation for a handicapped person to find a job in a labor market like this."

Handicapped workers are suffering in other ways in today's shrinking labor market. Because funds for sheltered workshops and vocational training programs are running dry, handicapped persons are being turned away from training in basic job skills.

"Handicapped people are slipping out of the job market permanently," the study concludes. "Still other handicapped people who have acquired some skills will be unable to use them because of the lack of entry-level jobs."

In a tight job market, disabled people need more than one skill to hold onto their jobs, the study notes. As a rehabilitation official in Detroit observed, "only those handicapped can hang on that can do at least two or three different jobs."

Among its recommendations, the committee urged that sheltered workshops, small and large, should receive guaranteed contracts from the government sufficient to insure a minimal level of operation.

Another recommendation noted that any government effort to assist the unemployed should designate handicapped people as a specific priority.

The study was released during the 28th annual meeting of the presidential committee in Washington. Theme of the meeting, attended by 3,500 delegates from across the nation, was "affirmative action for disabled people."

AFL-CIO Vice President Hunter P. Wharton, a member of the President's committee, noted that programs for the handicapped and the disadvantaged are an important part of the federation's program to meet the current emergency and restore stability to the economy.

"Job-creation programs are the most important part of all," he declared. "Unless there are jobs for everyone who is able and willing to work, the problems of rehabilitation will never be fully solved, and there will be only partial solutions to the problems of the handicapped."

The meeting was highlighted by presentation of awards to the winners of the 1975 "Ability Counts" high school essay contest sponsored each year by the committee. State winners in the competition were guests of the AFL-CIO at a luncheon and their trip to Washington was underwritten by AFL-CIO central bodies in their states.

The five top essayists shared a total of $3,750 in prizes donated by the Disabled American Veterans. Ned Garry of Brooklyn, N.Y., won first prize of $1,500. Other winners were Barbara, Pellowski, Grand Forks, N.D., $900; Stacy McKissack, Little Rock, Ark.; Anna Maria Ochoa, Yuma, Ariz., $450, and Catherine Mary Andronik, New Britain, Conn., $300.

House Vote Opposes Ford's Ceiling On Social Security, Federal Pay Rise

The House went on record for tax reform and against arbitrary ceilings on cost-of-living adjustments for persons drawing social security benefits and on comparability pay raises for government workers.

A 234-171 vote incorporated these expressions into a resolution setting spending and revenue targets for the coming fiscal year.

The final shape of the resolution proved even more controversial and was adopted by a narrow 200-196 margin. Most who voted against it considered the spending ceilings too high, but they were joined by a sprinkling of liberals who denounced the budget target as too low, even though it was a bit above the Senate-passed resolution.

In drawing up its revenue and spending projections, the House Budget Committee went along with President Ford's request that the pay raise government workers are due next October be limited to 5 percent — even though a higher amount would be required to comply with the law pegging their pay to comparable jobs in private industry.

Ford also has asked a 5 percent "cap" on the cost-of-living adjustment due social security beneficiaries in July—a figure that will be 8 percent unless Congress votes to curtail it.

The Budget Committee had adopted a compromise 7 percent figure for the social security increase in its spending assumptions, but the amendment sponsored by House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill (Mass.) wiped out any curtailment.

To reinforce the point, the Senate several days later as an amendment to an unrelated bill expressed its opposition to any ceiling on social security cost-of-living increases.

The two actions virtually assure that Congress will not curtail the social security adjustment.

The issue of government pay probably won't be faced until next fall. Then, if the President proposes to change or disregard the comparability salary raise a panel determines is due federal employes, either the House or Senate can block the President by a resolution of disapproval.

As for tax reform, the amendment adopted by the House set a target of $3 billion in added revenue to be achieved by closing tax loopholes. The provision, sponsored by Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), was added to the O'Neill amendment by a 277-128 vote.

It had the effect of reducing the estimated budget deficit in the House-passed bill to $70 billion.

In spending totals, a House-Senate conference committee will have the job of reconciling the Senate-passed target of $365 billion in outlays and the House-passed figure of $368.2 billion.

Inflation Pushes Up Poverty Guideline

The official government poverty-level guideline has been adjusted upwards from $4,550 to $5,050 for a four-person family living in a non-farm area in the continental United States, the Labor Dept. announced.

The $550 increase reflects the rise in the consumer price index over the past year. The guideline is used by the government in determining eligibility for jobs and training opportunities for persons classified as economically disadvantaged, unemployed or underemployed.

A "single-person" family would qualify as poor under the revised guidelines if income were below $2,590. That ceiling is $260 higher than a year ago.

Bills to Bolster Economy Clear Key Hurdles on Hill

Meany Calls Deficit Fear 'Appalling'

The AFL-CIO sought to add the weight of public opinion to its efforts to turn Congress and the Ford Administration away from an economic path leading to at least four more years of high unemployment.

Labor's message—expressed in hard-hitting congressional testimony by AFL-CIO President George Meany and in newspaper advertisements in eight cities—was that jobs represent "the only solution" to America's economic ailments.

Meany told a panel of the Joint Economic Committee that current levels of unemployment "tear at the fabric" of American society. He said the nation cannot and "will not tolerate" its continuance.

The newspaper advertisement called on Americans to write their senators and representatives that it is time to put America back to work and job-stimulating programs are the only answer. (Text on Page 6.)

It deplored the 64-29 vote in the Senate on Apr. 30 against raising the budget ceiling to finance even a segment of the needed programs.

Meany termed it "appalling" that so many members of Congress seem to have been "hypnotized or scared" by the Administration's focus on the alleged horrors of letting the budget deficit rise above an arbitrary ceiling.

That's "foolish thinking," he contended. Spending to create jobs means increased spending power, reduced unemployment payments and welfare costs, higher sales and investment for business, increased tax receipts—"all the bench marks of an economy rapidly moving to full employment and prosperity."

By contrast, he warned, continued high unemployment "will mean continuing large budget deficits, continued hardship for workers and their families, continued recession."

The budget guideline set by Congress established a spending ceiling of $367 billion, a compromise between the higher House and lower Senate versions. It estimates a $68.8 billion deficit, above the $60 billion "line" that President Ford sought to draw. The deficit estimate assumes that Congress will enact tax reforms that will bring in an additional $1 billion in revenue.

Both Meany's testimony and the newspaper advertisement stressed the key relationship of the publicly-held national debt to the nation's

Emergency Funds, Housing Aid Advance

Significant elements of the AFL-CIO's action program for economic recovery were included in bills that moved closer to enactment on a crowded congressional agenda.

The House voted final approval to an emergency $5.3 billion appropriation intended to be spent quickly on job-creating programs.

As cleared by a House-Senate conference committee, the Emergency Employment Appropriations Act carries $1.6 billion for additional funding of public service jobs, $458 million for summer jobs for youth programs and large sums for public works programs and an assortment of federal construction and repair projects.

Senate approval is expected quickly, sending the measure to the White House where it may face a presidential veto. The House passed the fund bill by a 293-109 vote, more than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon (D-Tex.), regarded as a fiscal conservative, spoke for the bill as a needed job-creating measure. In a single year, he noted, the unemployment rate has soared from 5 percent to 8.9 percent.

The Senate had added to the bill a $700 million appropriation for repair of railway roadbeds and track. The House conferees had balked at this because the required authorizing legislation had not yet cleared Congress. On the House floor, Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.) sought to add $200 million for roadbeds on a contingency basis—to be available as soon as authorizing legislation was passed.

NLRB Sets Health Unit Guidelines

The National Labor Relations Board has issued landmark guidelines for organizing workers in the private health-care field.

In eight split decisions, the NLRB defined what it considers to be proper bargaining units in nonprofit and private health-care institutions.

The board's decisions, a number of which were reached upon review of regional NLRB rulings, followed arguments early this year on the types of employes who may appropriately be grouped for collective bargaining in private health-care institutions.

The cases stem from the 1974 amendments to the National Labor Relations Act which extended its coverage and protection to workers at nonprofit hospitals and placed all private health care institutions under NLRB's statutory jurisdiction. Public health-care facilities continue to remain outside the

Filibuster Crushed:

Consumer Agency Approved by Senate

By David L. Perlman

The Senate crushed a filibuster and passed a labor-supported bill to establish an independent agency that would speak up for consumers before most of the federal government's regulatory agencies.

Before limiting debate, the Senate rejected an amendment that could have injected the new Agency for Consumer Advocacy into the full range of labor-management relations, including proceedings before the NLRB.

Over the past four years, the Senate had tried seven times without success to muster the two-thirds vote then required to close debate. This year, under new Senate rules, only 60 votes were needed—three-fifths of the full membership of the Senate. The actual count was big enough to carry easily even under the old rules—71 votes for cloture to 27 opposed.

It came in response to this question:

"Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on S. 200, a bill to establish an independent consumer agency to protect and serve the interests of consumers, shall be brought to a close?"

The Senate's answer was a resounding "yes."

Final passage, by a 61-28 vote, came two days later.

Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.) sought to eliminate completely the section of the bill that bars the agency from intervening in the labor relations field.

His amendment, strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO, was beaten on a 52-36 vote. (Rollcall on Page 7)

Weicker's argument in effect was

Unions Attack Rules To Cut Pay Standard

The Labor Dept. was put on notice that it will be subverting the intent of Congress if it puts into effect regulations that would give firms paying substandard wages and benefits a competitive edge in bidding on government service contracts.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee that has been holding oversight hearings on the Service Contracts Act, expressed outrage that "over-zealous cost-cutters" were trying to chip away at a law intended to protect labor standards.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and representatives of unions representing workers employed by private firms that furnish services to government agencies sharply challenged the attempt to weaken wage standards.

The unions and the House subcommittee consider the proposed new regulations a violation of of 1972 amendment which was intended to prevent prevailing wage standards from becoming a perpetual wage freeze.

Trade Hearings Push Need for Safeguards

Development of a fair and responsible foreign trade policy that safeguards American workers' jobs from eradication by imports is essential to the nation's economy, AFL-CIO affiliates told the International Trade Commission in a series of hearings across the country.

Labor representatives said that trade adjustment assistance for workers who lose their jobs to low-wage imports is no more a solution to faulty trade policy than unemployment compensation is to those who lose their jobs in the recession because of ill-advised domestic economic programs.

Neither does the export of American technology and vital resources solve the deficit in the nation's balance of payments, they stressed.

The commission, a government agency, has been conducting the hearings since February to determine the economic impact of additional tariff cuts that are being considered by the Ford Administration in coming trade agreement negotiations.

At hearings in Pittsburgh, President I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers declared that the USWA is flatly opposed to any tariff reductions authorized under the Trade Act of 1974.

Abel said that each ton of foreign steel unloaded in the United States represents lost job opportu-

House Panel, Unions Denounce Move to Undercut Pay Standard

The original law, passed in 1965 at labor's urging, was regarded as equivalent to the Davis-Bacon Act in federally-financed construction —and assurance that firms would not get contracts on the basis of paying workers less than the going rate.

In 1972, after unions made a strong case at congressional hearings, the law was amended so that prevailing rates used as a basis for bids on contracts would reflect future increases due under collective bargaining agreements with the firm currently holding the contract. Otherwise, a new firm would win the contract by bidding at the old wage rate—and the workers doing the work would either be out of a job or forced to pass up a pay raise.

The proposed changes in regulations that touched off the current hearings were developed by an all-management inter-agency task force.

Biemiller, accompanied by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn, stressed the "secrecy" with which the inter-agency group had developed its proposals.

"Organized labor did not participate in any of the study papers produced by this inter-agency group," he said. "We were not given any opportunity to comment on the finished papers the group produced, nor were we given any opportunity to consider or comment on the proposed regulations prior to their publication in the Federal Register."

Among the unions that testified in opposition to the proposed regulations were the Laborers, Service Employees, AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, National Maritime Union, Transport Workers and Teamsters.

A report from the House subcommittee staff revealed that both the Solicitor of Labor, William J. Kilberg, and the executive assistant to the Secretary of Labor, Thomas M. Phelan, had written memos declaring that portions of the proposed regulations are "contrary to the express terms of the act and its legislative history."

The department's defense has been that the proposals to change regulations were merely an effort to invite comment on the issues.

Thompson told the Labor Dept. witnesses that he was "genuinely angry" and "absolutely determined that this course of action will not prevail."

He said the inter-agency group that drew up the regulations had focused entirely on cost-cutting "and no attention that I can see was paid to the business of protecting labor standards, which is what the Service Contract Act is all about."

The subcommittee's ranking Republican member, Rep. John M. Ashbrook (Ohio), said he was in "100 percent agreement" with Thompson.

Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), who sponsored the original law, termed the proposed changes "a damned outrage."

Other members concurred and Thompson sent word back to the Labor Dept. that "there is an obvious consensus of this subcommittee and I am certain it would be reflected virtually unanimously in the full committee" that the proposed regulations should be withdrawn.

The proposed regulations would apply wage standards embodied in collective bargaining agreements only to work performed at the same locality. They would not be binding if the contractor performed the work elsewhere. They would allow a firm with a collective bargaining agreement lower than the area prevailing rate to underbid the firm holding the contract and paying a higher rate. And they would set time limits that would in many cases prohibit recently-negotiated collective bargaining agreements from being used in determining wage standards.

All of these proposed changes, Biemiller testified, are "very serious and dangerous abridgements of the rights of service employes." He said the AFL-CIO "feels very strongly that the Dept. of Labor should withdraw these regulations."

Major Gains Set in National Airlines Pact

The Air Line Employees Association, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots, ratified a new 26-month contract with National Airlines that provides pay increases averaging 24 percent for some 3,200 ground-service personnel.

The agreement, approved by a 3,114 to 117 vote, also provides marked improvement in fringe benefits, particularly in the area of pensions, ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said. Under the pact, the retirement age was lowered to 62 and a change in vesting nearly triples pensions of employes retiring during the next five years.

Other gains include more liberal medical and dental benefits, an increase in the amount of company-paid life insurance coverage, lowered service requirements for a month's vacation, permission for workers to take their birthday holiday at any time they choose, and extended maternity leave.

A cost-of-living escalator clause also is included in the new contract —a first on National, Herbert noted. The agreement covers sales agents, station employes, computer operators, secretaries, key punch operators, accountants, production control clerks, catering and cabin expediters, porters and others.

Herbert described the contract as "unquestionably the finest in the 20 years we've represented National empolyes." ALEA's membership extends to eight major carriers nationwide.

Endless Detail:

Lobbying Bill Called Tangle of Red Tape

Labor's lobbyists would be spending most of their time keeping records and filling out reports under a bill being considered by the Senate Government Operations Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller testified.

Biemiller, a former member of Congress and for many years head of the AFL-CIO's team of full-time legislative representatives, spoke with pride of the labor movement's role as "the people's lobby."

He cited its support over the years for "fair wages and working standards, a decent standard of living for all, a job, pensions for old age, decent homes, a system of national health insurance, and fairness in all things without discrimination on account of race, creed, color, age, sex or national origin."

Its legislative staff files the required quarterly reports of salary and expenses and the federation would have no objection to closing any loopholes, Biemiller said.

But he objected strongly to the voluminous reports of virtually every congressional contact that would be required and to a proposed broadened definition of lobbying that could engulf in red tape people and organizations with only fringe relationship to the legislative process.

"The detail is endless; the records will be voluminous," Biemiller testified. But "whether Congress or the public will know any more about the manner in which lobbyists carry on their work and accomplish their objectives is at the very best conjectural."

Portions of the proposed bill represent needless invasions of privacy, Biemiller said. Other sections could infringe on constitutional rights, he contended.

One reference in the bill to publications of voluntary membership organizations, he said, raises a question: "Would the AFL-CIO News have to drop all references to the progress of legislation of interest to union members or refrain from comment on developments in Congress in order to exclude itself from the bill's requirements?"

A partial list of the type of reports and record-keeping required by the bill, Biemiller noted, includes "each aspect of the policy-making process the lobbyist sought to influence, including bill, docket or other identifying number . . . an identification of each federal officer or employe with whom the lobbyist communicated . . . the subject matter of each oral or written communications which expresses an opinion . . . a copy of any written communications used by the lobbyist during the period to solicit other persons to lobby, an estimate of the number of such persons solicited, an estimate of the number of such persons who are engaged in lobbying, etc."

With such requirements, Biemiller suggested, there wouldn't be any time left to lobby. Further, "the information they seek to have reported is unnecessary and irrelevant."

If the purpose was to prohibit certain types of lobbying, the detailed reporting might have some relevance, Biemiller said. "But in a bill which seeks to reveal, not to regulate, the activities these provisions seek to have made public are meaningless and silly."

NLRB Issues Landmark Guidelines For Organizing Health Care Units

jurisdiction of the NLRB.

Since the amendments were enacted last summer, several AFL-CIO affiliates have actively moved to organize the private sector of the industry—estimated to embrace 1.5 million workers.

Summaries of NLRB's recent decisions follow:

● Registered nurses, "if they are sought and so desire, are entitled to be represented for purposes of collective bargaining in a separate unit," the majority found.

"We have concluded that registered nurses possess, among themselves, interests evidencing a greater degree of separateness than those possessed by most other professional employes in the health-care industry."

The decision, based on a petition brought against Mercy Hospitals of Sacramento, Inc., by the Service Employees, directed elections in separate units of nurses, service and maintenance employes and business office clerical employes.

Concerning the clerical unit, the board noted:

"We shall continue to recognize a distinction between business office clerical employes, who perform mainly business type functions, and other types of clerical employes whose work is more closely related to the function performed by personnel in the service and maintenance unit who have, in the past, been traditionally excluded by the board from bargaining units of business office clerical employes."

● Technical employes are appropriately represented in units separate from those of other nonprofessionals, such as service and maintenance workers.

The board directed representation elections in two employe units, one of service and maintenance workers, and the other of technical employes, sought by District 1199, National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, in a case against Barnert Memorial Hospital in Paterson, N.J. The union is an affiliate of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The NLRB defined technical employes as "those whose specialized training, skills, education and job requirements establish a community of interest not shared by other service and maintenance employes." These include licensed practical nurses and technicians in the fields of X-ray, respiratory care, infant care, laboratories, psychiatric care, operating rooms and orthopedics.

● The board refused to set up a separate unit of direct "patient care" employes at Mount Airy Psychiatric Center in Denver, as requested by a Retail Clerks local, but directed an election of service and maintenance employes.

The hospital is administratively organized into two major departments — patient care and support services.

In finding a unit of patient-care employes "inappropriate," the NLRB majority held that the dichotomy between "direct" and "indirect" patient care is not "sufficiently definable" to "provide, in part, a sound and manageable basis upon which the board could fashion appropriate units. . . . If any particular fact is evident, it is the fact that all employes in the health-care industry, sharing as they must a genuine concern for the well-being of patients, are involved in 'patient care.'"

● The board rejected a petition by the Operating Engineers for an election among the 22 switchboard operators at Duke University's Medical Center in Durham, N.C., concluding that a unit limited to switchboard operators would result in "a severe fragmentation of bargaining units."

● A separate unit of stationary engineers sought by the Operating Engineers at the Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children in San Francisco was rejected.

"We are not persuaded that the stationary engineers possess a community of interest sufficiently separate and distinct from the broader community of interest which they share with other service and maintenance employes, except for business office clericals, to warrant their inclusion in a separate unit," the majority said.

In most of the rulings, NLRB Chairman Betty Southard Murphy lined up in the majority with Members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, while Ralph E. Kennedy and John A. Penello were in the minority.

Dues Increase Voted:

Clerks Gear for Expansion Of Airline Organizing Drive

By James M. Shevis

The Railway & Airline Clerks wound up their 75th anniversary convention resolved to step up organizing activities, particularly in the growing airline industry.

The 900 delegates to the quadrennial meeting voted unanimously to establish an air transport division within the brotherhood and, in a separate move, urged the AFL-CIO to consider establishing an airline employes department similar to the federation's seven trade and industrial departments.

During discussion, it was brought out that there are about 125,000 unorganized clerical and related workers in the airline industry. BRAC's current membership includes some 10,000 workers in the industry.

In his report to the delegates, President C. L. Dennis noted that the union increased its organizing efforts in the past four years — notably in those areas where there is "a mutuality of involvement and interest," such as airlines and freight forwarders, railroad-created bureaus and associations and other transport-related companies.

"Organizing offers BRAC the dual opportunity of expanding our ranks and, at the same time, strengthening them," Dennis said.

Partly to underwrite its organizing efforts as well as to meet "the fantastic increases in costs" of operation since the 1971 convention, the union approved a new dues structure to boost revenue.

As approved by the delegates, monthly dues will increase in two steps. The first increase of $2.50 will become effective either in the month following the month in which BRAC negotiates its new contract with the carriers, or on July 1, whichever is later.

The increase would be allocated as follows: $1 to the grand lodge, $1 to the system boards, and 50 cents to the local lodges. The increases thus would raise national dues from the present $4.20 a month to $5.20. System board dues would rise to the same level while local dues would go from $2.60 to $3.10.

The second step of the increase, a $2 monthly rise, is scheduled to take effect on July 1, 1977. It would be distributed to raise national dues to $6.10, system dues to $5.90, and local dues to $3.50.

Other resolutions approved by delegates endorsed ratification of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment and the goals and guiding principles of the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

In addition, the delegates went on record favoring private ownership of railroads and opposing nationalization of the industry. They also opposed any Ford Administration attempts to amend the Railway Labor Act to abolish the right of workers to strike. And they endorsed the Kennedy-Corman Health Security bill pending in Congress.

Earlier, delegates re-elected C. L. Dennis to his fourth straight term as BRAC president. D. A. Bobo was elected to his first full term as secretary-treasurer, a position he has held since last January when the union's executive council chose him to succeed the late D. J. Sullivan.

Also, 11 vice presidents were elected—eight of them incumbents. The three new ones are W. E. Granlund, Thomas Fitzgibbon and F. T. Lynch. Re-elected were C. S. Coleman, R. J. Devlin, R. I. Kilroy, F. J. Kroll, W. C. Y. McGregor, E. J. Neal, J. F. Otero and Gerald Toppen.

The convention was highlighted by an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany who joined delegates in deploring the present condition of American railroads.

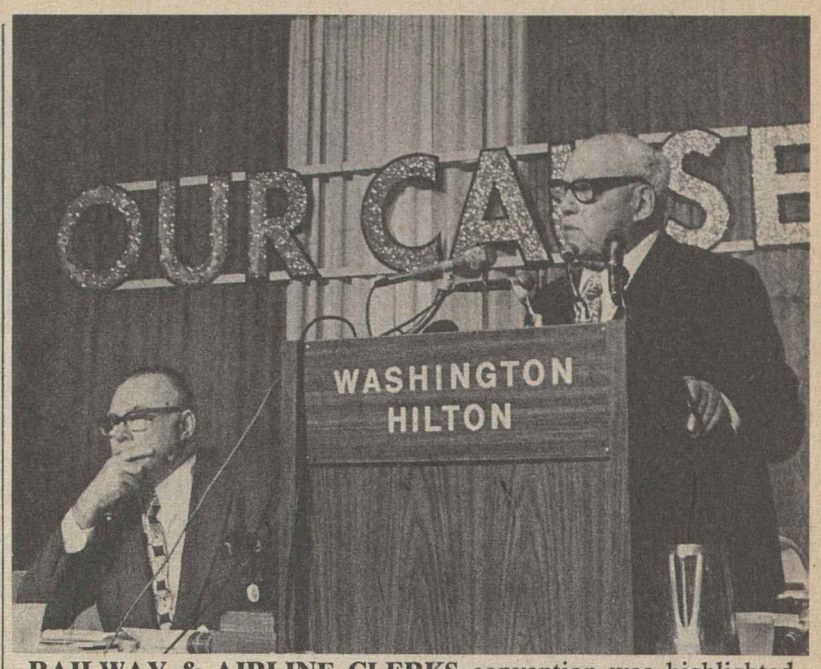
"What about spending a couple billion dollars to rebuild the roadbeds of America's railways?" Meany asked. "Why not try to get America's railway system, if not into the number one spot, at least on a par with the Germans and the French and the Japanese and some of the other nations of the world?

"I happen to be an old railroad buff," Meany said. "I still like to ride trains, but let me tell you what I see in America today means that as far as railroads are concerned, America is no longer in the top rank with the rest of the world."

Meany said roadbed repairs were sorely needed "so that we can get our high-speed trains that we can now manufacture and put into operation but dare not run over certain roadbeds, because there's no possibility that they'll stay on the rails."

Noting Administration opposition to the railbed repair bill, Meany cited this as another example of governmental indifference to the safety and well-being of the people.

He said the Ford Administration and Congress must do more to provide jobs for the millions of unemployed, and pay less attention to misguided attempts to hold down the budget deficit.



RAILWAY & AIRLINE CLERKS convention was highlighted by an address by AFL-CIO President George Meany who scored the Ford Administration for its callousness toward the nation's 8.2 million unemployed workers. Meany, shown with BRAC President C. L. Dennis, urged a large-scale works program, such as rebuilding the roadbeds of America's railways.

New Machinists' Pact Ends Aerospace Strike

St. Louis—About 12,000 Machinists returned to work at McDonnell Douglas Corp. here May 13 after ratifying a new three-year contract ending a 13-week strike at the huge aerospace company.

Members of District 837 of the Machinists voted 4,609 to 2,796 to accept the settlement that had been hammered out in a marathon bargaining session in Washington with the aid of federal mediators.

The new contract calls for a 31 cent hourly wage increase the first year and 3 percent increases in each of the second and third years. The average hourly wage at the plant will be increased from $5.82 to $6.13.

Under the agreement, which expires in May 1978, the company agreed to pay 41 weeks of backpay at 17 cents per hour. A person who worked 40 hours a week for the 41 weeks would get $278.80. This settled a long-standing dispute over the 17-cent raise which had been disapproved by the Pay Board.

The settlement also rolls into base rates a total of 78 cents per hour in past cost of living increases.

Shift premiums, a serious issue with many workers, remain the same, despite the company's efforts to put a lid on them.

The hospital room and board allowance, $54 a day under the old insurance plan, will go to a maximum of $81 in the third year of the agreement.

Weekly disability insurance payments were increased to a top of $155, based on the hourly wage of the employe. Pensions basically will be increased by $1 this year and another $1 next year, making them $9 and then $10 times the number of years of service.

Cost of living adjustments will be made quarterly, with the first due next Aug. 4. A one-cent hourly adjustment will be made for each three-tenths of 1 percent change in the three-month average of the consumer price index, rather than each four-tenths of 1 percent under the old formula.

McDonnell also agreed to reinstate about 100 employes laid off during the strike.

When District 837 walked out Feb. 10, so did 7,000 members of IAM District 720 on the West Coast and several hundred members in Florida. However, District 720 members ratified a settlement by a 2-1 margin Apr. 12 after talks has been moyed to Washington.

TOP AWARDS of the League for Industrial Democracy are presented to Sec.-Treas. Sol C. Chaikin, left, of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, right, of the Clothing Workers. Making the presentations at a luncheon in New York are Judy Bardacke, executive director of LID, and Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, a past recipient.

Garment Union Leaders Presented LID Awards

New York—Two leaders of garment industry unions—Sec.-Treas. Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing Workers—were honored with the League for Industrial Democracy's annual award.

They were cited for their "dedication to the workers they represent," support of full employment, commitment to minority rights, advocacy of trade policies that safeguard American jobs, and efforts on behalf of freedom and democracy abroad.

The awards luncheon climaxed a two-day conference on the political, economic, and foreign policy crises confronting America. Among the participants were Representatives, James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and Donald M. Fraser (D-Minn.) who spoke on the future of political parties; retired Admiral Elmo Zumwalt, on defense spending; author Michael Novak, on ethnicity in society; and Carl Gershman, executive secretary of Social Democrats, U.S.A.

A theme common to many of the speeches was the need to combat the twin evils of economic deterioration and a spreading isolationist mood.

Tom Kahn, chairman of the LID executive board, declared that the two problems are interconnected. "The spread of an isolationist mood towards the outside world will most certainly be accompanied by a mean, narrow mood towards problems here at home," he observed.

Roy Wilkins, a previous LID recipient, presented the awards to Chaikin and Sheinkman, stating that "no two men have demonstrated greater vision and commitment to the advancement of social justice." Wilkins strongly criticized the lack of government initiative to curb the steadily mounting rate of unemployment.

"The black community is suffering the most serious stresses and strains," he said. "For we know that there is no job as difficult as the job of getting along without a paycheck."

Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, added that the "time for talking about ending the recession is over. Every scheme that doesn't put people back to work is secondary."

In their acceptance speeches, Chaikin and Sheinkman concentrated on the plight of unemployed workers and the need for vigorous government action to stimulate the economy.

Sheinkman criticized both President Ford and Congress for their inability to stem high joblessness. He described the Administration's efforts as "hapless," while asserting that Congress had "succumbed to the Administration's propaganda."

He added: "I do not believe that the American people find a high rate of unemployment acceptable. No level of joblessness is acceptable."

Chaikin denounced the "callous indifference" of the Ford Administration toward working people.

He added that labor, as the "most powerful force for a progressive America," would play the pivotal role in the struggle to redirect the economy so that it served human needs and not profits.

The LID, which marked its 70th anniversary at the awards luncheon maintains an extensive educational program to acquaint young people with the values, history and traditions of the labor movement. Previous award recipients, in addition to Wilkins, have been George Meany, A. Philip Randolph, Frederick O'Neal, former Rep. Martha Griffiths, and Senators Henry Jackson and Hubert Humphrey.

Bishops Back Acceptance Of Refugees

A statement by the president of the Catholic bishops' conference, urging Americans to accept Southeast Asian refugees, has been sent to President Ford by the conference's general secretary. The statement also went to every member of Congress.

In a letter to Ford which accompanied the statement by Archbishop Joseph L. Bernardin of Cincinnati, Bishop James S. Rausch wrote:

"I assure you, Mr. President, that the Catholic hierarchy of the United States will continue to support prompt and generous assistance (to the refugees); we recognize in the present situation an opportunity to serve, and we are prepared to do so."

Archbishop Bernardin's statement called it "inconceivable" that Americans should not respond generously to the refugees. He dismissed as "exaggerated and unfounded" fears that they would have a damaging impact on the economy and reiterated the commitment of church agencies to participate in their resettlement.

Full Employment

THIRTY YEARS AGO, as World War II was ending, the Congress began hearings on the issue of full employment. A bipartisan majority adopted the Employment Act of 1946 and on Feb. 20, 1946, President Truman signed that statute. It committed the U.S. government to a continuing policy of creating and maintaining "conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment, for those able, willing and seeking work, and to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power." In 1946, those were brave words. Let's look at what has happened since.

There was a general consensus that full employment in the American economy was an unemployment rate no higher than 3 percent. During the past 30 years the goal of full employment has been neglected more often than met by the Congress, as well as the Executive Branch. In addition, there has been a slow, but rather steady erosion of the goal itself, especially in the past few years.

Government officials and their academic supporters have been busy redefining the goal. It went from a 3 percent unemployment rate to 4 percent, then to 4½ percent and now to 5 percent or 5½ percent. It's an old game, if you can get away with it—if you don't make the grade, change the rules. That's fakery, regardless of whether the trickster is a college professor or a government official.

This country is further away from the maximum employment goal of the Employment Act of 1946 than ever. Even worse, both the Administration and the majority in the Congress are much further away from the government's commitment to full employment than ever before.

UNEMPLOYMENT RATES represent people. They represent families. At present, every percentage increase in the unemployment rate is more than 920,000 additional jobless workers. Every one-tenth of a percent rise is over 92,000 more unemployed.

Yet, the Administration seems determined to achieve its intolerably high unemployment projections. There's no other way to interpret the Administration's all-out campaign to maintain a tight lid on job-creating programs.

The Administration has clearly opted for high unemployment —in the sacred name of holding down the budget deficit.

Majorities of both houses of the Congress have also decided on a tight ceiling—not too much different from the Administration's—that will curb needed government measures to create jobs and economic expansion. If such a ceiling is maintained, the number of unemployed will be between 6.7 and 7.1 million at the end of 1976 and the budget deficit will still remain large. Many members of the Congress, unfortunately, seem to have become hypnotized or scared by the Administration's concentrated drive on the budget issue.

The basic deficit is not in the federal government's budget, but in jobs and earnings. High unemployment in the coming years will mean continuing large budget deficits, continued hardships for workers and their families, continued recession.

Such conditions must not be permitted to continue in a free society. That is particularly true of American society, where a job is much more than just the major source of family income. It is also a key measure of a person's place in society—whether he or she is a full-fledged member or on the outside, looking in.

A Word Edgewise:

Stifling of Opposition Creates Police State Climate in India

By John P. Roche

THE SOVIETS RECENTLY used their launching facilities to put an Indian satellite into orbit. The way things are developing internally in India, one begins to suspect they are also providing Prime Minister Indira Gandhi with some technical assistance on how to organize a police state. I don't want to exaggerate the present situation—India is still basically a democracy—but there are some very ominous portents of rocky waters ahead.

For starters, Mrs. Gandhi has maintained a state of emergency throughout the nation. This is a British inheritance (originating in the first World War's "DORA: Defense of the Realm Act") which many former British possessions cherish and employ with a vigor unprecedented in the homeland. It conveys, among other things, the right to ship subversives, however defined, off to the slammer for months (usually three) without any judicial process. In the Republic of Ireland such detention of an Irish Republican Army suspect can be based on a police officer's belief that he is a gunman.

At any rate, Mrs. Gandhi has put a number of dissidents of various sorts (including trade unionists who objected to her use of the army to break a railroad strike) on ice and apparently has no intention of relaxing her hold. However, you must have some justification so she has emerged with a novel version of the "Reichstag Fire Gambit"; the emergency must continue in force because India is "facing a threat from the sea."

What is this threat? Who has its fleet massed and landing craft loaded off the Indian coast? Would you believe the United States of America? Well, that's what Mrs. Gandhi is telling folks. Its only factual foundation (if that is the word) is that the U.S. has been negotiating with the British for the expansion of the airfield at Diego Garcia which, a hasty computation in my atlas indicates, is roughly 1,000 miles off the shores of India.

Moreover, there have been a number of objections raised in Congress to the Diego Garcia project—which, by the way, is simply to provide a base for anti-submarine aircraft sweeps—so as yet nothing has happened. In short, Mrs. Gandhi's rationale for keeping the shackles on under the emergency powers act is utterly spurious. She must just want them out of the way: Like her father, former Prime Minister Nehru, she is very sensitive to criticism. Unlike her father, she has taken to tossing her critics in jail.

IN ANOTHER AREA, freedom of the press, Mrs. Gandhi's government has been engaged in an endless series of harassment designed to undermine the standing and very existence of independent journals. The details of this campaign were set out in an article in the March-April "Freedom at Issue," published by Freedom House in New York. The author, C. R. Irani, has been the managing director since 1968 of "The Statesman," one of the most distinguished Indian papers, and he documents with chapter and verse the various lines of assault that the government has followed —ranging from the election of editors by working journalists (most of whom belong to a Communist-dominated union), to an attack on the papers as "monopolies" to imposing a 10-page ceiling on all papers, thus diminishing the power of the great dailies, to leaning on the owners to get them to keep their editors in line, to . . .

"The list of pressures on the press," Irani concludes, "is endless and the combinations and permutations could be described as fascinating if the consequences were not so serious. It is a tribute to the ingenuity of our politicians that the methods (described in the article) are only a few of the many that are being used. . . . That this game has not succeeded so far speaks volumes for the resilience of the Indian press."

If there is one consistent thread in Mrs. Gandhi's policy it is anti-Americanism. Hanoi's success in Indochina was, for example, hailed by her as "a gratifying vindication of the consistent position maintained by us on this question over the year." Considering the fact that when the Chinese Communist armies came tumbling down from the Himalayas in 1962, her father practically invited the U.S. to make India an American protectorate, this is a gratuitous slap in the face. And this is to ignore the grain we have shipped, virtually for nothing, to forestall famine. The Indians are free, of course, to be anti-American, but we should surely drop them from our Christmas list.

Skyrocketing Premiums:

Federal Action Needed to Solve Malpractice Insurance Crisis

The following is excerpted from a statement on medical malpractice insurance adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on May 5, 1975.

PATIENTS, HEALTH and welfare plans, doctors, hospitals and insurance companies face a crisis because of the skyrocketing costs of medical malpractice insurance.

In the last year, doctors have experienced premium increases for malpractice insurance amounting to as high as 600 percent. Hospitals have reported premium increases of as much as 1,000 percent. Malpractice insurance premiums have risen from $61 million in 1960 to an estimated $1 billion in 1975. Yet, only 16 to 17 percent of this billion dollars is actually paid to the medically injured patients or their survivors. The rest goes for court costs, legal fees and administrative costs associated with selling malpractice insurance.

Doctors, hospitals and other providers do not pay these high costs out of their own pockets. They pass them on to the consumer and these costs are added on to already excessively high doctor fees and hospital charges. Collectively bargained health benefit plans, Medicare and Medicaid all pay for medical malpractice insurance costs. In one way or another, workers and their families pay the cost of malpractice insurance premiums. Recently, because of rapidly escalating costs, many insurance companies have stated that they can no longer offer malpractice insurance coverage at all.

The causes of the skyrocketing escalation of direct and indirect cost for medical malpractice insurance include:

- Deterioration of the doctor-patient relationship.
- Million dollar-plus settlements.
- The contingency fee system of payments to trial lawyers.
- The high cost of litigation under tort law.

The law of torts is an inefficient and costly method of resolving medical malpractice claims and highly inequitable. It is true that a few patients have been awarded a million dollars or more in damages, but the great majority of patients suffering medical injury receive no compensation at all. Moreover, patients who do eventually win their claims may have to wait as long as 10 years to receive an award for medical injury.

Most of the problems associated with medical malpractice insurance would be more equitably and economically resolved if America had a more adequate social insurance program. A comprehensive national health insurance program, such as Health Security, would pay for almost all personal health care costs of persons that resulted from medical injuries regardless of cause.

In advance of enactment of national health insurance, a number of bills have been introduced in Congress and the state legislatures to resolve the immediate medical malpractice issue. Some only propose to study the problem. Others, including most state legislative proposals, would only provide a costly program of reinsurance to enable the malpractice insurance companies to stay in business. They would do nothing about the expensive and inequitable tort law system of adjudicating malpractice claims nor would they discourage costly defensive medicine resulting from the threat of such claims.

The problem of medical malpractice insurance has traditionally been handled at the state level, but the states have not been effective. The time is long overdue for the federal government to take a more active role.

Two bills introduced in the Congress are particularly worthy of consideration. S. 482, introduced by Senators Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Inouye (D-Hawaii), provides for a federal-state program with federal standards. Under this bill, arbitration of malpractice claims would be authorized under state law. Only injuries resulting from medical malpractice would be insured. Medical injuries resulting from treatment that did not involve actual malpractice would not be compensable.

S. 215, which has also been introduced by Senators Kennedy and Inouye, establishes a federal program of no-fault insurance for medical injuries resulting primarily from the medical services rather than the injury or disease. This is less restrictive than S. 482 which covers only actual malpractice.

Both of these bills would allow claimants to appeal to the courts under tort law if they are dissatisfied with the award.

WHAT IS NEEDED is federal legislation providing for a single program including both arbitration and no-fault insurance. Under such a system, an impartial arbitration panel would make a determination as to whether medical treatment contributed to an unfavorable outcome. If the unfavorable outcome occurred in spite of the fact that the treatment conformed to acceptable standards of care, there would be no award. If, however, the panel determined that the medical treatment contributed to the unfavorable outcome, a no-fault award would be made. The award should cover all necessary and reasonable expenses for medical treatment and rehabilitation; obtaining homemaker and other services needed to replace those ordinarily provided by the injured family member; and loss of current and future earnings.

Physicians would continue to pay premiums for malpractice insurance to obtain the no-fault coverage and recourse to impartial arbitration. Physicians should be required to comply with state license requirements that meet minimum standards established by the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare. In order that patients can get the benefits of new medical knowledge, states should require doctors to take periodic reexaminations in order to be relicensed.

Shortage Threatened:

Solid Waste Recovery System Vital in Preserving Resources

PUBLIC COMMITMENT to an effective national system for recovery of reusable materials from the nation's solid waste would be a big step in heading off a resource shortage that could force widespread production cutbacks and layoffs, Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan declared on Labor News Conference.

Stressing that a huge quantity of scarce materials is now lost through the nation's solid waste system, Sheehan urged incentives to encourage development of collection, recovery and recycling system. But, he said, unless there is wider public demand for conservation of scarce and finite resources, the growing problems will be shoved aside until crisis shortages develop.

Sheehan predicted that once the nation has established a solid policy of recovery and reuse of materials in the solid waste system, a market for those materials will develop.

Sheehan said it is unfortunate that debate over the issue of whether or not throwaway beverage containers should be banned has diverted the national attention from the more critical problem of resources lost in the solid waste system.

He said that banning one-way bottles and cans would cut 60,000 jobs from the container industry, and reduce already short tax revenues by more than $800 million. He said that litter along the nation's highways does detract from the scenic roadside beauty, but it does not create the kind of threats to public health and welfare that other environmental hazards pose.

The USWA lobbyist said that so much of the "environmental muscle" is being used on the ban-the-can issue that there may be little left to be effective in the longer-range and "very substantial areas involving public health and welfare," where it is badly needed.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRESIDENT FORD'S PROPOSED SLASH in the federal budget for health programs during fiscal 1976 would impose "inhumane" burdens on consumers, is entirely unrealistic, represents buck-passing and could—if blindly accepted by Congress—add to the fiscal crisis that Ford constantly frets over.

Accusations similar to those have been made by leaders of unions, deeply disturbed at the Administration's lack of concern with health care even while it is steadily deteriorating. But in this case, the charges come from the American Public Health Association.

The highly respected APHA is a non-profit organization composed of experts in the health field, including doctors and nurses. It has been dedicated to advancing and protecting health in this country since 1872.

The association recently completed a detailed program-by-program analysis of Ford's budget for health which ought to be carefully examined by the Administration and Congress even though it has not gone through any official approval process of APHA membership. These are some of its salient points:

The analysis finds it "interesting to note" that while the President justifies an increase in the Defense Dept.'s budget on the basis of a high rate of inflation, "little or no mention was made of this pervasive factor in determining health expenditures."

Granting that no one can accurately project future inflation, the APHA uses what it terms a "conservative" 10 percent factor in calculating constant dollars for health for the coming year.

The analysis points out that Ford's budgeting of just over $4.5 billion for health next year would amount to a slash of nearly 30 percent in constant dollar expenditures.

In tracing the proposed cutbacks in support of a wide range of categorical health programs, APHA finds that this is done on the basis of placing greater reliance on Medicare, Medicaid and other means of health support. But at the same time, the analysis finds Ford "trying to curtail expenditures under Medicare and Medicaid."

In another area the President is sharply criticized for trying to force states to increase their matching share on health programs while at the same time eliminating health revenue-sharing and requiring states with the greatest per-capita to up their share on Medicaid payments from 50 to 60 percent.

THE SPEAR-CARRIER for slashing social and health programs as head of the Office of Management & Budget under President Nixon and now as Ford's Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare is Caspar Weinberger.

Noting that his rationale for increasing the state and local burden for health programs is that these governments operate at a lower deficit than the federal government, the APHA says this argument conveniently omits the fact that most state and local governments are legally forbidden to operate at a deficit.

What these governments do, the analysis emphasizes, is "balance" their budgets by cutting jobs or services or both. With increasing unemployment and a lower tax base, state and local governments already are having to spend more money just to maintain the status quo on expenditures for health programs.

As for Ford's thinking that the consumer "somehow will be able to increase his share of the burden for health care," the APHA classifies as an apparent inability to recognize that the health programs mainly are for those on fixed incomes and those who are too poor to afford private health insurance plans.

Asking such persons and others who are now part of the mounting toll of the unemployed to pay a greater share of health care "appears to be, at best, impractical, or, at worst, inhumane," the APHA concludes.

NATIONAL COMMITMENT to a system of recovery and recycling of scarce materials now lost in solid waste disposal is the key to stemming production cutbacks and layoffs forced by resource shortages. Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

A Question for the President and the Congress:

Have You Lost Confidence In America?

We certainly hope not. But their actions cause us to wonder.

The President and the Congress are putting dollars ahead of people. Instead of putting America back to work, they want to hold the line on the budget deficit.

They are ignoring the fact that for every 900,000 unemployed workers put back to work, the federal treasury gains about $16 billion in revenue.

They are forgetting that America has gone into debt before—an even higher debt—to keep this country strong.

America's economic problem today is not budget deficits. It is jobs.

★ More than nine million Americans are unemployed—a million of them so discouraged they have even stopped looking for work.

★ Nearly four million more are forced to work part-time because there aren't enough full-time jobs.

★ 25 million Americans will be unemployed at some time this year.

Instead of action to put these Americans back to work, the President and a majority of the Congress say: Creating jobs is secondary to holding down the budget deficit.

The President says $60 billion, and no more. The Senate says $67 billion, and no more. The House says $70 billion, and no more.

That means: No more for jobs.

Jobs will have to wait, they say. Three years, maybe four. Because the President and a majority of the Congress think the dollar deficit is more important than people.

The immediate problem is not the deficit. It is jobs.

What is the deficit? Simply, it is borrowed money.

Borrowing money is part of the American way of life.

When families need a new car or money for college tuition, they borrow.

When big corporations need millions to build new plants, they borrow.

When communities need new schools or firehouses, they borrow.

These are investments in the future. Instead of waiting several years to save the money—families, businesses and communities borrow the money now. They buy the car, build the plant, educate the children. In other words, while the debt is being paid off, the money they borrowed is put to good use.

We think the government should do the same thing. Its investment should be in the people of the United States.

That means: Invest in jobs now to build America for the future.

You see, there's more to be considered than dollars. There is a deficit in human lives . . . lives wasted by unemployment.

Holding the deficit to $60 billion or $70 billion would mean a human deficit of seven million workers unemployed for four more years.

The choice is dollars or people. We choose people.

It makes sense to make people America's first priority. Put them back to work, so they can take care of their families and pay taxes.

American workers want to work. They don't want a dole.

There is only one solution to unemployment, and that is jobs.

When today's unemployed get jobs, they will pay taxes and the budget deficit will come down. It is as simple as that.

How much deficit is too much?

In 1947, right after World War II, the publicly-held federal debt was 103 percent of this country's Gross National Product—the total value of the goods and services produced in one year.

Today, that debt is less than 26 percent of our Gross National Product. This means America is worth four times more than it owes.

It also means that America can afford to borrow even more today to put her people back to work.

America borrowed during World War II because we were fighting to preserve our way of life.

America is in another war today. This time, we are also fighting for our way of life—for the economic survival of millions of Americans.

In this war, President Ford and a majority of the Congress are fighting the wrong battle. They are fighting to hold down the dollar deficit.

They should be fighting to put America back to work. They should be fighting the human deficit of unemployment.

Instead of being idle, unemployed workers could be building homes, libraries, highways, recreation facilities, mass transit systems, sewage treatment plants and repairing the railroads.

All across America, cities need teachers, fire fighters, police officers, sanitation workers, librarians. But they are having to lay off these workers because the cities don't have money to pay them.

Workers want productive jobs that add to the value of America.

Put every unemployed worker back to work, and America will have a budget surplus.

Jobs are the only solution. The only real solution to unemployment. The only real solution to budget deficits.

But when it came to a vote in the U.S. Senate on April 30, only 29 Senators voted for jobs. 64 voted to keep millions unemployed for four more years.

If you too believe that it is time to put America back to work, write your Senators and Representative. Tell them you have confidence in America.

Tell them jobs are the only solution.

Jobs Issue Pressed To Congress, Public

gross national product — the total value of goods and services produced during the year.

In the 1947 fiscal year, as a result of the big budget deficits incurred to fight and win World War II, the federal debt was close to 103 percent of the gross national product. By 1974, even though the dollar amount of the debt had increased, it represented a vastly smaller 25.7 percent of the GNP.

The lesson, Meany stressed, is that "a massive investment in America today of public funds would not bankrupt this nation" but instead "would restore it to economic health."

During questioning by the subcommittee, which is chaired by Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen (D-Tex.), Meany said he is "proposing" a $100 billion budget deficit if that is what is needed to get people back to work and turn the economy around quickly.

Meany said he wasn't concerned about "overheating" the economy with too big a stimulus.

"I wish it were even lukewarm today," he told a questioner.

When Congress established full employment as a national goal in 1946, Meany noted, "there was a general consensus that full employment in the American economy was an unemployment rate no higher than 3 percent."

In the years since then, the goal has been "neglected more often than met" by both Congress and the Executive Branch and its definition has been rewritten by "government officials and their academic supporters."

The definition of full employment "went from a 3 percent unemployment rate to 4 percent, then to 4.5 percent and now to 5 percent or 5.5 percent," Meany noted.

"To me that's fakery, regardless of whether the trickster is a college professor or a government official," Meany added.

He reminded the panel that "unemployment rates represent people . . . they represent families . . . every percentage increase in the unemployment rate is more than 920,000 additional jobless workers."

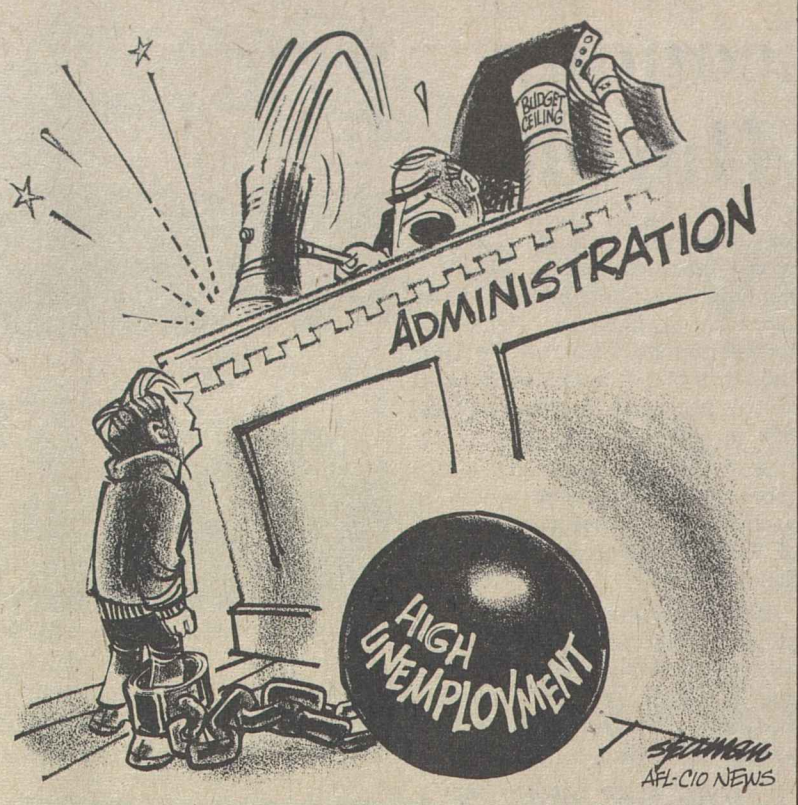
After completing his formal testimony, Meany spoke of watching President Ford on television draw the line marking the maximum budget deficit the country could afford. But, Meany regretted, Ford "didn't put his hand across a chart and say, 'No more suffering, no greater unemployment.' "

He spoke of the tragedy of young people coming out of school with no job prospects and the impact on older workers of the words, "you are laid off," that "burn themselves not only into a man's pocketbook but also into his very soul."

Meany spelled out labor's program goals—accelerated public works and public service jobs, more aid to the cities, interest-rate ceilings, funds to restore railroad roadbeds and tracks, housing stimulants, a halt to the export of jobs and other measures, concluding:

"The time for talk is past. The time for action is now. For Congress to delay, to demonstrate timidity, to sell America short would be sheer tragedy."

'Four More Years!'



Housing Needs Survey Sent to Union Families

A nationwide survey of union families' housing needs is being conducted by the AFL-CIO as part of its campaign to continue and intensify labor's fight for better housing and increased job opportunities.

In a letter accompanying a questionnaire sent to a selected sample of members of AFL-CIO unions, Federation President George Meany declared that "none of us today remains untouched by the pressures of providing adequate housing for our families and having jobs at decent wages. Thousands of our union members will not be able to meet these needs if housing construction is allowed to remain at depressed levels."

"Enactment of programs which meet the housing needs of union members, and all other American workers, would help to achieve a higher level of home-building and employment, which in turn would create additional purchasing power and support jobs throughout the economy," Meany pointed out.

Requesting the "prompt cooperation" of the persons selected for the survey—one out of every 500 union members—Meany said the information will be kept confidential and will "improve the efficiency with which we can work with Congress to meet our members' housing needs."

The survey was authorized by the 1973 AFL-CIO convention. Results of the survey and recommendations for implementing a new housing strategy will be presented to the 1975 convention which opens Oct. 2 in San Francisco.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that since the convention action in 1973:

- Conventional mortgage interest rates climbed above 9 percent and in May 1975 were still between 8.5 and 9 percent.
- The median sales price of new single family homes increased from $33,300 to $38,100 as of February 1975.
- Construction unemployment jumped from 9.1 percent to 19.3 percent in April 1975.
- Annual housing starts, seasonally adjusted, declined from 1.7 million to 980,000 units in March 1975.
- Apartment rents are rising at an annual rate of more than 7 percent.

The federation's Dept. of Urban Affairs is conducting the survey with the cooperation of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Victor Canzano Dies, Former TWUA Official

Warwick, R.I. — Victor J. Canzano, a former vice president of the Textile Workers Union of America, died May 9 following a heart attack. He was 63.

Canzano had been an arbitrator with the American Arbitration Association and was a hearing officer with the consumer division of the Rhode Island attorney general's office when he died. He retired from the staff of the TWUA in 1967.

Romanian Trade Pact Attacked as One-Way

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to reject the Ford Administration's trade agreement with Romania, warning that giving the Communist country "most favored nation" low-tariff treatment on imports would result in more U.S. production cutbacks and job layoffs.

Legislative Rep. Ray Denison told a House Ways & Means subcommittee that the one-way trade pact with Romania "makes a mockery of fair international trade."

He noted that not only has Romania's industrial growth rate outpaced that of the United States in recent years, but in 1974 it continued to climb while the real U.S. growth declined.

The tariff cuts proposed under the agreement will have a wide impact on jobs, factories and payrolls in communities, Denison said. He noted that congressional approval of the agreement would mean that the duty on numerous imported consumer and industrial products would be slashed: television parts from 60 percent to 15 percent; some electrical motors from 90 to 25 percent; tires from 10 to 4 percent and clothing from 45 to 21 percent.

Denison charged that the Romanian trade pact totally ignores or fails to consider some key parts of the Trade Act of 1974, including the purposes spelled out by Congress "to foster the economic growth of and full employment in the United States" and "to provide adequate procedures to safeguard American industry and labor against unfair and injurious import competition."

He conceded that producing technology for export could create some jobs, "but the insistence by multinational firms that they create jobs by locating abroad is invalid, because they do not factor the eventual job loss."

He cited the potential impact of a General Tire Co. venture for the building of a $75 million radial tire manufacturing plant in Floresti, Romania. The exported U.S. technology will now be used to produce goods in competition with those made in the United States, he pointed out.

Denison noted that the costs of such ventures "are being paid by U.S. taxpayers in 6 percent Eximbank money, in tax credits charged against federal taxes, and in lost jobs of American workers whose 'productivity' has been exported to a Communist state."

He also stressed that the agreement fails to guarantee the human rights of emigration as spelled out by Title IV of the act.

HRDI Urges Plan to Aid Apprentices

Seattle — Machinists were urged to help revitalize the industry's apprenticeship programs, which have declined sharply in recent years.

Speaking to the IAM Tool & Die Conference here, Charles E. Bradford, acting executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, noted that federal funds can be made available to the union to help reverse the drop in apprenticeships.

He pointed out that the number of registered apprentices in the machinist trade declined from 17,774 in 1969 to 13,115 in 1973—a decrease of 25 percent.

The situation with tool and die apprentices is even worse, Bradford said. During the same four-year span, the drop was 45 percent as the number of apprentices declined from 21,602 to 11,781.

Bradford said the situations could be turned around through affirmative action programs, improved minority hiring and cooperation of employers. He said HRDI was readily available to assist through a variety of programs.

Bradford, who is an IAM member, warned that an effective apprenticeship program is needed to maintain high standards in the trade.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Consumer Agency

The bill to establish an independent agency to represent consumer interests would have been mutilated if the Senate had adopted an amendment involving the agency in labor-management relations, including proceedings before the NLRB and the National Mediation Board.

The amendment, by Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.), was defeated, 52-36. The 41 Democrats and 11 Republicans who voted against the amendment supported the AFL-CIO's position.

Emergency Aid:

Spurs to Economy Clear Key Hurdles

But the House rejected the motion.

Another major bill cleared by a House-Senate conference committee is designed to spur construction of new homes, help middle-income families buy them, and protect homeowners who lose their jobs from losing their homes because they can't meet mortgage payments.

It, too, has been threatened with a veto.

If it becomes law, persons whose income is not more than 120 percent of the median for their community could receive one of three forms of subsidies in purchasing new homes or condominiums whose price is within specified limits.

They could be given either a temporary 6 percent mortgage rate that would start phasing back to the market level after three years or a 7 percent rate for the life of the mortgage. Alternatively, there would be the option of a $1,000 payment to be applied to the down payment on a home.

The price of the houses or condominiums could not exceed $38,000 in most areas, $42,000 in high-cost areas, and $48,000 in Alaska or Hawaii.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. termed the legislation "urgently needed." He said it could result in 150,000 new housing starts this year and 250,000 next year while added funds in the bill for low-income housing units could finance construction of 75,000 to 100,000 such units.

The bill also has a provision that would authorize— but not compel—the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to initiate a mortgage purchase policy that would result in an 8 percent ceiling on new mortgages when housing starts fall below an annual level of 1.6 million for four consecutive months.

The bill authorizes up to $1.5 billion over two years. Funds to prevent foreclosures of homes would be loans that would eventually be repaid.

In other developments:

● The House voted 291-104 for a labor-supported bill that would prohibit the Federal Home Loan Bank Board from allowing federal savings and loan associations to issue mortgages carrying varying interest rates. Under such mortgages, the interest cost would rise or fall with changes in the market rate. Consumer groups have generally opposed this system as inflationary and the AFL-CIO noted that it would hit homeowners with higher mortgage costs at the time when other expenses were rising also.

● The House failed to override President Ford's veto of a compromise, labor-supported bill that would strengthen farm price supports. Seventy-one Democrats backed the President on the issue and the 245-182 vote was 40 short of the two-thirds needed to override the bill.

● A House Ways & Means subcommittee approved a bill to continue the emergency program of long-term unemployment benefits.

Persons covered by state unemployment insurance would be entitled to up to 65 weeks of benefits through June 30, 1976, and a maximum of 52 weeks for the balance of that year.

Persons whose last jobs hadn't been covered by unemployment compensation would be eligible for up to 39 weeks of special federal benefits through mid-1976. That would be an improvement on the present program of 26 weeks.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. James Corman (D-Calif.), rejected the Labor Dept.'s proposal to tie the emergency benefits to unemployment rates in various metropolitan areas instead of using state and national triggers.

● As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the House and Senate were working towards agreement on emergency funds to assist Vietnamese refugees arriving in the United States.

● A House-Senate agreement was expected on similar bills providing subsidies for construction of merchant ships in U.S. shipyards to fly the American flag. The legislation authorizes $240 million for ship construction subsidies and close to $316 million for operating subsidies.

● A Senate Judiciary subcommittee approved a bill to ban state "fair trade" laws that allow manufacturers to set minimum retail prices for their products.

Labor Presses for Safeguards Against Job-Destroying Imports

nities unless the American steel industry is utilizing fully its facilities.

"In 1971," he said, "an all-time record of 18.3 million tons of steel were imported, representing the export of at least 108,000 job opportunities in the steel industry."

Abel pointed out that America had a $3 billion trade deficit in steel trade alone last year, declaring that "the United States is an 'international Santa Claus' when it comes to steel."

He said that this country has the freest and most open markets of any nation in the world and that government owned or government controlled steel firms of other countries—which have set up trade barriers to U.S.-made products—take full advantage of the trade conditions to the detriment of American workers.

This year, Abel said, the American basic steel industry could produce 15 million more tons than it will, but this tonnage will go instead to imports—costing the country 90,000 job opportunities.

At hearings in Boston, President John J. Driscoll of the Connecticut AFL-CIO said that workers in his state have long suffered job cutbacks as almost entire industries abandoned the state, first for states with lower wages, and later for countries that pay still lower wages.

Driscoll charged that powerful multinational corporations had successfully demanded one set of trade laws in the United States and another abroad.

"Their motives never reflected any concern for the standard of living of the American family," he stressed, "They were ony interested in profits."

That point was expanded on by President Joseph A. Sullivan and Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO.

"Some of America's oldest and largest corporations have been using cheap labor abroad and crawling through loopholes in the various international trade agreements to increase profits at the expense of the American workers," they charged.

At hearings in New York, Sec.-Treas. John J. Brown of the New Jersey AFL-CIO said his state has lost 100,000 permanent jobs as American companies have shut down facilities to operate overseas, and urged the commission to halt further jobs erosion.

"Our textile industry in New Jersey is no longer an industry employing thousands of workers," he noted. "Our loss in industrial jobs caused by the plant closings of General Instrument, Emerson, Westinghouse, RCA, Raybestos-Manhattan to facilities overseas is incalculable."

At hearings in Washington Vice Pres. Gerald A. Coleman of the Hatters suggested that the import competition from low-wage countries should be dealt with by a Fair Labor Standards provision which would require countries shipping goods to the United States to pay a predetermined minimum wage.

The Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee of seven AFL-CIO affiliates warned at hearings in Washington that for President Ford to give duty-free treatment to scores of countries shipping products to the United States would spell disaster for the U.S. industrial base and its workers.

Howard P. Chester, executive secretary of the committee, said that increased imports have forced thousands of workers to face plant shutdowns and unemployment in many industries, including ceramic tile, sheet glass, earthenware and chinaware and glassware. He also cited the impact on aluminum and asbestos industries.

Chester noted that organized labor's objectives for fair foreign trade were spelled out in the AFL-CIO action program to put the nation back to work.

The federation urged immediate action by President Ford to:

● Use his power under the Trade Act to establish quotas on imports of industrial goods in areas where U.S. production has declined.

● Impose import restrictions against countries whose trade practices have placed unfair and unreasonable burdens on U.S. commerce.

● Impose export controls on raw materials and other products in short supply, including oil and coal, through a system of monitoring and licensing.

The AFL-CIO also called on Congress to:

● Revoke provisions for the deferral of tax payments on foreign-earned profits.

● Eliminate foreign tax credit.

● Repeal sections of the Tariff Code that encourage foreign production for shipment back to U.S. markets.

● Regulate export of American capital and technology that results in the export of U.S. jobs.

Consumer Agency Bill Approved by Senate

that since it was quite unlikely that the consumer advocacy staff would have occasion to so intervene, why give an extra talking point against the bill to foes of a consumer agency?

Weicker's Connecticut colleague, Democratic Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff, gave him a reasoned answer but the most convincing case for the labor relations exemption came from a supporter of the Weicker amendment and a foe of the bill.

Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) explained why he was "pleased to cosponsor" the Weicker amendment.

"Industrywide bargaining is a good example of how labor-management relations directly affect the consumer," Thurmond said. If manufacturers pay the same wage rates, "a major competitive factor is removed." The Agency for Consumer Advocacy should "fully explore the antitrust implications" of industrywide bargaining.

Thurmond also spoke of "inflationary" wage negotiations, union work rules and allowing needy strikers to receive food stamps.

Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.), who led the filibuster and legislative fight against passage of the bill, was quite frank as to his reasons for supporting the Weicker amendment. If it passed, Allen said, "this bill is dead."

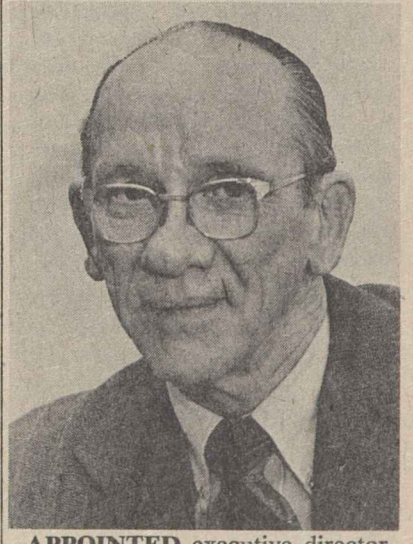
The Senate later defeated an amendment by Sen. Robert Taft (R-Ohio) to allow intervention in matters dealing with secondary boycotts or jurisdictional disputes.

It did approve an amendment by Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) that consumer and union groups had opposed. The amendment would exempt agriculture at the farm level, thus barring intervention in matters such as health standards for insecticides.

Under the Senate bill, the Agency for Consumer Advocacy would have the dual function of intervening on behalf of consumer interests before other federal agencies and in the courts, and acting as a clearinghouse for consumer complaints. To ensure its independence within the executive branch, the agency's budget requests would go directly to Congress rather than be channeled through the White House Office of Management & Budget.

A companion bill is awaiting House committee action.

The Ford Administration has opposed a new agency, but the President has stopped just short of actually saying he would veto such legislation.



APPOINTED executive director of the Public Employee Dept. of the AFL-CIO is John A. McCart, who has been acting director since the formation of the new department. He had previously been director of the former Government Employees Council, whose affiliates represent federal and postal workers.

Real Wages Down 4.1% Over Year

American workers lost more ground in their struggle to keep even last month, as purchasing power fell again and consumer prices rose.

Real spendable weekly earnings — take-home pay expressed in 1967 dollars — dropped to $87.46 in April, and were down 4.1 percent over the year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

April earnings were 13 cents below their March level, $3.70 off the year-earlier pace and stood at their lowest level in 11 years, BLS said. The figures are calculated for workers with three dependents, and are seasonally adjusted.

The decline of one-tenth of 1 percent in real spendable earnings last month was the result of an increase of six-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index which overcame a slight rise in average weekly hours worked.

Real spendable earnings have been below their year-earlier levels for 26 months in a row, BLS reported.

The April climb in prices was a reversal of two previous months of slowdowns in the increase in the CPI. The index rose by three-tenths of 1 percent in March and by five-tenths of 1 percent in February.

At 158.6 percent of its 1967 base, the CPI last month was 10.2 percent above its year-earlier level. The further increase meant that a typical range of consumer goods and services costing $100 eight years ago cost $158.60 in April.

Food prices in April were 7.9 percent higher than a year earlier, while nonfood commodity prices and service charges were both 11 percent above their April 1974 levels, BLS said.

BLS attributed last month's CPI increase to price rises for many items, including used cars, furniture, houses, gasoline, magazines, auto insurance, natural gas and food, notably fresh fruits, eggs and beef.

The jump in fresh fruit prices was especially large, and beef prices rose for the first time in seven months. Sugar prices, however, fell substantially but still were more than 80 percent above their year-earlier level. The cost of food away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—rose at the annual rate of 6 percent, the same as in March.

Nonfood commodity prices, which usually show no change in April, increased eight-tenths of 1 percent over the month. BLS reported large increases in prices of furniture, gasoline, houses, home

$5 Billion Public Works Plan Clears House 312-86

Meets Goal Of Action Program

The House voted 312-86 approval of an accelerated public works bill that is high on the AFL-CIO's action program to put America back to work.

The bill, which now goes to the Senate, authorizes up to $5 billion in federal grants to cities and states for construction projects that can be started quickly. Most of the money would be spent in areas of highest unemployment. And if Congress appropriated the full amount, it would finance an estimated 125,000 construction site jobs and an equal number of off-site jobs.

Another job-creating stimulant —a $5.3 billion Emergency Employment Appropriations Act —cleared Congress and was awaiting a presidential decision on whether to sign or veto it. This bill increases funds for existing programs, including public service jobs and summer jobs for youth.

A substantial number of Republicans joined nearly all House Democrats in defying an Administration veto threat and voting for the accelerated public works bill.

At House hearings last month, AFL-CIO President George Meany and James T. Lynn, director of the Office of Management & Budget, took opposite views.

Meany said the legislation, along with other economic stimulants, could point the nation back to economic health.

Lynn termed the bill inflationary and said he would recommend that President Ford veto it if it passed Congress.

At Senate hearings the day after the House passed the bill, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger stressed labor's position

Cites Crisis in Cities:

Labor Asks Million Public Service Jobs

The AFL-CIO urged a public service employment program that would more than triple the 310,000 jobs currently being funded through the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.

"We need programs to put America back to work, now," Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young testified at Senate hearings.

A bill sponsored by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) to authorize $5 billion to finance 500,000 jobs while unemployment stays high is "a step in the right direction" but not enough, Young said. He urged a million-job goal and a $10 billion authorization and funding.

Young, accompanied by Legislative Rep. Robert McGlotten, noted that the bill being considered had only a one-way trigger. It would reduce funds available when unemployment drops below specified rates. Young suggested that if the panel is proposing "countercyclical" leigslation, it would have to provide as well for increases in budget authority when unemployment rises.

"Long lines of desperate workers applying for all too few jobs in city after city clearly demonstrates that jobless Americans want work, not welfare," Young said. "Perhaps, once and for all, the pictures of these long lines in Atlanta, Detroit, Cleveland, San Francisco and other cities will convince the nation that America's unemployed are not loafers and bums."

Young noted that the recession-inflation combination has forced

Meany Named To Panel on Refugee Aid

President Ford has appointed AFL-CIO President George Meany to a 17-member committee that will advise the White House and federal agencies on the resettlement of Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees. John Eisenhower, son of the late President, is chairman of the panel.

The AFL-CIO has pledged its full cooperation with the government's efforts to ease the problems facing the incoming refugees from

New Figures Reveal Recession Bit Deeper

Revised government figures revealed the economic recession in the first three months of 1975 was even deeper than preliminary reports showed.

Real gross national product fell over the January-March period at a record seasonally adjusted annual rate of 11.3 percent, the Commerce Dept. reported. A month earlier, the government had estimated the slide at the rate of 10.4 percent.

Real GNP—the value of the nation's output of goods and services stripped of the effects of inflation—has declined in each of the past five quarters. It is expected to drop again in the current quarter.

The Commerce Dept. also issued revised statistics showing inflation in the first three months of 1975 ran at the adjusted annual rate of 8.5 percent, instead of the 8 percent rate originally estimated.

The first-quarter 1975 real GNP decline was the steepest since 1947 when the government began recording this measure of economic performance.

Most economists view the mea-

Jobless Aid Extended, Set for Senate Action

A labor-supported bill continuing two emergency programs of federally-funded unemployment benefits passed the House, 381-8, and is expected to win early Senate approval.

It would enable workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs to continue to receive a maximum of 65 weeks of payments through June 30, 1976. The maximum would drop to 52 weeks between July 1, 1976 and Dec. 31, 1976.

Thereafter, unless Congress enacts permanent changes in the unemployment insurance system as the AFL-CIO has urged, the maximum would drop to 39 weeks—26 weeks of normal state benefits plus 13 weeks of state-federal payments during periods of high unemployment.

The House-passed bill also would improve the Special Unemployment Assistance (SUA) program which has given up to 26 weeks of federally-funded payments to experienced workers not entitled to state benefits

Arizona Delegates Focus on Job Needs

Tucson, Ariz.—A warning to employers not to use high joblessness to lower the standards of their workers was sounded by Gov. Raul Castro (D) at the annual convention of the Arizona AFL-CIO here.

Delegates gave him what he described as one of the warmest welcomes of his career and renewed their cheers when he urged both employers and unions to bargain their agreements in good faith, despite difficulties posed by unemployment and inflation.

He expressed grave concern at the swelling ranks of Arizona's jobless, now approaching 10 percent, and voiced hope that the central Arizona project to channel Colorado River water to the state's desert areas will create as many as 5,000 jobs.

Ford Administration policies to combat the recession, joblessness and inflation came under heavy fire. Don Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, declared the present approach "is what got us into this mess." He outlined the AFL-CIO General Board's recovery program and warned that unless the administration develops more effective programs "the demogogues, will be back."

In a resolution on the economy, the convention called for "massive federal efforts to create jobs, urged immediate action to protect existing jobs from unfair foreign competition, and asked implementation of labor-management advisory committee recommendations "to stimulate the economy through added purchasing power."

Among other speakers were Lamar Gulbransen, Area VII COPE director; William L. Gilbert, AFL-CIO regional director; Margaret Thornburgh, COPE Women's Activities Division western area director; James Whitten, State AFL-CIO COPE director; Herbert L. Ely, Phoenix attorney, and State Rep. R. E. (Danny) Pena.

In other resolutions the delegates asked Congress to fix the amount of oil imports and to work on a crash program to find alternative energy sources; endorsed the Equal Rights Amendment and a state program of temporary disability insurance, and voted support for the United Farm Workers and the state of Israel.

William D. Shafer of the Communications Workers, the immediate past vice president, was elected president to succeed Richard H. Lower. Incumbent presidents cannot be re-elected.

Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock was re-elected to his fifth two-year term. He was challenged by Richard Baehre of the Sheet Metal Workers.

Delegates also elected the first woman to the state federation's executive board, which was expanded from 12 to 15 members. She is Grace Carroll, secretary-treasurer of the Southern Arizona Labor Council and president of Office & Professional Employees Local 319 in Tucson.

many cities to lay off regular workers.

Without adequate funds, he said, public officials "face impossible choices." Who should be hired with limited federal funds when the job applicants include "a well qualified but laid-off city employe, a veteran, a long-term unemployed worker from the private sector and a member of a minority group?"

Young said the problem would be solved only by a complete turnaround in the economy, but it would be lessened through more adequate federal funding.

The AFL-CIO's position, he said, is that laid-off city employes should neither get preference nor face discrimination in competing for federally-funded jobs. Further, "state and local governments must not be permitted to fire permanent employes in order to hire federally-financed replacements."

Young asked that the current $10,000 ceiling on salaries be lifted so that cities in high-cost areas can hire persons with needed job skills.

Past experience, he said, has demonstrated that "public service jobs can be filled quickly and can fill genuine community needs that are far removed from leaf-raking."

Ruben Levin Cited For Debs Award

Terre Haute, Ind.—The Eugene V. Debs Foundation will present its 1975 award to Ruben Levin, editor of Labor.

Levin has edited the newspaper of the railroad unions for nearly 25 years and has been a newspaperman for more than half a century.

The Debs award honors the memory of the early Socialist Party presidential candidate who also is remembered as a railroad union leader and editor of a union newspaper.

This will be the ninth year the award has been presented.

Multinationals Pay Officials Outside U.S.

The far-reaching tentacles of U.S.-based multinational corporations, particularly those in the oil industry, were clearly exposed in Senate testimony and regulatory commission actions.

The most revealing developments came in admissions by Gulf Oil chairman Bob R. Dorsey that his company paid nearly $5 million in political contributions over the past decade to government officials in South Korea, Bolivia and other countries.

Dorsey told a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on multinational corporations that Gulf turned over $4 million to the ruling party of President Park Chung Hee prior to South Korea's 1971 national elections. Park's party won by a thin majority.

In addition, Dorsey admitted the giant oil firm gave cash and gifts to the late President Rene Barrientos of Bolivia. Barrientos's party in turn contributed $350,000 of the cash donations through a Beirut bank for a "public education program" to finance Arab propaganda in the United States.

Dorsey told the subcommittee the contributions were part of the cost of doing business in those foreign countries. Furthermore, he said, it was his impression that other companies made similar contributions.

The Gulf contributions were made in secret without the knowledge of the company's stockholders, Dorsey testified. He said he had been informed that they violated the laws of both South Korea and Bolivia.

Other oil companies, including Exxon, Mobil, Standard of Indiana and Standard of California, disclosed they too had made political contributions outside the United States. Mobil, Exxon and Indiana Standard said they made contributions in Canada and Italy. California Standard did not identify the nations involved.

The foreign activities of other business firms also emerged in charges filed by the Securities & Exchange Commission.

The SEC charged that United Brands Co. violated agency reporting provisions by failing to disclose the payment of $1.25 million to win a reduction of the Honduran export tax on bananas. It was also brought out the company had paid $750,000 to officials of the Italian government.

The SEC also charged the Northrop Corp., a major defense contractor, with disbursing $30 million abroad in fees and sales commissions without adequate records.

Action Program Gains:

Job Funds Measure Sent to President

that job programs, financed through temporary budget deficits, represent "an investment in America."

Increasing employment will cut the deficit, he testified, "and full employment will produce a budget surplus."

The House-passed bill would provide 100 percent federal financing for public works projects that could be under way within 90 days after approval of the grant. Money could be used for construction, renovation, repair or demolition of public facilities, but not for such purposes as land acquisition.

Seventy percent of the available funds would be earmarked for areas where unemployment exceeded the national jobless rate for three consecutive months. No state could receive more than 10 percent of the funds and the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law would apply to all construction.

House Public Works Committee Chairman Robert E. Jones (D-Ala.), chief sponsor of the bill along with Rep. Robert A. Roe (D-N.J.), stressed the twin goals of the legislation.

Its intent, he told the House, is "to provide jobs for unemployed workers in construction and related industries and help state and local governments provide badly needed but unfunded public facilities."

At the Senate hearings the following day, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said joblessness in the building industry has reached "scandalous levels" because of Administration high-interest, tight-money policies, coupled with impoundments and cutbacks of federal funds.

The House committee report noted that the budget target resolution recently adopted by Congress includes the $5 billion authorization for the accelerated public works bill and assumes actual expenditures during the fiscal year starting July 1 of about $2.1 billion "either for this public works program or some other appropriate stimulative program that Congress may decide to enact."

The emergency appropriations bill was one of the first economic recovery measures sponsored by the House Democratic leadership. Committee chairmen were asked what programs in their jurisdictions that could provide jobs for the unemployed were being funded at less than their authorized level. A number of these were then meshed into an appropriations package, part of which will be spent in the current fiscal year and part in the year starting July 1.

It includes $1.6 billion for public service jobs, $456 million for more than 800,000 summer youth jobs, substantial sums for an assortment of construction programs, regional economic development, purchase of vehicles, loan programs and college work-study grants.

The House voted final passage by a 293-109 vote; the Senate concurred by voice vote.

John Murphy Dies, Headed Bricklayers

Fort Lauderdale, Fla.—John J. Murphy, who retired as president of the Bricklayers in 1966, died here at the age of 72 of a heart ailment.

He joined Local 6 in Worcester, Mass., as an apprentice in 1926 and became president of the local. In 1938, he was appointed an AFL organizer, later became New England regional director and in 1947 director of organization.

The following year, Murphy became secretary of the Bricklayers and in 1960 was appointed president at the retirement of Harry Bates. He retired for health reasons in September 1966 and was succeeded by Thomas F. Murphy, who is no relation.

A telegram of condolences sent by AFL-CIO President George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to his widow, Helen, lauded him for his service to "the entire labor movement with diligence and distinction."

Joint Efforts Stressed In Drug Abuse Curbs

More cooperation between unions and management is an essential step in curbing drug abuse in industry and filling the rehabilitation needs of users, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis declared.

Speaking at the National Conference on Drug Abuse in Industry, Perlis said that neither labor nor management could correct the problem alone.

He called for the development of more joint labor-management programs across the country to provide the data needed to determine exactly what must be done to meet the drug abuse challenge.

The federation's Dept. of Community Services has been cooperating in a labor-management drug abuse demonstration project for the past two years with the American Social Health Association (ASHA).

The project, funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, involved an in-depth study of 389 workers in industrial plants in New York and New Jersey reflecting a cross-section of U.S. industry in age, sex, income, education and occupations.

The project's findings showed that few of the men and women in industry who have experimented with drugs continue to use them. Of the 389 workers interviewed, about one in five—or 21 percent—reported taking an illegal drug at some time. However, only 5 percent said they were using at the time of the survey.

The project also was used to train 106 counsellors in drug education and prevention to undertake outreach efforts in companies, unions and communities.

Perlis noted that in recent years attitudes toward drug users have changed because of efforts in plants and unions to deal with the problem and work for the rehabilitation of those who need it.

The conference was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and ASHA.

At Randolph Institute Conference:

Biracial Workers' Alliance Seen Instrument of Change

Baltimore—Trade union leaders, civil rights veterans and educators denounced the economic policies of the Ford Administration and called for a biracial movement of working people committed to far-reaching economic change at the A. Philip Randolph Institute's national conference here.

More than 850 black trade union activists voiced their approval as speaker after speaker criticized the Administration, on the one hand, for placing the burden of economic sacrifice on the backs of working people and the poor, and Congress on the other hand for its failure to take vigorous action in opposition to the President's policies.

The delegates represented some 150 institute chapters from 35 states. They were members of more than 50 national and international unions.

In the keynote address, Norman Hill, the institute's executive director, noted that the current economic climate contains an "enormous" potential for the exacerbation of racial divisions, a theme taken up by a number of other conference speakers.

Hill pointed to 10 recent incidents in Detroit and New York City in which black and white workers engaged in pitched battles over scarce jobs as evidence of an accelerating tension pitting "black against white, worker against worker." He said the failure of efforts to ameliorate the plight of poor and working people would jeopardize "every goal and value the civil rights and labor movements have struggled for and believed in."

Hill expressed disappointment in Congress for having placed an "appallingly low" ceiling on the federal budget.

He said the action represented a "clear issue of priorities, fighting inflation as against creating jobs. And when push came to shove, many on the liberal Democratic side abandoned labor and minorities to support a position quite compatible with the philosophy of the Ford Administration."

Hill was also critical of the proponents of slow or no economic growth, declaring that the implementation of such policies would impede or prevent the movement of minority workers into the mainstream of the work force, since they would generate long-term, high unemployment.

"What good is it if blacks are 10 or twenty percent of an industry where one of every four workers is unemployed?" Hill asked.

Institute President Bayard Rustin told the conference that the institute opposed proposals to weaken or abrogate seniority provisions in union contracts as a means of achieving racial balance in the working force. He said such proposals were "gimmicks being advanced to divide blacks and whites, young and old, and men and women."

The conference heard two international union presidents, Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers and Murray H. Finley of the Clothing Workers, deplore the consequences of high unemployment on the workers their unions represent. Carlough acknowledged the potential for racial polarization under conditions of economic scarcity and urged the delegates "not to let a shrinking economy put us at each other's throats."

Finley struck a similar theme, asserting that "until we put Americans back to work we will not solve the problems of blacks, women, teenagers, or old people."

Another speaker, Clark College President Vivian Henderson, emphasized that while blacks are disproportionately affected by the jobs crisis, the resolution of the dilemma lies in policies addressed to the needs of all working people, and not to blacks alone.

Henderson, an economist, called for the creation of two million public service jobs as a first step leading to the implementation of a policy by which the government would guarantee a job for every person who wants to work.

He added that the most tragic aspect of the economic downturn is that it occurred "just as blacks were gaining a foothold in the economy." He pointed out that racial progress has come about only under conditions of full employment.

Thomas R. Donahue, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President George Meany, praised the institute as a militant force for social change that doesn't "feel it has to sound militant all the time."

A highlight of the conference was the presentation of the first annual A. Philip Randolph freedom Award to Roy Wilkins and the NAACP. The award was accepted by William Pollard, AFL-CIO civil rights director and a member of the NAACP board.

Other speakers included COPE Director Alexander E. Barkan, Rep. Parren Mitchell (D-Md.) and Ottwell Simmons, a representative of the Bermuda labor movement.

maintenance and repair commodities, housekeeping supplies, reading materials and used cars.

Other price rises were posted for new cars, toilet goods, drugs and prescriptions, appliances, television sets, tires and apparel.

Among the service charges which increased in April, the largest increases were for transportation. Besides higher auto insurance costs, there were increases for parking fees, auto repair charges and taxicab fares.

In addition, physicians' fees and hospital service charges rose in April. There were also large increases for household services other than rent, and moderate increases in other services such as drycleaning, laundry and personal care.

Jobless Aid Extended, Set for Senate Action

because their previous employment hadn't been covered by state laws.

The AFL-CIO had urged that these workers be given the same entitlement as workers who lost jobs that had been covered by state programs. The House bill didn't go that far, however. It extended the maximum duration of SUA payments to 39 weeks for the period through June 30, 1976, reverting back to the present 26-week maximum from July 1, 1976 to Dec. 31, 1976.

The Labor Dept. had sought and the AFL-CIO had opposed a plan to link the duration of unemployment compensation benefits to "triggers" set off by jobless rates in each metropolitan area.

While the House Ways & Means Committee did not include any trigger device in the current bill, it promised to consider the issue as part of a permanent overhaul of the unemployment compensation program and the Administration agreed to support the temporary extension of present extended programs.

A blueprint for overhauling the 40-year-old unemployment compensation program has been drawn up by an 11-member panel of experts of the Upjohn Institute.

Its recommendations, based on a six-year study, parallel many of the proposals that have been advanced by the AFL-CIO. They include:

- Broad expansion of unemployment insurance coverage to jobs currently exempt.
- Higher weekly benefit formulas and enactment of a federal minimum benefit standard.
- Extended duration of benefits.

The report noted that during the current recession, the unemployment insurance system is being tested to its fullest capacity.

"It is at such times that its significance is most in evidence—its strengths appreciated and its shortcomings most painful," the committee stressed in urging that the time is now right to bring about permanent improvements.

While arguing for immediate adoption of its basic recommendations, the panel also called for creation of a long-range study commission to undertake a full reappraisal of the UI system.

In its recommendations to broaden coverage, the committee said unemployment insurance protection should extend to all wage and salary workers.

The report noted that about 12 million workers are presently in jobs excluded from coverage in state and local government, on farms and in domestic households.

The committee also called for passage of a federal minimum benefit standard that would require all state laws to specify weekly benefit ceilings high enough to assure 80 percent of the covered workers at least half their regular weekly earnings.

In this area, the AFL-CIO has called for a wage replacement benefit keyed to at least two-thirds of a worker's former wages.

Meanwhile, the Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Insurance adopted a resolution urging federal minimum standards of benefits to assure jobless workers adequate income to meet basic living costs.

The advisory council, composed of public, labor and employer representatives, approved the resolution in a 7 to 4 vote. All employer representatives opposed the measure.

While the Upjohn panel stressed that benefits should run at least 26 weeks, it also urged states to extend the duration of benefits to 39 weeks at all times—not just during recessionary periods — with some federal sharing of long-term benefit costs.

Recession Bit Deeper in Early '75, No Signs of Auto, Housing Upturn sure of gross national product as the best indicator of the nation's overall economic health.

Another indicator—the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production—sent out other signals confirming that recovery from the nation's steepest post-World War II recession is not yet in sight.

The index fell in April for the seventh consecutive month, dropping from 109.8 percent of its 1967 average to 109.4, a decline of four-tenths of 1 percent. The decline put the Fed's index 12.4 percent below its year-earlier level.

Contributing to the April fall-off were further declines in the production of business equipment, steel and other durable-goods materials, the FRB reported.

Also reflecting the severity of the recession was a continued heavy volume of new applications for unemployment insurance benefits. The Labor Dept. reported another 461,800 initial claims were filed during the week ended May 10, an increase of 11,600 over the previous week.

Overall, 6,257,100 persons drew jobless benefits under seven different programs in the week ended May 3. Of the total, 4,559,300 were claimants under regular federal-state unemployment insurance programs. A year earlier, the number of persons drawing benefits under these programs was 2,038,100.

Meanwhile, the key auto and housing industries, which were hit first and have suffered most by the economic downturn, showed only faint signs of revival.

The Commerce Dept. reported that housing starts rose 2 percent in April at the seasonally adjusted annual rate of 990,000 units. This still was 37 percent below the year-earlier level of 1,580,000 units, however.

The number of new building permits issued in April offered housing analysts a little more encouragement. Often an indicator of future housing starts, building permits last month rose 27 percent over the previous month.

But the outlook for the industry was still not bright. Henry Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs, said he does not expect housing starts this year to exceed 1.2 million units, and "they could be as low as 1.1 million."

Schechter cited high mortgage interest rates as a major hurdle for prospective homebuyers. "Most people's incomes still are such that they can't afford to buy at current rates," he noted.

The Ford Administration recently boosted the rate on FHA and VA mortgages by one-half of a percentage point, from 8 to 8.5 percent. Conventional mortgages bear even higher rates. The AFL-CIO has called for national legislation to provide for lower mortgage rates to enable low- and moderate-income workers to buy into the housing market.

A hoped-for spring upturn in the auto industry, as in the housing industry, so far has failed to materialize, forcing car makers to cut back their production schedules and lay off more workers.

Total layoffs in the auto industry last week climbed to 183,825 from 180,100 the week before.

Public Service Jobs

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT is an important ingredient in any package of economic stimuli. If used correctly, it can be of direct benefit to the unskilled, the semiskilled, and the young—all of whom are suffering double-digit unemployment.

In the area of public service employment, our program calls for "the need in fiscal 1976 to increase the present authorization so as to provide one million additional public service jobs for Americans who cannot find work." These jobs will provide immediate help for many of those most in need.

Unfortunately the Administration is proposing only enough funds to finance the present 310,000 Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA) job level through Fiscal 1976. This proposed financing is just as unacceptable as the Administration's projected unemployment rate that goes down by fractions to a 5.5 percent level in 1980.

The AFL-CIO has called and worked for public service employment programs ever since the mid-1960s. But, like other supporters of these programs, we never envisioned a period when there would be massive layoffs in the public sector. Even in the worst days of the depression, public sector jobs were considered secure. Today this has changed and public sector workers are now competing for CETA jobs with all other unemployed workers.

Where CETA was conceived as a vehicle to provide additional—and needed—jobs in the public sector when the private sector held no job opportunities, it has now become "the only game in town" for millions of jobless workers in both sectors. A CETA job has ceased to be an "add-on."

And long lines of desperate workers applying for all too few jobs in city after city clearly demonstrate that jobless Americans want work, not welfare. Perhaps, once and for all, the pictures of these long lines in Atlanta, Detroit, Cleveland, San Francisco, and other cities will convince the nation that America's unemployed are not loafers and bums.

Without adequate funds, local officials—whether state, county, or city—face impossible choices. Who does a mayor, for example, hire with CETA funds when the job competitors include: a well qualified but laid-off city employe, a veteran, a long-term unemployed worker from the private sector, and a member of a minority group.

There is no way that this terrible competition among jobless workers can be solved through amendments. Only a complete turnaround in the economy will solve this problem. In the meantime, adequate funding will simply help to lessen the job competition.

The AFL-CIO does not believe that laid-off public sector employes should get preference in CETA hiring. But we are equally convinced that they should not face discrimination. And we reiterate our long-standing position that state and local governments must not be permitted to fire permanent employes in order to hire federally-financed replacements.

There has been mounting criticism in the Congress describing public service employment as the "least useful" of economic recovery programs. The AFL-CIO strongly disagrees with this attack. The history clearly demonstrates that public service jobs can be filled quickly and can fill genuine community needs that are far removed from "leaf raking."

A Word Edgewise:

Expulsion from Phnom Penh A Death Sentence for Millions

By John P. Roche

WELL, THE "PROGRESSIVE" FORCES of the Khmer Rouge have just provided the world with a case study of how totalitarians deal with urban renewal. Forgive me if my tone is harsh, but I have been receiving a good deal of hate mail because I remarked here some time ago that Communist regimes are "barbaric," while a number of commentators literally heaved a sigh of relief as the curtain fell in Indochina.

Now I suppose they will explain that throwing over two and a half million people out of Phnom Penh (yes, 2,500,000) in 24 hours doesn't prove anything one way or the other—after all, those Orientals, you know, have always been rough on the opposition, Ghengis Khan, Tamerlane, and all that. Given the cynicism that dominates all discussions of these questions, I wouldn't even be surprised if someone pointed out that country air was good for city folk.

For the last decade we have been constantly exposed to the cries of the permanent floating band of ideological hemophiliacs who deplored American brutality in Indochina, Greece, Chile, Antarctica and——. (Fill in the blank.) This is a difficult assault for decent people to cope with because, if you defend American behavior, you find yourself accused of immorality, of being a "war criminal" and of other forms of wickedness. About a month ago, when I was trying to make the point that there was a real difference between the inefficient authoritarianism of the late Thieu government and the ruthless, organized totalitarianism of the Communists, someone said, "So, you justify the tiger cages?"

As it happens, he picked the wrong boy, because I saw the "tiger cages," which were not underground pits (as a trick photograph in one of our former unlamented weeklies suggested) but aboveground and covered by a roof to keep out the rain and sun. After the great howls went up, the prisoners were removed from the "tiger cages" to other quarters and the "cages" were eagerly taken over by South Vietnamese troops and their families because of the superior ventilation. So much for the "tiger cages." But back to the main point: there is a quantum jump between the brutality of, say, the Lon Nol or Thieu regimes and the systematic barbarism of their successors.

Imagine for a minute that the "brutal, corrupt Lon Nol clique" had driven the population of Phnom Penh into the countryside—women, children, sick, cripples included—and told them to sink or swim. Can you conceive of the racket that would be launched by our ideological hemophiliacs? The very thought of it makes me shudder. Yet to date I haven't heard a peep out of them. There can be only two explanations for this silence: first, they don't care what Cambodians or Vietnamese do to each other (which is another way of saying they are callous isolationists and-or racists); or, second, they approve of anything done by "progressive" forces (which is another way of saying they are pro-Communist). They can take their choice.

WHILE THEY ARE MEDITATING ON IT (and organizing their rally of the week against the "vicious, CIA-funded Chilean junta"), two and a half million perfectly decent people, most of whom were about as political as Ankor Wat, are wandering around the Cambodian countryside in quest of something called "rehabilitation." No effort has been made to provide them with any of the necessities of life—it will be several months before the next rice crop comes in and they have no experience at farming. The intention of the Khmer Rouge is perfectly clear: they have sentenced millions to death.

There is a word for this: genocide. It seems to me that the government of the United States should begin raising hell on the subject. Chairman Brezhnev recently made the charming observation that the fall of Indochina to the Communists would improve the atmosphere of detente. He should be informed that Communist genocide seriously impairs the atmosphere of detente.

In Congress, House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill, who sponsored a resolution to designate Apr. 24 "a day of remembrance for all victims of genocide, especially those of Armenian ancestry who succumbed to the genocide perpetrated in 1915," might direct his concern to the Cambodians of 1975. And a few words from Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden would not be inappropriate.

One-Way Street for Imports:

Autos Provide Case History Of Trade Restrictions on U.S.

The House Ways & Means Committee has voted a tax on gas-guzzling cars so that Americans would be encouraged to drive more gas efficient vehicles. As a step to overcome some of the job loss that could result, a proposal was made in committee to require that imported cars must contain a percentage of U.S. parts. A U.S. "content" of 10 percent in the foreign cars would begin in 1976 and gradually rise to 50 percent by 1980.

The following remarks by Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D-Minn.) were made during that debate.

LET'S BE HONEST about the whole question of content provisions.

It has been said that other countries, our friendly trading partners, don't have content requirements. Well, maybe they don't have a content provision as such, but they have a lot of other restrictions that make it impossible for us to make a car in America and sell it over there.

Let me tell you about Japan, for example. They have tariffs of 6½ percent on trucks, cars and buses, 8 percent on bodies and chassis, and 6 percent on engines. They have a commodity tax that varies according to the size of the car. It is 30 to 40 percent on the larger cars and 15 percent on the smaller ones. A Ford Pinto, a moderate sized car that has a 30 percent commodity tax, is taxed $575.

Then they have an importer's charge. That averages about $498. Then they require an inspection that imported cars must go through before they are accepted into the country. Next they have an evaluation procedure. And then the dealer, because the manufacturer in most cases is also the dealer, has an arbitrary mark-up so that a Pinto, for example, costs thousands of dollars more in Japan than the most expensive Toyota.

Now, I guess you could honestly say that these imposts are not a content requirement restriction, and very strictly speaking I guess they are not, but they certainly have the same effect. In fact, they are more deadly.

I called the Commerce Dept. and asked, "How many cars do we export to Japan?"

They couldn't give me a figure. They merely said, "There is one word that describes it and the word is 'negligible.' " Actually, we exported 625, that is in all of 1973. In Europe it is the same picture; we face a whole series of obstacles.

The whole economies of some industrial nations are geared to "make it there and sell it elsewhere." We are talking about a very basic American industry that is in trouble along with the rest of the economy. We are talking about economic distress in America.

You know when we negotiated these agreements with European countries and Japan they were in trouble. They were redeveloping, after the war. I think it was appropriate for us to reach these kinds of agreements. I think it was appropriate for us to try to lift them, if you will, or help lift them from their economic distress and their vulnerability to those who at that time we considered our enemies and with whom today we are seeking detente. But that was years ago.

We were charitable. We were the only totally economically developed country in the world and we gave them a bushel basketful of things that maybe today we ought to take a second look at.

But today the United States is suffering economic distress. Today their unemployment is only 2 and 2½ percent, and ours is 9. One out of every five American workers is involved, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture and sale of automobiles.

Many foreign currencies are stronger today and ours is weak. We are now in trade negotiations. What better time, it seems to me, for the Congress of the United States to take sound action?

YOU KNOW THIS RETALIATION threat doesn't really scare me at all. The United States is still by far the largest consuming country in the world. You know, retaliation works both ways. We have been so conciliatory but I don't expect these people to voluntarily say, "Look, why don't you go ahead and adopt the content requirement so long as your country is in economic distress." I don't expect them to say that voluntarily, but I expect us to have enough sense to decide in favor of it.

What this content requirement does, in my judgment, is to say to other countries, we want reciprocation. If you want to do business with us like we do business with you—that is, to go to Europe and Japan, build plants, employ their labor, help pay their taxes and help insure that their unemployment doesn't rise to more than 2½ percent—we want a two-way street. All we are saying is, "You build some of those factories in our country and we will buy those cars the same as if they were made in our country."

In addition to that, we are saying to the American manufacturer, "If you want to build a fuel-efficient car, for God's sake, why don't you build it in America instead of going abroad, manufacturing it and sending it back in competition with the ones you build domestically?"

To Correct Deficiencies:

Federal Commitment Essential For Nationwide Blood System

THE ONLY WAY to put logic and effectiveness into the collection and delivery of life-saving and health-building blood is through a single, non-commercial, nationwide system, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis said.

Perlis said the American Blood Commission, created through the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to shape such a plan, is a step in the right direction, but may not have a strong enough commitment "to go the entire route." The White House and Congress ought to play a bigger role in developing the policy for a unified system, he said, and if the ABC fails to shape the right kind of system, the only alternative is for Congress to take the lead with legislation.

"There's no reason Congress couldn't charter that kind of group; there's no reason Congress couldn't fund it, in order to do the job," he declared. Perlis appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Perlis said that hundreds of competing systems, ranging from voluntary organizations like the Red Cross to commercial firms where blood is bought and sold like a commodity, add up to a confusing and uneven system that cannot be effective. He called for a ban on blood-for-profit, charging that buying and selling human tissue is morally and medically wrong.

"It is wrong for our society to expect to sell part of their human bodies" for the income they need to survive from day to day, Perlis stressed. He asserted that commercialism is also objectionable medically, noting that "something like 17,000 people annually are infected with serum hepatitis, as a result of blood transfused from commercial blood-givers."

Perlis said that whatever national system is finally developed should provide voluntarily donated blood to those who need it, without charge for the blood itself. The only cost, he said, should be for administering the blood transfusion—an expense that can be covered by existing private health care plans and eventually, by national health insurance.

Reporters questioning Perlis on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

NO-FAULT AUTO INSURANCE may have a far brighter future in the 94th Congress than last year.

The Hart-Magnuson no-fault bill was approved by the Senate 53-42 last spring after lengthy debate. The Nixon Administration had opposed it with all the clout it could muster.

The problem developed in the House Interstate & Foreign Commerce subcommittee on commerce and finance. Under Chairman John Moss (D-Calif.) hearings on the bill were completed in July but the panel was unable to assemble a quorum to mark it up and report it to the full committee. And there it died.

This year, no-fault legislation falls under the jurisdiction of the new consumer protection & finance subcommittee headed by Rep. Lionel Van Deerlin (D-Calif.) who gives the bill primary importance and tentatively plans to hold hearings soon.

The Senate Commerce Committee is moving ahead on a measure that is almost identical to the one it approved last year. Its consumer subcommittee, under the chairmanship of Sen. Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), has held four days of hearings.

A new and interesting ingredient was served up at the hearing by Transportation Sec. William T. Coleman, Jr. He told the Senate panel that the Ford Administration, like the Nixon Administration, was opposed to the federal no-fault legislation.

Coleman told the committee that after reviewing the issue the Administration had decided that it would continue its policy that "the change should take place at the state level, where useful instructive experimentation with different types of no-fault systems could be undertaken."

The state approach, Coleman himself admitted, has been pretty much a flop. Only 16 states have adopted some form of no-fault insurance and in only one state Michigan, does the law meet the federal standards proposed.

THE SECRETARY SAID that "many, including this department, may once have anticipated that the pace of the state reform would have produced more extensive and more substantial results by this time than it has."

Moss, who is the chief sponsor of the Senate bill as well as chairman of the subcommittee, couldn't accept such a facile explanation.

"The power of trial lawyers to influence state legislatures is so strong," he told Coleman, that "you are never going to get (the states) to move in the absence of federal standards."

Moss was particularly interested in how the Ford Administration reached its decision. He suggested that Coleman and Carla Anderson Hills, secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, had urged the President to support the bill while Atty. Gen. Edward H. Levi was opposed.

Coleman did not deny that he was among the bill's supporters and thought it was constitutional and would benefit consumers. However, Coleman refused to develop his own views or to reveal positions taken in the internal White House discussions.

Federal no-fault legislation has the solid endorsement of organized labor, consumer groups including the Consumer Federation of America, numerous insurance companies and underwriters.

The major opposition is still offered by lawyers and the American Trial Lawyers Association, the very group that stands to profit from lengthy judicial processes. A study a few years ago by the Dept. of Transportation showed that more than 20 percent of the fees of the legal profession in this country are derived from auto negligence cases. Over 90 percent of ALTA members make part of their living from automobile claims and related legal actions.

The proposed federal legislation provides that victims of auto accidents would receive compensation from their own insurance companies regardless of who is at fault. The bill is designed to cut down on court costs and attorneys' fees and result in overall insurance savings.

LOGIC AND EFFECTIVENESS will come to the collection and delivery of blood only through a single, non-commercial, nationwide system, Director Leo Perlis, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health. The program is heard Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Rollcall Vote on Farm Bill Veto

The AFL-CIO supported the effort to override President Ford's veto of a bill that would have improved income guarantees for farmers.

The 245-182 vote in the House on May 13 was short of the two-thirds needed to override a veto.

Right votes (R) to override were cast by 212 Democrats and 33 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 111 Republicans and 71 Democrats.

Landmark Ruling:

Unions Gain Bigger Voice in Job Safety

The Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission has given unions a stronger voice in dealing with on-the-job hazards. The action stems from a two-year-old case involving the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the General Electric Co.

In effect, the landmark OSHRC ruling would provide for:

- Increased employer consultation with unions on prevention and abatement of health and safety hazards.
- A wider union role in the adjudication of employer appeals from violation citations by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.
- More vigorous enforcement of federal safety and health standards by OSHA compliance officers, who in the past have tended to pass over some hazards because of narrow and legalistic rulings of the commission.

The commission was highly critical of GE's failure to correct a long and continuing list of unsafe conditions at its giant Schenectady, N.Y., facility.

Issues in the case before the commission were raised by IUE Local 301 which represents the 4,000 members at GE's steam turbine-generator products division Schenectady. The company employs more than 27,000 workers in that area.

More than two years ago, OSHA inspectors cited GE as being in violation of a number of federal safety and health standards and proposed $14,800 in penalties.

But an OSHRC administrative law judge, Charles Chaplin, dismissed several citations and assessed penalties of only $1,650. The IUE local and the Labor Dept. then asked for a review of the judge's ruling by the commission.

In a 2-to-1 ruling, the commission reinstated six citations dismissed by Chaplin, in addition to upholding the other citations he had affirmed.

The commission also ordered GE to consult with the IUE on matters involved in the affirmed citations and went on to "encourage" all employers to consult with their employes and union representatives on safety and health.

"In appropriate cases," the commission said, "such consultation will be considered in determining the good faith factors" in computing penalties for safety and health violations.

The commission's opinion noted that "the 'good faith' of General Electric has been put into issue by the union. The transcript shows that its contentions are well taken."

The commission found that evidence showed GE "was aware of on-going violations and applied little or no additional effort to see that they were eliminated."

In reversing Chaplin on several points, the commission also increased the proposed penalties to more than $6,000.

But it also found that Chaplin was right in allowing the IUE to argue and produce evidence that a hazardous ladder, which could result in a 17-foot fall, was a "serious" violation and not a "non-serious" one as OSHA had ruled.

The commission further ruled that all GE buildings and plants in the Schenectady-area operations are one workplace for the purposes of deciding if a given hazard is a "repeated" violation. Since repeated violations can draw fines 10 times greater than initial violations, the IUE pointed out that there will be more incentive for employers to correct such conditions.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS and its implications for labor were explored at a three-day conference in Washington that drew 150 labor editors and educators. Morris Paladino, executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, explains AAFLI's activities in Jordan, Lebanon and Turkey. The International Labor Press Association was among the sponsors of the conference in cooperation with Georgetown University's International Labor Program.

Washington Conference Explores Labor's Stake in Mid-East Crisis

One hundred and fifty labor editors and educators meeting in Washington took a three-day cram course on the Middle East crisis and its implications for labor.

The conference was put together by Dr. Roy Godson and the Georgetown University's International Labor Program. One of the five sponsors was the International Labor Press Association. The AFL-CIO Department of Education and International Affairs were among the participating organizations.

Speakers dealt in depth with such subjects as Middle East societies and labor movements, Russia's role in the Middle East, U.S. policy and labor's policy.

The tone of the conference was set by its initial speaker, Dr. Gil Carl Alroy of City University of New York. A one-time Middle Eastern specialist for the State Dept., Dr. Alroy spent more than 10 years in the region.

The Middle East, he said, reaches into three continents and is about one-half Arab. He added that "the more powerful and stable Middle Eastern nations—Turkey, Iran and Israel—are non-Arab."

The region, he said, is still living in a pre-industrial age where words stand for things, religion overshadows class and revenge outdraws even the pull of material uplift. He said that the Middle East has one foot in the 16th Century and one in the 20th Century.

"While we think of the Middle East as coterminous with riches and fast modernization," Alroy said, "it is a particularly poor and backward part of the world."

Just how the Soviet Union is using the international labor movement "to reduce the influence of the United States and its allies and to strengthen its own" was described by Godson in another session.

He said that the Soviets "are able to secure support from many Afro-Asian and Arab governments and trade unionists and at the same time erode pro-Israeli support in the European left. Moreover, by encouraging the Arab governments to increase the economic difficulties of the West and at the same time subtly encouraging strikes and other dislocations, the Kremlin is attempting to further weaken the West."

Morris Paladino, executive director of the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute, described the work of the institute in Turkey, Jordan and Lebanon, three of the 15 countries where it operates, and Ernest Lee, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, stressed the federation's full support for Israel which, he said, was the only reliable ally of the United States in the region.

Nat Goldfinger, AFL-CIO director of research, stressed that the oil crisis is not simply an economic problem but a political one as well. The oil embargo, followed by the four-fold increase in the price of oil, plus later increases, were political decisions.

"It is clearly necessary to develop our own domestic energy capacities to reduce or eliminate dependence on imported crude oil by the U.S., other western countries and by Japan," he said.

Among the obstacles to this, Goldfinger said, are the tax breaks enjoyed by the oil companies where U.S. taxpayers pay the bill for deals with the Arab countries and the fact that these companies own most of the major alternative sources of energy in the United States such as coal and oil shale.

"Our failure to provide leadership," he continued, "encourages other countries to make private deals with the Arab countries, above and below the table, making real problems down the road." (PAI).

Arkansas Labor Gears For R-T-W Repeal Drive

Hot Springs, Ark—The Arkansas AFL-CIO is gearing up for an all-out effort to repeal the state's open shop law through a referendum in the 1976 elections..

Delegates to the state federation's 10th biennial convention laid the groundwork for the repeal drive in calling on all affiliates to take part in a signature campaign for the initiative petition and to cooperate in a voluntary fund raising campaign.

State AFL-CIO President J. Bill Becker said that repeated efforts in the state legislature to wipe out the "right-to-work" statute have failed. He noted in his report to the convention that the legislature also has been unresponsive to organized labor's appeals to improve workers' compensation benefits and to provide collective bargaining rights for public employes.

He accused the state's general assembly of being "anti-worker and "anti-people," stressing that only about 10 percent of the people are receiving needed benefits.

The state federation also pointed out that Arkansas—as a "right-to-work" state — ranks among the lowest in the nation on wage scales and among the highest with counties in poverty.

Among key resolutions adopted at the three-day convention, the 336 delegates called for congressional passage of the labor-backed National Health Security bill, creation of a Consumer Protection Agency, medical insurance for the unemployed, curbing the flow of job-eroding imports, postcard registration of voters, and enactment of the AFL-CIO jobs program to get the unemployed back to work.

The convention also re-elected Becker and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Jacobs to new two-year terms. Both have held top offices in the state federation since 1964.

Major convention speakers included Sen. Dale Bumpers (D), Gov. David Pryor (D), Rep. Raymond Thornton (D), President Joseph P. Tonelli of the Paperworkers, President Carl Scarbrough of the Furniture Workers, Sec.-Treas. Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Legislative Rep. Dan Mundy of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

He was appointed by the council's board to succeed Stanley Ballard, who recently retired as secretary-treasurer of the Musicians.

Worker Education Role In Foreign Policy Cited

Organized labor can make a real contribution to reversing the nation's "disastrous" foreign policies, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told a Teachers' conference on international education.

"Teachers, of course, are in a very special and unique position to play a role here," he said. "Teachers are spread out all over the country. They are informed and articulate.

"They have shown in the past that they can be persistent in getting their message across."

Kirkland urged all trade union organizations, from local units and central bodies through state AFL-CIO organizations, to educate their members on labor's international affairs program.

"With a hostile press, ignorant commentators and opportunistic politicians in superabundance, I sometimes despair that we shall ever succeed in making the public at large understand these larger principles that guide the international views and activities of the AFL-CIO," he said.

"But the very least we can do—and must do increasingly in the years ahead—is to educate our own troops."

Kirkland's remarks were delivered to more than 50 AFT state, local and national leaders at a day-long conference held in cooperation with Georgetown University at the National 4-H Center near Washington, D.C. Participants later attended a second conference at the center on the Middle East crisis and its implications for labor.

In his address, Kirkland said that the increasing interdependence of the nations of the world means that trade unionists, "from the local level on up, have got to know more about what's going on in the world, and how it affects us." He added:

"Our people have got to know more, much more, about the problems of other free trade-union movements around the world, about the roles they play in their own countries, and about how they are affected by the policies of the superpowers.

"It is important to know about what's going on in the labor movements of Portugal, of Greece, of Italy, of France — developments there will have a bearing on the survival of freedom in the world, and hence of the American future."

Earlier, AFT President Albert Shanker told the conferees of the growing need to develop a better understanding of the impact of U.S. foreign policy on the quality of life on the home front.

"We have an interest in the exploitation of workers in other countries. We have to be concerned that standards we have negotiated are not undercut by horrible conditions in other countries," Shanker said.

Jacobson Appointed to NLRB Memphis Post

Raymond A. Jacobson, 59 a career employe with the National Labor Relations Board, has been appointed NLRB regional director in Memphis, replacing John J. A. Reynolds, Jr., who retired.

Jacobson began his NLRB career in 1937. A native of Chicago, he has been serving as officer-in-charge of NLRB's Peoria, Ill., subregional office where he was responsible for the agency's operations in the northern half of Illinois.

House Test Postponed:

Ford Veto Thwarts Strip Mining Curbs

President Ford vetoed a labor-supported, employer-opposed strip mining bill and House Democratic leaders put off an attempt to override the veto because they were not sure they now have enough votes for the two-thirds majority needed.

Ford pocket-vetoed a similar bill last Dec. 30, after the 93rd Congress had adjourned. The new version, also intended to force surface mining operators to restore the land they have torn up, appeared to have a veto-proof majority when it won final House approval on May 7. The 293-115 vote was substantially above the two-thirds mark.

But Ford accompanied his veto with strong White House pressure on Republicans to back the President. The Administration, which has fought and imposed veto threats against a host of job-creating bills, contended that federal environmental standards for coal mining would reduce employment, curtail coal supplies and lead to coal price hikes.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the bill, which had originally been viewed as a compromise between strictly environmental concerns and the economic well-being of the industry. It also was backed by the Mine Workers.

The bill's chief sponsor, Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), said he will convene his Interior subcommittee on June 2, when Congress returns from a week's recess, so that Administration officials can be called on to back up their "wild charges" about the bill's impact.

The vote to override the veto in the House has been tentatively set for June 10.

In other congressional developments:

● The Senate voted 67-10 approval of a bill that would make $700 million in federal grants available for improvement of railroad roadbeds and tracks—of which $600 million would be for direct labor costs. Funds for the bill had been voted by the Senate as part of an emergency job-creating appropriations bill but were deleted by the House because the legislation authorizing the funds had not been passed.

● The Senate voted 79-2 approval of a House-passed bill appropriating $405 million for resettlement of Indochina refugees, thus clearing the legislation for the President's signature. The emergency appropriation includes funds to transport, feed and house refugees from Communist takeovers of South Vietnam and Cambodia. The AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the assistance programs and urged that the refugees be welcomed as have earlier victims of aggression.

● A House-Senate conference agreement on housing legislation appeared heading for major procedural problems in the House so the legislation was pulled back for rewriting. The changes do not affect the bill's provisions for mortgage subsidies for middle-income families and a federal loan program to keep jobless workers from losing their homes through foreclosure.

● The House beat back attempts to cut a $32 billion appropriation for military weapons, research and development and passed the bill, 333-63. It had already been trimmed $3.7 billion by the Appropriations Committee. The AFL-CIO Executive Council has opposed cutbacks in defense and urged additional funds if needed.

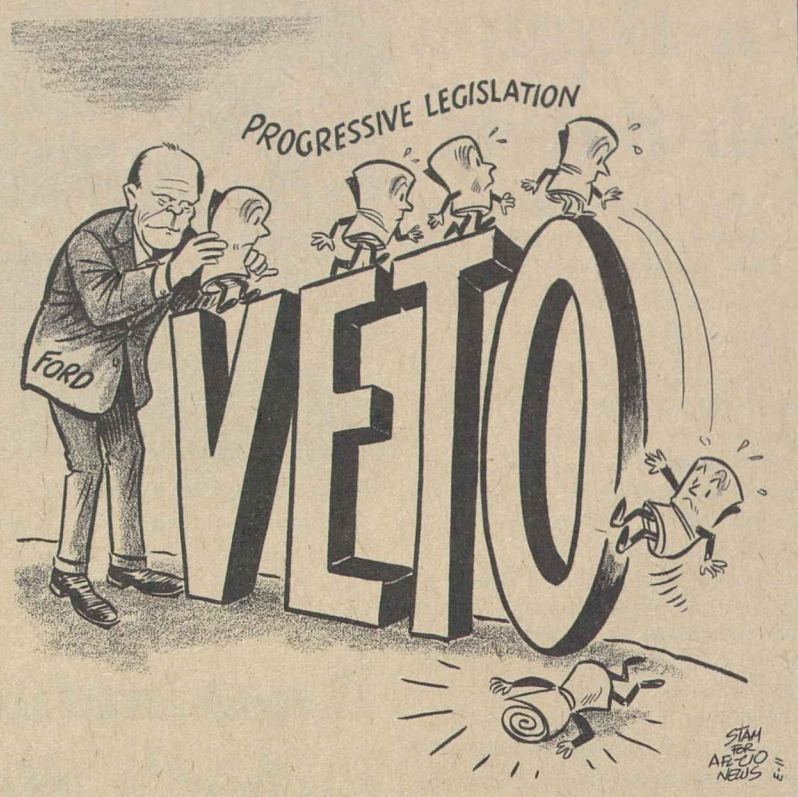
● The Senate prepared for a lengthy debate over the disputed New Hampshire senatorial contest as the Rules Committee failed to agree on whether Democrat John A. Durkin or Republican Louis C. Wyman won last November's election.

● Scheduled for early House action after the last-week-in-May recess is a bill to continue the Voting Rights Act, make the ban on literacy tests permanent, and extend the law's concern to language minorities, primarily the Spanish-speaking.

● A Senate Judiciary subcommittee gave unanimous approval to the proposal by its chairman, Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), for a constitutional amendment to elect the President of the United States by direct, popular vote.

In 1969, after the three-way Nixon-Humphrey-Wallace contest, the House approved a popular election amendment by a 339-70 vote. But it was filibustered and in effect defeated in the Senate. A two-thirds vote is required to send a constitutional amendment to the states for ratification.

Walking the Plank



Federal Role Held Key To Employment Upturn

New York—The federal government must assume the dominant role in resolving the nation's pressing manpower issues of employment and unemployment, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a Conference Board meeting here.

"Labor and management can make their contribution but it is government which must play the key role," Seidman declared.

He stressed, however, that manpower policy must take precedence over monetary and fiscal policy "and not the other way around," and strongly criticized those who would redefine full employment to countenance ever-higher rates of joblessness.

"I am appalled at the redefinition of full employment that would make it a meaningless concept," Seidman said. "Unemployment at 5 percent or even higher, as some have suggested, is not full employment. It is massive unemployment. It means 4.5 to 5 million people unable to get jobs."

He added that the Ford Administration's "complacent acceptance" of 7 to 8 percent joblessness, or even Congress's acceptance of only a slightly lower figure, is "absolutely intolerable."

Seidman participated in the conference as a member of a panel. The theme of the day-long meeting was "human resources in a recessionary environment."

In his remarks, Seidman called for a national rededication to the goal of genuine full employment—"that is, a decent job at adequate wages for all who want to work." He noted that a corollary principle is that "those who can't or shouldn't be expected to work must be assured of an income sufficient at least to meet their daily needs."

Addressing his remarks to the appropriate role of unemployment insurance, Seidman observed that there are many things wrong with the present program, but that two gaps in particular ought to be filled to contribute toward achievement of a more effective manpower policy.

One involves new entrants and re-entrants into the labor force, categories that now are not covered by unemployment insurance.

"As potential workers seeking work, they should receive benefits until they get jobs," Seidman remarked. "It may require some ingenuity to work out the details but there is no reason why this cannot be done."

The second aspect of unemployment insurance that needs rethinking is extended benefits, Seidman observed.

"Workers who are out of jobs for a long time need to receive unemployment insurance payments, and they need to receive them whether or not the overall unemployment rate is high or rising in the nation, state or locality," he said.

In addition to the payments, triggers are needed that would set in motion a battery of aids after an individual worker has been unemployed for a period of time. Such aids would include guidance, retraining, voluntary relocation, and other appropriate manpower services to help restore that jobless worker to suitable and remunerative employment.

Unions Seek Increase In Federal Arts Funds

AFL-CIO unions representing musicians and actors urged Congress to increase federal funding of the National Endowment for the Arts in order to preserve America's cultural resources.

Musicians President Hal C. Davis told a House subcommittee that the inflation-eroded $82 million proposed by the Administration, although higher than last year, is not enough. He urged Congress to appropriate the full $126 million it has authorized for the arts subsidy program.

Actors Equity Executive Sec. Donald Grody, in House testimony, and the union's western regional director, Edward Weston, at Senate hearings also pressed for higher funds.

Davis stressed that even with federal funds to help meet symphony deficits, the salaries of talented musicians are far less than their training and skills warrant.

Without adequate federal aid, he warned, major orchestras and orchestras in smaller cities alike would be pushed to the brink of collapse.

Thousands of other related jobs would be lost as well, Davis noted. He is chairman of a subcommittee on the arts of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Professional Employees.

Grody and Weston said lack of jobs and low pay have forced many talented men and women to abandon the theater, their abilities and training wasted.

In a typical week, they said, more than 85 percent of the union's membership will be unemployed.

Full funding at the level authorized by Congress would mean more employment for actors, longer seasons by resident theaters throughout the nation and regional tours, the Equity officials said.

Albert Epstein Dies, Retired IAM Economist

Albert Epstein, who retired last September as research director of the Machinists, died after a heart attack at Kennsington, Md., May 8. He was 65.

Epstein had served the IAM for nearly 30 years as an economist, pension specialist and research director. He also was active in the Industrial Relations Research Association and the American National Metric Council.

Survivors include his wife, Esther, and two sons. Services were held May 11 in Washington, D.C.

Indochina. The Executive Council earlier this month directed the federation's departments to work with government and voluntary programs to assist the refugees in finding housing and jobs and to obtain needed social services.

Much of the federation's effort is being channeled through the Dept. of Community Services with the cooperation of the departments of International Affairs, Organization & Field Services and the Human Resources Development Institute.

Community Services Director Leo Perlis notified all affiliates, state and local central bodies and the CSA staff across the country of the AFL-CIO program to assist the 130,000 refugees that are expected to be resettled in the United States.

Perlis alerted the AFL-CIO groups to the 10 national voluntary organizations which are cooperating in the effort to find sponsors for the refugees.

He noted that the federation has worked with the voluntary agencies for a number of years and suggested that AFL-CIO unions and representatives work with the local affiliates of these agencies and with other community groups to help the refugees.

He urged that any questions, problems or suggestions dealing with the resettlement of the refugees be forwarded to the Dept. of Community Services.

The refugees are currently being processed through three military installations in the United States, at Camp Pendleton, Calif.; Fort Chaffe, Ark.; and Eglin Air Force Base, Fla.

Clerks Press For Talks on A&P Closings

The Retail Clerks, following a meeting of 90 of its local unions affected by the closing of A&P stores across the country, demanded that A&P meet immediately with the four unions representing the grocery chain's workers and comply with a set of minimum standards for store closing.

The union declared that the closing of an estimated 1,200 A&P stores presents a "grave national problem affecting the future and welfare of 25,000 workers and their families" belonging to RCIA, the Meat Cutters, Bakery Workers and Teamsters. It called on A&P top management to "sit down with the leaders of the four unions and work out the humanitarian problems involved. These workers deserve no less."

RCIA also stipulated that it regarded four items as being "minimum standards" to be discussed at such a meeting: layoff pay, job recall rights, continuation of health and welfare and pension rights "and other pressing human concerns."

"The problems of these 25,000 workers deserve immediate attention on a national scale," RCIA said. "At a time when the jobless rate in the country continues to skyrocket, A&P . . . has an obligation to see to it that the plight of these workers is cushioned as fully as possible. Certainly, at a time when the chain is talking about closing down small stores and opening giant ones in their place, the workers are entitled to top consideration for re-employment rights."

Labor Spurs Swift Action On Voting Law Extension

Study Finds Tax Breaks Favor Rich

Americans with incomes above $100,000 a year saved an average of $45,662 in taxes last year through a variety of special exemptions — ranging from deductions generally available to middle-income families to such big loopholes as the capital gains tax.

While the 160,000 persons in that income bracket amounted to only two-tenths of 1 percent of all taxpayers, their tax breaks cost the federal treasury $7.3 billion.

A Treasury Dept. study, compiled for and released by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), identified $58 billion in revenue losses as the result of tax provisions "intended to encourage or reward specific activities."

As an example, the tax exemption for state and local bond interest, which was intended to make it easier for communities to market their bonds, costs the federal treasury $1.1 billion. Of that amount, Mondale noted, more than 88 percent represented tax savings for persons with incomes over $50,000 a year.

The AFL-CIO and other tax reform advocates have contended that less revenue would be lost if the federal government subsidized the interest rate of local government bonds and eliminated their tax exemption.

Mondale stressed that the same dollar deduction is worth substantially more to persons with the highest incomes since they are subject to higher tax rates. Thus, at the $5,000-a-year taxable income level each $100 deduction is worth $14 a year in reduced taxes. But to a person making over $200,000, he said, each $100 deduction is worth $70 in reduced taxes.

The Treasury Dept. table showed that the capital gains tax loophole —which taxes certain forms of investment profits at a lower rate than wages and salaries—cost the government $6.7 billion in revenue.

More than 47 percent of the tax savings went to persons with incomes over $100,000, Mondale noted. And more than 62 percent went to the 1.2 percent of taxpayers with incomes over $50,000.

Mondale said that many tax exclusions serve a useful purpose and should be continued. He added:

"Others need to be examined to see whether they can be restructured so that their benefits are distributed more broadly and equitably. In still other cases, a direct expenditure, loan or guarantee program might work better than a tax expenditure, and we should consider substituting one for the other. And finally, some tax expenditures serve no defensible purpose at all, and should be abolished."

Court Bars Vinyl Rule Challenge

A federal standard virtually barring worker exposure to the cancer-causing gas vinyl chloride has survived a final legal challenge as the U.S. Supreme Court left standing a lower court decision upholding the standard.

Two major plastic companies and a trade group sought to overturn the Labor Dept. regulation limiting the concentration of vinyl chloride in work areas to less than 1 part per 1 million parts air (1 ppm) over an eight-hour period.

The employers did manage to delay the effective date of the standard for three months while appealing to a lower court and the Supreme Court. They contended that the reduced vinyl chloride exposure level established by the standard was not technically or economically feasible.

The AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. had intervened on the side of the Labor Dept. in the appeals court and Supreme Court cases.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration last October issued the standard requiring employers to reduce exposure levels of the carcinogenic gas from 50 ppm to 1 ppm on Jan. 1.

But the Second Circuit of Appeals granted the plastics industry a stay while a special three-judge panel studied the appeal. The court upheld the standard, but postponed the effective date to Apr. 1.

Union Carbide Corp., Firestone Plastics Co. and the Society of the Plastics Industry then asked the high court to review the lower court's ruling. They not only sought to overturn the standard, but also to stay the new Apr. 1 effective date.

Ford Tariff Opposed:

House Energy Bill Held 'Far Superior'

An energy conservation bill drawn up by the House Ways & Means Committee is "far superior" to the Ford Administration program and more closely approaches labor's proposals, the AFL-CIO said.

In a letter sent to all House members before President Ford's televised speech, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller detailed the federation's reasons for preferring the House Committee bill to the Administration approach.

Ford's tariff hike approach "would mean across-the-board price increases in gasoline and fuel for all working Americans, hospitals, schools, industry and transportation," Biemiller said.

He estimated that its "ripple impact" would add $300 to $500 a year to living costs.

Ford, voicing impatience at the slow pace of congressional action, imposed an additional dollar-a-barrel tariff on imported oil—on top of the $1 tariff he levied Feb. 1. His plan to cut oil consumption calls for still another $1 price hike.

Ford also announced his intent to remove the last vestiges of price controls from domestic oil—a move that would further inflate the price of petroleum products and push up living costs generally.

The further impact of decontrol of domestic oil prices, Biemiller warned, would have a "crushing impact on all Americans without regard to the circumstances of their incomes or their jobs."

The difficulty Congress has encountered in trying to develop a consensus for an alternative to the Administration's energy program enabled Ford to paint a picture of a nay-saying legislative branch and a President who had been patient but now must act.

Initially, the House had hoped to complete action on energy legislation before departing for a weeklong recess. But the bill that cleared the Ways & Means Committee by a slim 19-16 margin faced such a multitude of amendments that House leaders decided to hold it up until early June.

The AFL-CIO has endorsed

Cites Role In Building Civil Rights

The AFL-CIO has called on House members to approve "without weakening amendments" a bill that would extend the Voting Rights Act, expand its coverage and permanently outlaw the use of literacy tests anywhere in the nation.

The House is scheduled to start debate on the bill on June 2, when it returns from a weeklong recess. Key portions of the present law expire in early August, and civil rights groups are concerned that even a short lapse might undo some of the hard-won progress of the past decade.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller declared that the Voting Rights Act has "proved its value" since it was first passed in 1965. He termed it "a major contribution to political freedom in the United States" and stressed the AFL-CIO's continued strong support for the law as "effective and equitable civil rights legislation."

A number of provisions of the bill drafted by the Judiciary Committee may be hotly contested on the floor of the House.

The Administration and some southerners not flatly opposed to the bill want the extension limited to five years as contrasted with the Judiciary Committee's 10-year bill.

A southern-led effort will be made to make it easier for counties and states to get out from under the law's coverage through proof of non-discrimination.

But the sharpest controversy has

NLRB Order Sustained on Attorney Fees

The Supreme Court has let stand a landmark ruling of the National Labor Relations Board ordering a company that sought to avoid bargaining by engaging in "frivolous" legal tactics to pay the resulting attorney fees incurred by the union.

The high court refused to review a 1974 ruling of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia which approved the award of attorney fees to the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The NLRB order against Tiidee Products, Inc., of Dayton, O., was the first of its kind in the board's history.

The company had appealed the ruling with the support of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which

Pay Board Upheld on State Raise, Wage-Hour Decision Postponed

The Supreme Court said the federal government can prohibit states and cities from giving their workers a pay raise higher than the amount allowed by a wage stabilization ruling. But it put off a decision on whether Congress can compel local and state governments to meet minimum wage and overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

While the circumstances differ, both cases deal with federal actions that affect the compensation of public employes.

The case decided by the Supreme Court upheld the cutback of a 10.6 percent pay raise the Ohio legislature voted for 65,000 state workers in 1972.

The federal Pay Board that year, acting under temporary emergency wage control powers that Congress has since refused to renew, had reduced the raise to 7 percent.

A seven-member majority of the Supreme Court voted to affirm an appellate ruling that Congress did not intend to exempt state employes from coverage of the Economic Stabilization Act and that it had the power to hold public employers to the same standards set for the private sector.

The Supreme Court noted that in 1971, when wage-price controls were first imposed, state and local government employes made up 14 percent of the nation's workforce, and added:

"It seems inescapable that the effectiveness of federal action would have been drastically impaired if wage increases to this sizable group of employes were left outside the reach of these emer-

Clerks Weigh Proposals of Rail Board

Negotiators for the Railway & Airline Clerks are studying details of a presidential emergency board's recommendations following its five-week review of the union's long-standing contract dispute with the nation's major railroads.

The special factfinding panel recommended that BRAC accept the general pattern of settlement signed earlier this year by seven other rail unions. That settlement provided an estimated 41 percent increase in wages and benefits over a three-year period.

BRAC officials had no immediate comment, pending completion of their examination of the board's recommendations, which are not binding. Under the Railway Labor Act, both sides must observe a 30-day cooling-off period to allow negotiators time to consider the board's findings.

The union will be legally free to pursue any "self-interest" course of action such as a strike as of 12:01 a.m. on June 23.

The three-member emergency board was established by President Ford Apr. 16 under RLA provisions, blocking a nationwide strike by BRAC that had been set for Apr. 18. The union had rejected the carriers' offer as inadequate, particularly in the areas of wages and pension benefits.

Meanwhile, the four shopcraft unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Railway Employees' Dept — the Carmen, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Firemen & Oilers and Boilermakers-Blacksmiths — completed membership polls to authorize a strike if they cannot reach agreement with the carriers. Final results showed that an overwhelming majority approve a walkout.

The shopcrafts' negotiators are scheduled to meet with the carriers during the second week in June under the auspices of the National Mediation Board.

The board also is assisting the Yardmasters in its bargaining with the railroads.

U.S., Japanese Labor Reaffirm Cooperation

The Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI) and the AFL-CIO have pledged to cooperate to strengthen free trade unions in Asia.

"We seek to join with our Asian brothers in a program to increase the power of free trade unions to influence economic and social factors in favor of the membership and workers generally," the two organizations declared in a joint statement.

Signed by AFL-CIO President George Meany and DOMEI President Seiji Amaike, the statement was issued following a four-day meeting in Washington attended by representatives of the two labor organizations.

The conferees discussed a wide range of problems facing workers in Asia and the United States. They noted that the political and economic situations in the free world have worsened since their last meeting in Tokyo in the summer of 1974.

"The Communist countries have strengthened their position vis-a-vis the democracies of the free nations," the statement observed.

"South Vietnam and Cambodia are the most recent examples of this trend."

The two organizations noted the threat to democratic institutions posed by the activities of the Communist powers, adding:

"We must restore the ideals of free, democratic trade unionism, eroded not only by the illusions of some trade unions concerning detente with the labor fronts of the Communist countries but also by the Communist-inspired labor movements expanding their activities in the free countries of the world."

Representing the AFL-CIO at the meeting were Meany; AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Hunter P. Wharton, Joseph D. Keenan, S. Frank Raftery, John H. Lyons and Glenn E. Watts; Joseph T. Power, president of the Plasterers & Cement Masons; Ernest S. Lee, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs; Morris Paladino, executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and Harry Goldberg, AFL-CIO international affairs representative.

DOMEI representatives besides Amaike were Vice Presidents Ichiro Shioji, Ryoichi Tanaka and Yoshiji Watanabe; Assistant General Sec. Masao Uenishi; Iwao Fujiwara, member, Committee of Internation Affairs; Naotake Kaihara, director, Auto Workers' International Dept., and Masao Aihara, director, International Affairs Bureau.

Firm Loses Plea:

Court Backs NLRB On Union Legal Fees

argued that the payment order was punitive.

IUE President Paul Jennings commented that the Supreme Court decision "certainly strengthens labor's hand in overcoming refusals to bargain," but still leaves much to be done.

"The time is long overdue," Jennings said, "that workers, who are the real victims, be made whole for the losses in wages and fringe benefits they suffer as a result of such cynical lawbreaking by their employers."

The origins of the much-litigated Tiidee case date back nearly eight years to the IUE's first moves to organize the company, which manufactures house trailer parts. Tiidee tried to discourage an election, but finally consented. Its next tactic was to refuse to bargain with the union, and the IUE filed unfair practice charges which were upheld by the NLRB.

When the company challenged the board's order, the appeals court branded the firm's refusal to bargain a "clear and flagrant violation of the law" and termed its objections to the 1967 election "patently frivolous."

At the same time, in the spring of 1970, the appeals court directed the NLRB to conduct further hearings on the IUE's request for special remedies, suggesting that the penalties proposed by the board were not stiff enough to correct the unfair practices.

The "affirmative action" clause of the labor law, the court panel said, is not a "mere charter of authority that the board has the option to exercise or ignore," but is, in the words of the Supreme Court, a "broad command."

Effective redress for a broken law, the judges reasoned, should compensate the party wronged and withhold from the wrongdoer the fruits of its violation.

The IUE had sought such special remedies as pay raises and cost-of-living increases lost by the workers because of Tiidee's foot-dragging, reimbursement for dues and initiation fees the union would have collected had the company bargained in good faith and reached agreement, and relief in such areas as additional organizing costs.

Before the board could conduct new hearings, however, Tiidee took the case to the Supreme Court, where review of the lower court order was refused for the first time.

When the case finally got back to the NLRB on remand, the board took the position that Congress had not given it authority to "make whole" workers for wages and benefits denied them while an employer illegally refused to bargain with their union.

The NLRB, however, did order Tiidee to pay both the union and the board itself for litigation costs they had incurred, suggesting that this "will undue some of the baneful effects" resulting from the company's flagrant violation of the law.

The appeals court upheld the order for payment of the IUE's legal fees, but rejected that part of the ruling calling for payment of the NLRB's costs. It was this decision that the Supreme Court refused to review in the latest chapter of the Tiidee case.

Construction Labor Unit Appointed by President

Ten labor and 10 management members of a new panel set up to encourage the peaceful negotiation of construction wage and benefits settlements were named by President Ford.

The panel—the Collective Bargaining Committee in Construction—was established by Ford on May 1 as a branch of the President's Labor-Management Committee.

According to the Executive Order creating the committee, the panel will strive generally to foster more effective bargaining in the construction industry "with a minimum of government interference."

Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop will serve as chairman. W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service will serve as a member.

The 10 labor representatives are Presidents Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers, Peter Fosco of the Laborers, William Sidell of the Carpenters, S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, Robert A. Georgine, of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Frank E. Fitzsimmons of the Teamsters.

At the time the committee was being formed, Georgine noted that the panel could be "a forum where progress could be made, but only the future will tell."

"Most important," Georgine said, "everyone should know that we have no stabilization responsibilities or authority. If the committee has meaningful discussions, it could mean progress for the construction industry."

The committee's functions will be to facilitate the collective-bargaining process at local and regional levels, help create a data bank on wages and benefits, facilitate local and regional coordinated bargaining where appropriate, and "seek to resolve particular disputes that cannot otherwise be reasonably resolved."

The committee is authorized to hold meetings on particular collective bargaining issues and to make recommendations to the parties involved in a dispute.

Wayne State Dedicates Reuther Labor Library

Detroit—Much of labor's historic past will be preserved in the setting of a major urban university with the dedication of the Walter P. Reuther Library of Labor & Urban Affairs.

The modern, four-story building, which will house the library, is on the campus of Wayne State University. The structure was financed by a donation from the Auto Workers and a grant from the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

A number of AFL-CIO unions, as well as the UAW, have already made the library a repository for their records, among them the Air Line Pilots, State, County & Municipal Employees, Teachers, Newspaper Guild, and Farm Workers.

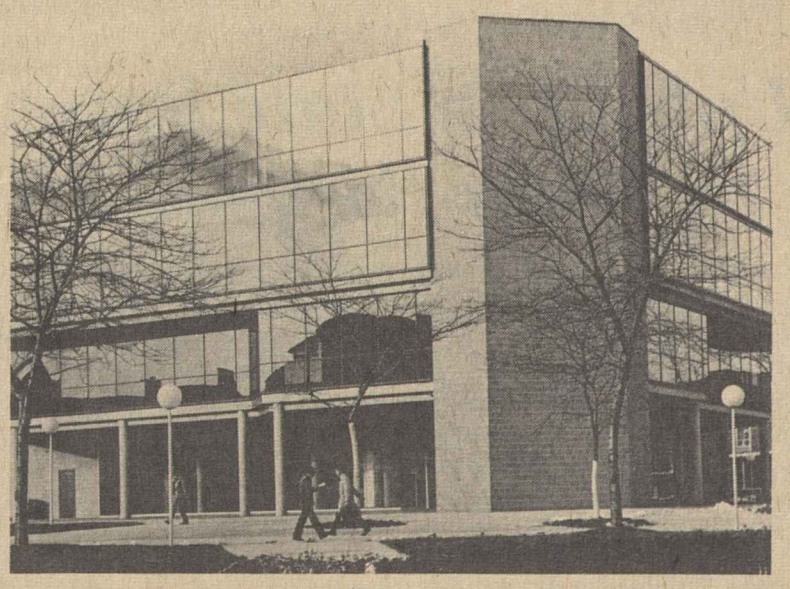
Both the Michigan AFL-CIO and Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO have collections at the library. Civil rights and civil liberties organizations are also represented among the collections as are labor-related church organizations and social services groups.

The personal papers of men and women associated with the labor movement represent another facet of the library. In addition to the collections of the leaders of the UAW and other unions, this section includes donations from a number of secondary leaders and rank-and-file members.

More than 20 million items are presently deposited with the library. In addition, it has more than 4,000 reference and labor books, thousands of photographs and recordings of the voices of many persons who made union history.

Two long-time friends of the labor movement and the Reuther family—Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and former Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz—were featured speakers at dedication ceremonies.

UAW President Leonard Woodcock called the library "a fitting memorial to Walter in the heart of the city to which he gave so much."



NEW CAMPUS LANDMARK at Wayne State University in Detroit is the Walter P. Reuther Library of Labor & Urban Affairs, dedicated recently. The library was financed by the Auto Workers and a grant from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Garment Workers Mark 75th Year

New York—June 3 marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of the Ladies' Garment Workers, but the union's diamond jubilee is already in full swing.

Hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers and visitors to the city have seen the ILGWU's Rockefeller Center exhibit of historic photos that date from the sweatshop era of the garment industry.

The union has also sponsored daily noon-hour programs that combine entertainment, craft demonstrations and fashion displays.

There have been many special events, with more to come. Members of Congress and their families have been guests at a "Festival of Fashion" breakfast. Talented ILGWU members are bringing a mini-pageant to Unity House, the union's summer resort in Pennsylvania, where a national leadership conference of ILGWU officers and staff is being held.

In New York, nearly 8,000 union retirees attended two concerts at Lincoln Center and were hailed by the ILGWU's officers as "the mothers and fathers of the great unions whose benefits we enjoy today."

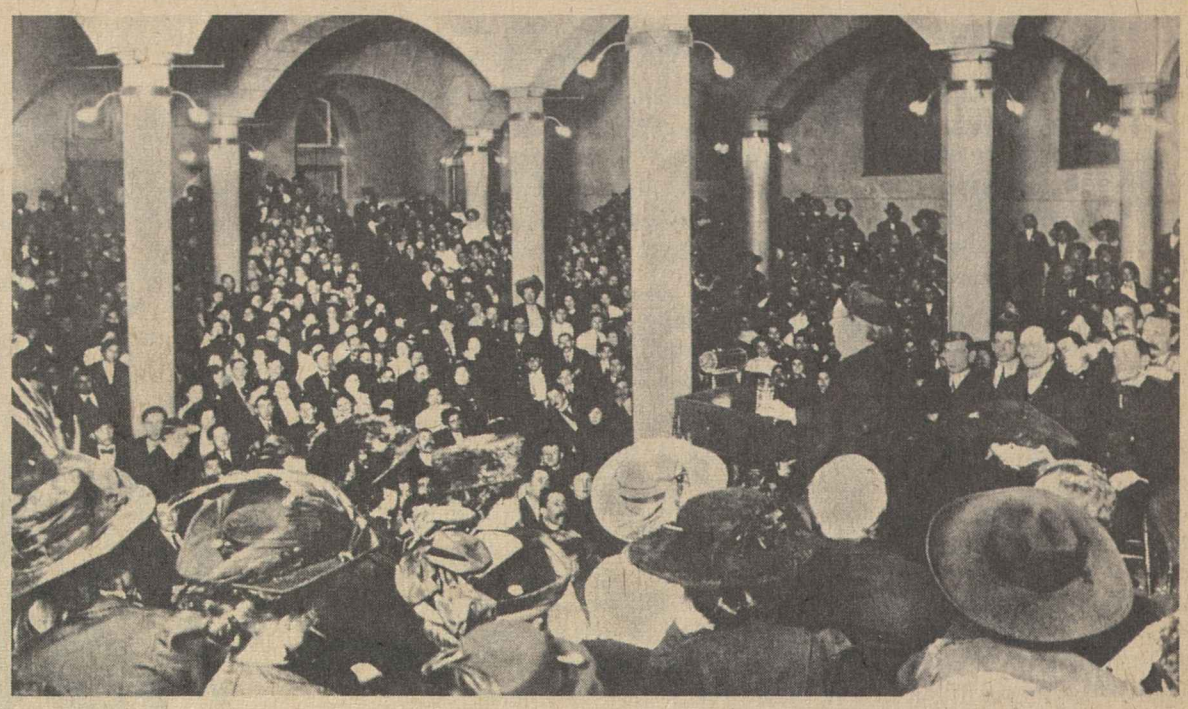
New York's Mayor Abraham Beame joined other mayors and governors in proclaiming June 3 as Garment Workers Day, and he will be host to a reception at Gracie Mansion on June 17.

A special issue of Justice, the union's newspaper, presents the highlights of the union's history from its earliest years—the first attempts to organize, the earliest strikes, the tragedy of the Triangle fire where 146 garment workers died, court battles, lockouts, successful fights against communists and racketeers, for progressive legislation and candidates, against runaway shops and cheap imports.

The union's history embraces also such pioneer ventures as health centers, production of the long-running show Pins and Needles on Broadway, vacation camps, generations of adult education and union education programs.

The union's membership of more than 400,000 is about 80 percent women and the ILGWU's geographical base has spread with the industry.

A "census" of members shows that 33 percent work in New York City, 12 percent in nearby areas. Five percent are in the Philadelphia area, 22 percent in other sections of Pennsylvania and in New England. Nine percent work in the Southeast, 8 percent in the central states and 2 percent on the Pacific Coast. Six percent are in Canada and 3 percent in Puerto Rico.



HISTORIC PHOTO from an exhibit marking the 75th anniversary of the Ladies' Garment Workers was taken on Nov. 22, 1909, in the Great Hall of Cooper Union in New York. That's the meeting at which shirtwaist workers, mostly young immigrant women, boldly voted to strike all of the city's shirtwaist shops. Shown addressing the group is Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor. They won their 10-week strike and wrote an important page in labor history.

Seattle Region Set Up By Mediation Service

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service announced establishment of a new regional office in Seattle, effective July 1. The office will direct FMCS operations in the northwestern United States.

James L. Macpherson, currently FMCS regional director in Cleveland, will become director of the new region. Exact boundaries of the region remain to be fixed.

Trade Advisers Warn Against Job Giveaways

Organized labor warned the government that a new round of giveaways in trade negotiations for additional tariff reductions on low-wage imports would worsen the jobs loss of U.S. workers.

Representatives on the Labor Policy Advisory Committee for Multilateral Trade Negotiations questioned Administration officials as to whether the 1974 Trade Act provides sufficient safeguards against further job erosion.

The committee expressed its concerns during its first meeting with Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop and Special Trade Representative Frederick Dent. Participating in the meeting were representatives of nearly 40 AFL-CIO affiliates, including several federation vice presidents.

The labor representatives criticized the government's failure to correct employment problems caused by previous tariff reductions while it continues to propose new cuts that will accelerate the rise in imports.

Negotiations are now under way in Geneva, Switzerland, under the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT). The negotiations are being extended to nearly 100 countries, including some which are not parties to GATT.

The committee, which also includes representatives from several unaffiliated unions, was established under the trade act along with advisory committees representing business, agriculture and the public.

The law requires that each advisory committee report to the President, Congress and the Special Trade Representative on each trade agreement pact "as to whether and to what extent the agreement promotes the economic interests of the United States."

However, the labor committee expressed little hope that its concerns over the economic impact on U.S. workers of any of the future agreements would be given full consideration.

Dent sought to assure the labor representatives that if government trade negotiators reject any labor committee advice on trade agreements they would be required to report to Congress their reasons for the rejections.

Wentworth Retires From PR Staff Post

Robert J. Wentworth, a veteran newsman who served as an editor and in public relations with the AFL and the AFL-CIO, has retired.

Wentworth worked on the Boston Transcript, the Boston American and the Washington Herald and Times-Herald as a reporter, copy reader, picture and sports editor before joining the AFL in 1951 as an assistant editor of the AFL News-Reporter. He was a copy editor on the AFL-CIO News for several years before becoming assistant director of the Dept. of Public Relations in 1957.

He served in the Office of Special Services in World War II in China-Burma-India. He and his wife Madelyn will be living in East Dennis, Mass., on Cape Cod.

Civil Service Bargaining Law Backed

Salt Lake City—The time has come for Congress to enact legislation that will provide "true collective bargaining" for employes of the federal government and their unions, W. J. Usery, Jr., director of the Federation Mediation & Conciliation Service, declared here.

Addressing a Government Employees' banquet, Usery also emphasized that further delay in legislating bargaining for federal workers "carries with it some inherent dangers."

History shows that workers often resort to "illegal strikes" when they are not granted bargaining rights, such as has been the case among state and local government employes and farm workers, he warned, and federal workers could be provoked into similar action.

Usery called the Presidential Executive Order under which bargaining occurs now a "weak substitute for law."

While crediting Presidents since John F. Kennedy with a "sincere" desire for better labor relations in government, Usery said "still the truth remains that there is precious little collective bargaining in the federal sector."

As long as federal unions are restricted from bargaining on such vital issues as wages, pensions, medical care, seniority, transfers and union security "there can be no fulfillment of our national policy in the government's house," Usery said.

The end-product of the executive-order "mechanism," he observed, "is all too frequently a contract that simply restates what management will do—and providing only the protection to grieve should management violate its own rules."

LOUIS STULBERG

ILGWU Names Chaikin As Stulberg Retires

Unity House, Pa.—Louis Stulberg will step down as president of the Ladies' Garment Workers on Sept. 1 and Sol C. Chaikin, the union's secretary-treasurer, will succeed him.

Stulberg announced his retirement in a moving letter to the ILGWU executive board which met at Unity House, the union's summer resort for members. The meeting was tied in with the observance of the union's 75th anniversary.

A committee named by ILGWU First Vice President E. Howard Molisani, who presided in Stulberg's absence, nominated Chaikin for the post. The board unanimously elected him and he was sworn in as president elect to take office on Stulberg's retirement.

Stulberg's letter noted the anniversary observance and termed it "fitting" that the union should move on from that milestone with "new leadership at its helm."

He said the ILGWU "has been all things to me—my school, my college, my door to worlds I had never dreamed of and certainly never dreamed of entering. Above all, it has given a rich meaning to my existence. I have had the opportunity to work for an ideal. I have been able to serve the garment workers, to help improve their lives and to help turn some of their most important social ideals into reality."

Stulberg, who is 74 years old, has been president of the 400,000 member union since 1966. Born in Poland, he emigrated to Canada as a child and joined the ILGWU in Toronto in 1916. He graduated from Harbord Collegiate Institute there and attended the University of Chicago after moving to the United States. He assumed his first union position in 1924 as a general organizer in the Midwest. Moving to New York, he served as business agent and later as assistant manager of Local 10 from 1929 to 1945.

He joined the ILGWU general staff in 1945 as assistant executive secretary and was elected a vice president and member of the executive board in 1947. At the same time, he became manager of New York undergarment Local 62.

In 1956, he moved up to the new post of executive vice president, then became general secretary-treasurer in 1959. His union career culminated in election to the presidency in 1966.

During Stulberg's nine-year tenure as president, the ILGWU achieved substantial gains in members' benefits, winning wage increases totalling some 65 percent and doubling monthly retirement benefits to $100.

Along with his ILGWU career, Stulberg served many labor, government and public service organizations. He has been a member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, a fellow of Brandeis University and is a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Chaikin, 57, will serve the balance of Stulberg's three-year term as president, which runs until the ILGWU's 1977 convention. He will also remain as secretary-treasurer.

In accepting election as president, Chaikin paid tribute to the accomplishments of Stulberg and David Dubinsky, his immediate predecessors. He then told the board members:

"I'm of a new generation, born in this country, born in this century, not necessarily better but different, even as the challenges confronting us today are different."

Chaikin has been associated with the ILGWU since 1940, when he graduated from Brooklyn Law School. His assignments have included three years as director of the ILGWU's southwest division, associate director of its 95,000-member Northeast Dept. and vice president of the union.

He was elected secretary-treasurer by the ILGWU board in 1973 and was elected to a full term by acclamation at the 1974 convention. He was recently honored, along with Clothing Workers Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman, with the League for Industrial Democracy's annual award.

Barriers to Voting

THERE ARE 40 MILLION men and women in the United States who cannot vote because they are not registered. In the 1974 elections, 38 percent of the U.S. eligible voters actually voted. National figures show that approximately 62 percent of the eligible voters are registered to vote, so the obvious conclusion is that in order to increase the number of voters, there must be an increase in the number registered.

Voter registration by mail would go a long way toward solving this problem. States that have adopted such a mail registration system have experienced a dramatic increase in registration.

But there is strong opposition to registration by mail and despite liberal support, Congress has been unable to pass a national mail registration bill. Even in the 93rd Congress, reputed to be a liberal Congress, it took considerable effort to move the bill through the Senate and it died in the House, victim of a 204-197 vote in which conservatives managed a parliamentary maneuver to block routine consideration of the rule under which the bill would be debated. And it passed the Senate only after a filibuster was broken on the third try—a monumental event in itself, since it was the first time since 1917 that a filibuster had been broken after two unsuccessful tries.

Ironically, Congress has already passed one register-by-mail bill, for our men and women in the armed services. So the principle of mail registration has been agreed to by Congress.

A national mail registration bill has been re-introduced in the 94th Congress and proponents have hopes of success. It is pending final committee action in both the House and Senate—so final action in both houses could come by the end of summer 1975.

Meanwhile, several states have taken the lead in trying to make registration systems equitable. They have provided mobile registration, door-to-door registration and several other methods. And Maryland, Texas, New Jersey, Minnesota, Kentucky, Utah, Montana, Alaska and Idaho have adopted mail registration—in one form or another.

These states' experience proves that registration by mail can produce the fullest possible citizen participation in the electoral process. Wider use of the method could open the door for those 40 million new voters who have never expressed themselves at the polls—undoubtedly for many reasons.

REGISTRATION LAWS have been used to prevent and control people in the exercise of their right to vote. A prime example of controlling a segment of the population were the poll taxes used by southern states to limit the registration of blacks. But even with the poll tax and other devices repealed, a wide variety of practices and barriers exist that are the equivalent of poll taxes—the restrictions and regulations which discourage people, primarily blue-collar workers, from registering.

In recent years, some giant steps have been taken toward opening the polls to more people, including the right of 18-year-olds to vote under the 26th Amendment, the protections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and various court decisions.

But millions of people are still disenfranchised.

While the mail registration will not guarantee that people will turn out to vote, it will at least insure that they are able to vote—paving the way for 40 million disenfranchised Americans to begin to participate in the electoral process.

A Word Edgewise:

Vietnam Refugees Accept Risks In Fleeing Oppressive System

By Bayard Rustin

AMERICA IS FACING a moral crisis, and nothing reveals this more vividly than the debate over the Vietnam refugees. We have witnessed in recent weeks an orgy of mean-spiritedness, self-recrimination and intellectual duplicity in which, most deplorably, many liberals have played a leading role. A nation which attained moral stature as a haven for the oppressed now seems willing to turn away from its most cherished traditions. Truly we are experiencing a low point in American history.

I can understand why many ordinary Americans regard the refugees with hostility. The economy is in dreadful shape; competition along racial, sexual and age lines is accelerating; the arrival of another group is seen as exacerbating an already desperate situation.

The fear generated by high unemployment also accounts for the antagonistic response of a good number of blacks. For six years the government has encouraged policies and attitudes of racial neglect. Other causes and priorities have displaced the goal of racial progress on the national agenda. Black people believe that they are justified in asking whether the refugees represent another have-not group whose arrival signifies that Negroes will be shunted further aside.

But while the apprehensions about the economic impact of the refugees may be real, they are in truth unwarranted. Although the total number of refugees comes to about 120,000, the number seeking work is relatively small, about 30,000 or 40,000. Most, in fact, are children, including many orphans.

That the American people do not understand these facts is largely due to the failure of political leadership exhibited by many liberals. It is a frightening and discouraging spectacle when those who have traditionally stood by the persecuted of the world now take the narrow road, carping at and criticizing the request for political asylum.

Ironically those who, in oppposing the Vietnam war, criticized the American government for holding degrading and stereotyped views of the Vietnamese people now suggest that the majority of refugees are either criminals or political terrorists. One can hardly imagine a more degrading or unjustified stereotyping.

As for those, such as Sen. McGovern, who propose, either through naivete or dishonesty, that most refugees would actually prefer to return to their homeland, have they considered asking the refugees themselves?

The critics of our refugee policy are unable to accept a hard, simple fact: that refugees, like millions of others who have suffered religious or political persecution, prefer the uncertainties of American life to the certain oppressiveness of the political regime they fled. That ordinary people had much to fear from the Communist forces is borne out by the experiences of the Cambodian people: a whole population uprooted from its homes, families separated from each other, forced into what amounts to slave labor, the sick and aged left to die.

THERE IS AN ANALOGY between the situation of the Vietnam refugees and the experience of black Americans. During the 1940s and 1950s, southern blacks migrated in massive numbers to the cities of the North. They understood that the life awaiting them was not utopia and that they might be greeted with hostility by workers with whom they would compete for jobs. But they also recognized that the northern cities offered opportunities for personal and political expression as well as economic opportunities.

In a sense, they were seeking an alternative political, economic and social system to the rigid, caste-bound pattern of southern segregation. They were convinced that the change, despite its traumas, was worth the risk.

The response of the southern defenders of Jim Crow was that theirs was just another system, different from the rest of the nation's, but compatible with the needs of its people. This was, of course, absurd. Segregation was not simply just another system. It was a cruelly oppressive, ingrained way of life that affected the lives of every black person born into it. And I am convinced that, upon reflection, few Americans would deny that the Vietnam refugees are fleeing a system whose oppression is real and tangible, and not simply imagined.

Blacks have been at most but marginally involved in the controversy over whether America is moving toward isolationism in the wake of Vietnam. But if America indeed does embrace the mean, isolationist outlook, it will be its black citizens who will be the worse for it. For a society which rejects the dispossessed of the world, we shall discover, is a society that ultimately repudiates its own dispossessed. This is the lesson to be learned from the debate over the refugees.

Despite Built-In Handicaps:

Labor's Public Relations Effort Vital in Fast-Changing Society

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Public Relations Director Albert J. Zack to the Washington chapter, Public Relations Society of America.

UNIONS NEED public relations. In fact, we don't have a choice. Unions are news, and because they are news they have public relations.

So the labor movement can either make an effort at establishing good public relations, or it can do nothing and have bad public relations.

Times have changed since George Meany received his first public relations advice more than 50 years ago. Then, he was told: "Kick the damn reporter down the stairs."

Society is more complex. Issues—even labor issues—aren't easily separable into "white hats" and "black hats," like the old horse operas. The communications media have undergone a revolution of startling proportions. The labor movement, too, is much different.

Our members are being bombarded from all sides by the media—radio, television, newspapers, magazines, direct mail and their own union publications. Unions are in a competition for members' attention and loyalty and for their minds. It is not a competition we can afford to lose by default.

Therefore, we have to get labor's message in front of our members, just as we must take our message to the general public.

And to do this job, we start out with two strikes against us—a lack of money and manpower. The closest thing America has to a general national circulation newspaper is Walter Cronkite. To combat the natural hostilities of newspaper publishers, labor has a loosely-knit—but highly effective—press of its own. There is, however no national labor newspaper that goes to all union members—we simply can't afford it.

Neither can we afford a national advertising program. One minute of network prime time costs $60,000. Add the production costs, and the total is equivalent to the monthly per capita payments to the AFL-CIO for seven million members.

Let me put it another way: A one-minute television commercial, on one network, shown one time, costs as much as 20 issues of the AFL-CIO News—which informs union leaders of the news of the labor movement.

And I don't think I'm telling anyone here anything new by pointing out that the key to advertising is repetition.

Anyway, our members and the general public alike are naturally suspicious of advertising—and rightfully so.

A movement of people cannot be sold like deodorant—even though Americans once got a President that way.

The labor movement is too big, too diverse to have one public relations program. Dsepite editorials to the contrary, labor is not a monolith—one thought, one message, one program . . . all set forth by a cigar-chomping dictator.

Unions are more PR conscious. Regrettably, some still believe that the only thing to PR is a quick press release and outrageous rhetoric that someone will think is quotable.

Still other unions are worried about the high cost and effectiveness of what passes for public relations in the corporate world and, hence, shun legitimate public relations.

A few are ardent practitioners of the "kick-the-damn-reporter-down-the-stairs" type of public relations.

The biggest hurdle for public relations in the labor movement, however, is when it is thought of by union leaders. Usually, it is after the picket line has gone up . . . after the scab gets roughed up or a picket captain is in jail . . . after the opposing faction files for office . . . after the decisions are made.

Then the call goes out: "Send in whatshisname—the PR guy—to straighten this mess out."

IT IS MY BELIEF that so long as unions hide their good side, they shall constantly see their bad side in print.

The union official that operates in secrecy is open to criticism, rumor and misunderstanding. A union that lets management do all the talking to the press during negotiations faces the potential of pressure on union members by the general public and a membership that is unable or unwilling to defend their union.

Similarly, unions cannot count on the media to be sympathetic, especially if we don't give them the facts to be sympathetic about. For example, many unions and companies are being hit by EEOC suits. If the answer of the union official to reporters' queries is "no comment," then the story is one-sided. And union members confused.

So long as the labor movement fails to emphasize its democratic structure and the broad base of its political action programs, then it is doomed to be continually classed unfairly with big business in stories and editorials about political campaign abuses.

Stronger Stimulus Needed:

Low Ceiling on Budget Deficit To Cramp Economic Recovery

THE TOTALLY INADEQUATE $68.8 billion ceiling Congress put on the budget deficit will do little to spur recovery and may spell a "human deficit of 7 million unemployed people for at least the next four years," AFL-CIO Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young warned.

Young also assailed the "recovery-is-just-around-the-corner" forecasts of Administration spokesmen and economists, who say that a higher budget deficit would cause very severe inflationary problems.

With one out of seven workers either unemployed or underemployed and industrial production at less than 70 percent of capacity, Young asserted, there are no signs of this quick recovery, nor any danger of inflationary impact in trying to stimulate the economy toward full employment.

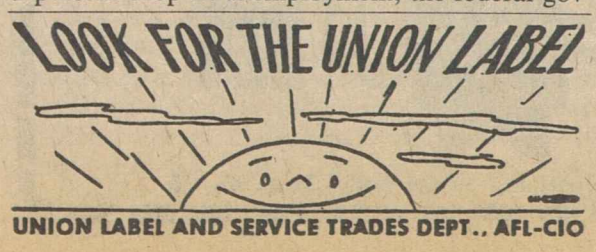
He said that "the way to cut the deficit is to put people back to work," pointing out that for every 1 percent drop in unemployment, the federal government picks up $16 billion in tax revenues and saved social costs.

"If the unemployment rate today were what it was when Nixon first took office, we would have a surplus in the budget," he declared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Young said that "a whole package of stimulus programs" is needed to make a solid move toward recovery. He said such a package should include substantial expansion of public service jobs beyond the 310,000 President Ford wants to hold to, accelerated public works programs, new housing starts, aid to the cities, work on the railbeds, and health insurance for jobless workers.

He said the argument made by a number of conservative economists and conservative members of Congress that increasing the deficit would create a money crunch "just doesn't hold water." He pointed out that many of the nation's biggest financial institutions say that the present economic situation poses no danger of a money crunch, and added, "We think that the banks that are saying that are absolutely right."

Young was questioned by Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine and Michael Posner of the Reuters News Agency.



Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR MOST OF THE YEAR that William E. Simon has served as Secretary of the Treasury, he has enamored Wall Street and the corporate interests. Before coming to government he was a bond salesman with Salomon Brothers, an impeccable New York investment banking firm.

But now reports filtering through the financial publications indicate that Simon is slipping in favor as many of them are becoming disillusioned with that other disciple of "trickle-down" economics, Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns.

Some of the business world, it seems, is coming around to the realization that pre-Hoover philosophy may not work in government—as appealing as it may sound in the chatter of executive suites. Actually, most businesses never have let the gospel interfere entirely with their operations, since few, if any, make their way on balanced budgets.

What "Simon believes" and "Simon says" was brought sharply into focus when he recently told a panel of the Senate Finance Committee about his—and the Ford Administration's—ideas on the kind of tax reform Congress should enact later this year.

The country needs higher taxes on consumers and more tax breaks for businesses and investors, Simon said. Translated: the tax burden should fall heavier on the poor, low- and middle-income families and the retired. It should fall less on the wealthy who buy tax-free municipal securities.

Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) wondered if Simon might be going a bit too far in advancing benefits to the rich so that they can disperse them to the rest of us, the "trickle-down" theory that is. But Simon doggedly stuck by his guns, reiterating that he would "prefer heavier emphasis most assuredly on consumption taxes.

As he and Burns have been doing incessantly, Simon also fretted about federal spending for programs to create jobs and advance social programs on the grounds the economy might recover too quickly, creating further inflation.

AFL-CIO President George Meany has drawn an analogy between such over-concern with inflation and the unimaginable attitude of fire-fighters who might decide to limit their output of water on the flames so as to avoid a mopping-up later on.

WALTER HELLER, chairman of President Kennedy's economic advisory council, and other economists, including professionals on the Federal Reserve Board, point to a number of available economic policies to curb inflation, if needed. The biggest danger, they emphasize, is that any economic rebound will not become a genuine recovery without solid government action to reduce unemployment.

Simon claims there already has been too much "tilt" in this country in favor of consumers in taxes. To enforce his argument for more sales taxes, he ticked off statistics to show that other countries such as France, West Germany, Great Britain, and Japan get a higher percentage of revenue from consumption taxes and less from income and corporation taxes.

Labor, consumer organizations and most economists oppose sales, excise, value-added and other types of consumer taxes because they are regressive. The more they are piled on, the more perversion there is of the doctrine that taxes are to be based upon the ability of a person or institution to pay.

William Simon is not exactly a household word. There have yet to appear any "Honk If You Love William Simon" bumper stickers, such as those honoring Burns. He isn't as famous as Earl L. Butz. But given a little more publicity, Simon may catch up.

HUMAN NEEDS, not dollar deficits, should chart the course for Congress and the Administration in shaping the federal budget, Kenneth Young, center, declared on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO assistant legislative director was questioned by Michael Posner, left, of the Reuters News Agency and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

MEAT CUTTERS legislative conference hears an address by Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop, one of several key speakers appearing before the 500 union delegates at the three-day meeting in Washington. The conference focused on labor's efforts to push through Congress anti-recession, job-creating programs and extension of the Voting Rights Act.

Environmental Agency Projects Lower Costs on Plant Noise Curbs

The Environmental Protection Agency estimates that the cost of reducing noise in workplaces to safer levels is only about one-third the amount projected by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

In testimony before a Senate subcommittee, an EPA official set the cost of a 10-year program to limit occupational noise to 85 decibels at $11.7 billion. OSHA had earlier estimated that the noise reduction program would cost industry $31.6 billion over ten years.

Dr. Alvin F. Meyer, EPA deputy assistant administrator for noise abatement and control, told the Senate panel that the lower cost estimate is based on a recent accoustical engineering study that takes into account new technological developments in sound-proofing.

Occupational safety experts in organized labor and the EPA have called for a federal standard that would limit industrial noise to 85 decibels. OSHA has proposed a 90-decibel standard on the grounds of technological feasibility and economic impact on employers.

Irritating sounds are about 75 percent louder at the 90-decibel level than at 85.

The EPA and OSHA are involved in a continuing battle on noise control, with EPA consistently calling for lower levels of noise than OSHA. Under the Noise Control Act of 1972 all federal agencies must coordinate their noise regulations and research with those of the environmental agency.

While the EPA has been supporting the position of organized labor for lower noise levels, OSHA has reflected the attitudes of the Ford Administration that the added costs for employers would be excessive.

The Administration's cost factor was stressed in a speech by President Ford to the Chamber of Commerce. Attempting to assure the Chamber that he is on its side in opposing stricter noise controls in industry, Ford even exaggerated OSHA's estimated costs tenfold.

"Is it worth as much as $30 billion a year of consumers' dollars to reduce the level of occupational noise exposure by approximately five decibels?" Ford asked in his address.

He said that the question "is not whether we want to do something about noise and safety, but whether making changes in our regulations would make sense in terms of the costs added and benefits gained."

In his Senate testimony, however, Meyer stressed that uncontrolled noise pollution imposes excessive costs on workers and society. He cited increased compensation claims for illness and injury, hidden personal costs of medical care and the added costs of litigation.

In addition to causing hearing loss and other worker illness, Meyer pointed out, noise increases accident rates and decreases worker productivity—causing further economic losses to industry. These include wages paid under continuation plans, fringe benefits to absent workers, overtime pay to other workers, padded employment to compensate for expected absences, and poor quality or defective products that are produced when key workers are absent.

Meyer also cited studies of the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health that show absences in heavy industry are significantly greater in high-noise areas than in low-noise areas. The number of lost-time accidents is greater in noisy plant departments, he said.

Public hearings will be held in late June on OSHA's proposed 90-decibel noise standard for workplaces. Employer groups are expected to line up with OSHA to defend the higher noise levels, while the EPA and AFL-CIO affiliates press to reduce the level to 85 decibels.

Union Program Deters Unnecessary Surgery

New York—A new surgical consultation program provided by a Textile Workers' contract has discovered that more than one out of every four elective surgical operations recommended to union members by their physicians were found unnecessary by a second consulting physician.

Instituted 10 months ago, the TWUA program presently covers only employes and eligible dependents under the union's dyers and printers agreement with mid-Atlantic area employers. The contract provision gives the division's members the right to obtain a separate opinion from another qualified surgeon at no cost.

William Gordon, director of the plan, noted that findings of the new consultation program show "at least 30 percent of all operations performed in the United States are unnecessary."

"It is of the utmost importance to obtain an opinion from another surgeon," Gordon notes, "as studies among union members and others show that an average of one-third of elective surgery originally recommended was decided against after a second surgical consultation, and medical records further indicate that 50 percent fewer operations are performed under health plans such as ours than there are in cases where surgery is performed at a profit by private doctors."

Gordon further notes there is a 3-4 percent statistical risk of death connected with most surgery, thus making an additional surgical opinion "extremely valuable."

The dyers and printers consultation plan includes consultation, examination, laboratory fees, X-rays and performance of the operation by the consulting surgeon if desired. The program is completely paid for under existing insurance coverage.

If the consulting surgeon deems an operation necessary, the plan provides that the participating surgeon will perform the operation and accept whatever is allowed under the basic and major medical programs without any cost to the employe.

"This amounts to a full-service program whenever consulting surgeons are used," Gordon noted.

Shelepin 'Resigns' Soviet Labor Post

Moscow — The state-controlled "trade unions" of the Soviet Union have lost their leader, Alexander Shelepin. He quit after losing his position with the Communist Party's Politburo a month earlier.

Shelepin officially resigned "at his own request" at a meeting of the central committee of the All-Union Council of Trade Unions of the USSR. No announcement was made as to who his successor will be.

Before his appointment to the labor post, Shelepin was head of the Soviet secret police, the KGB.

In March, Shelepin visited England in one of his rare trips outside the USSR as a guest of the British Trades Union Council. The visit was cut short in the face of protest demonstrations by British union members and sharp criticism from the press.

Ford Tariff Opposed:

House Energy Bill Held 'Far Superior'

the bill, Biemiller said, because the Administration plans would have a "devastating" impact and the committee bill "more closely approaches the AFL-CIO's proposals to meet America's energy goals while considering the problems of individuals."

Biemiller said the committee bill "makes it possible for Americans who use gasoline sparingly to pay virtually no additional tax."

The committee bill establishes a quota on imports of petroleum products, with a degree of flexibility given the President to raise or lower the quota.

It would finance an energy development trust fund with a 3-cents-per-gallon tax. An additional tax would be imposed starting in 1977 if U.S. gasoline consumption rose above the 1973 levels—to a maximum of 20 cents a gallon.

This tax, however, would be refunded to most people through a tax credit that would amount to a rebate of the added tax on 40 gallons a month of gasoline for every taxpayer and dependent aged 16 or over—whether or not the person owned or drove a car.

There would be additional credits to reduce the tax for gasoline used for business, for public transit, for work-related travel which would cover travel to different worksites, as would be common for construction or migrant workers, but not to a permanent place of employment.

The bill also includes an allowance for insulation and other means of lowering home fuel costs. It would set up fuel efficiency standards for auto manufacturers, starting in 1978, with a graduated tax only if a company's output failed to meet these standards.

Biemiller asked House members to restore to the bill a provision deleted by a last-minute committee action — establishing a federal agency to purchase and resell for domestic use oil imported into the United States.

He stressed the AFL-CIO's belief that "the United States must adopt a strong energy conservation program that will lead to greater self-sufficiency and greater industrial independence."

The remnants of oil price controls that Ford wants to remove have kept domestic oil prices generally from soaring to the level of the Arab-set price of imported oil.

It applies only to "old" oil—that is, oil produced in fields that were functioning in 1972 and only up to the level of the 1972 production.

But oil produced from the same fields in excess of the 1972 volume and oil produced from new oil wells can be sold for whatever the market will bear.

Ford echoed the oil industry's contention that it needs bigger profits—despite two years of huge income—as an incentive to seek out and develop new oil sources or get all the usable oil out of marginal operations.

The President also sought to link his veto of the labor-supported strip mining bill—a measure designed to protect the countryside from being permanently desolated by surface mining operations—to the need for increased coal output.

House leaders had put off an attempt to override the veto because they wanted more time to round up a two-thirds majority needed to repass the bill.

Rubber, Oil Unions Shift Conventions

Two unions that hope to merge this year have scheduled conventions at nearby locations to start on Oct. 13.

The Rubber Workers will meet at the Americana Hotel in Bal Harbour, Fla.; the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers will meet in Hollywood, Fla., at the Diplomat Hotel.

If a final merger agreement has been worked out by then, it will be submitted to the delegates for approval. If both unions approve, delegates to the two conventions will then meet jointly to launch the merged union.

Executive boards of the two unions approved a preliminary merger agreement earlier this year and committees are continuing efforts to shape a proposed constitution.

Huge Corporations Wield Dominant Role in Economy

Big business—growing bigger by the decade—dominates the United States economy to the point where the nation's prosperity and the jobs and incomes of millions of Americans are vitally affected by corporate decisions.

All too often, AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts notes in the May issue of the Federationist, these decisions are made in a vacuum.

"There is no public accountability . . . no way for workers, consumers, regulatory agencies or even the elected public policymakers to get essential information on the structure and operations of big business," Roberts observes in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

Workers have a direct interest in getting more information about the corporations with which they bargain, Roberts points out. Without sufficient data on a company's costs, prices and profits, effective bargaining is difficult if not impossible.

"Much more adequate public disclosure of basic economic information is needed," the author declares, noting that the AFL-CIO has called on Congress for a comprehensive investigation of the structure of the U.S. economy.
